"THOU HAST GIVEN A BANNER TO THEM THAT FEAR THEE; THAT IT MAY BE DISPLAYED BECAUSE OF THE TRUTH."

Volume XIX.—No. 1.] CHICAGO, January 5, 1893. [Price $1.00 per Year in Advance

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Mr. Blaine is reported as improving.

Cold weather has prevailed during holiday week.

The Michigan State Teachers' Association met last week at Lansing.

The steamship Umbria, long delayed by an accident at sea, arrived safely at quarantine in New York harbor December 30.

The commercial report of the year pronounces 1892 as the most prosperous ever known in business circles and prospects encouraging for the new year.

A bomb thrown by an unseen hand in the main hallway of the prefecture of police in Paris, December 29, did great damage to the building and caused great excitement.

Prof. Charles A. Briggs, of Union Theological Seminary, New York, who has been on trial for heresy before the New York Presbytery, is declared innocent of all the charges that have been preferred against him.

Mr. John D. Rockefeller has, this week, continued his generous gifts to the Chicago University by an added million of dollars, the interest of which is to be applied to the payment of instructors.

The Illinois State Teachers' Association adjourned its annual session last Thursday, having adopted among its resolutions one favoring the making of kindergarten instruction a part of the public school system.

A notable series of educational conferences was held last week at nine different points in the United States, participated in by leading educators, for the purpose of harmonizing the relationship between public schools and colleges and making the former preparatory to the latter.

THE regular quarterly meeting of the W. T. P. A. will take place January 11, 1893, at 10 a. m., at the Temple in Chicago.

MISS LODIE REED, of Indianapolis, National superintendent of press work, has been very seriously ill since the Convention at Denver. She is now recovering, and hopes soon to be able to give her plans for her department, which were in course of preparation when she was laid aside.

SPECIAL attention is called to Miss Greenwood's article on page four. It is the initial step of our ever alert and aggressive evangelistic superintendent to unite the church of God and the W. C. T. U. in the holy cause of temperance. Much of the success of this movement depends upon the local superintendents, and we doubt not that all will gladly coöperate.

MRS. MARY H. HUNT, our National superintendent of scientific temperance instruction, will this year send to every president of a local union in the United States her annual "Co-worker's Letter" to be read to the union and then given to the local superintendent of that department. This eight-page letter will tell exactly what to do to secure the temperance education of the children in the public schools, and how to do it, and it will be sent about the first or second week in January.

"I WILL seek that which was lost, and bring again that which was driven away, and will bind up that which was broken, and will strengthen that which was sick." This is the fitting quotation that appears on the cover of a booklet containing the twentieth annual report of the Old Jerry McAuley Water Street Mission, a report that rejoices the hearts of Christian people, since it tells of grand work in saving souls. Some of the items from the report for the past year are: An attendance upon the meetings during the twelve months of thirty-four thousand, nine hundred and fifty-seven; lodgings given away at fifteen cents per night, five thousand; men struggling to reform helped to over ten thousand meals; employment given to over five hundred; etc., etc. One little sentence that is weighty in meaning reads thus: "We never get tired of him and turn him out if he is doing his best." There lies one of the great secrets of success. Until seventy times seven, and still more times without number the Saviour lets poor, struggling humanity "begin again" until the love and the pity and the patience win. God bless and prosper the Jerry McAuley mission while there are needy ones to be sought for and led to clean, sober lives.

WE take the following paragraph from the Pall Mall Gazette, dated London, December 13, 1892. It is significant of more than its surface reveals: "The profits of the Chicago Brewing and Malting Company for the past year do not permit of any distribution on the ordinary shares, but the directors are hopeful as regards the future. The 'beer war' and preparations for the Chicago World's Fair are the reasons given for this disappointing result. The Bartholomay Brewing Company (of Rochester) has been more fortunate, ten per cent being paid on the ordinary shares. A thorough examination of the accounts of the branches and agencies disclosed the fact that certain of the assets, including debts, casks, bottles, etc., have been overvalued to the extent of £28,938, and the directors have written off this amount."

AN attractive program printed on parchment, accompanied by an exquisite menu card bearing a bow of white ribbon, has reached our desk from across the seas. The title page bears the words, "Reception to Miss Willard and Lady Henry Somerset by the Wesleyan Methodist church of London, December 7, 1892." The proceedings were initiated by the introduction of visitors, followed by a public reception, in which an address of welcome was delivered by the Rev. Mr. Moulton and responses were made by Miss Willard and Lady Henry. Stirring Methodist hymns were sung, a fine musical program was rendered and dainty refreshments were served. The ministers were all loyally decorated with the white ribbon, and American flags were on every hand twined with the Union Jack. Evidently no pains were spared to render the reception truly "notable," as Miss Willard herself expressed it.

A PROPOSAL is being widely circulated to give Government employment to idle labor on the principle that labor creates wealth and idleness destroys men. America has at present a million men most of whom are in enforced idleness. It is suggested that under the direction and management of the Engineer Corps of the Government, a department free from the taint of corruption or partisanship, and widely famous for its efficiency, we might employ a million or more laborers in building the Cape Cod Canal, the Hennepin Canal, the Nicaragua Canal, and the permanent improvement of the Mississippi river, besides the vast irrigation waters in the arid regions of the far west, the swamp land tract in the south, and the construction of better systems of public highways in all sections of nearly every state would be of incalculable advantage to the nation. The million of idle men are needy and they are small consumers. If employed they would become good consumers and every line of production would be stimulated. It occurs to us that this is a reasonable suggestion, the more so inasmuch as it is urged that thirty years ago the Government employed a million of men whose vocation was the destruction of wealth. Surely if we can employ armies to kill we ought to be able to employ armies to "make alive." Let this labor be paid for by the issue of full legal tender greenbacks to the extent of $50 per capita of total population and by long-time taxation of adjacent property that is to be benefited by these internal improvements. If we were laborers we should certainly send a monster petition to the next Congress asking for immediate steps to secure employment for us.

THE official announcement of the new lecture bureau having been crowded out of its proper position on page twelve is gladly given space on this page. Miss Lucy E. Anthony, the present manager, whose address is Somerton, Philadelphia, Pa., writes: "The Woman's Lecture Bureau is now ready to receive calls for the following lecturers, and takes pleasure in recommending them to the public, or would do so if they were not so well known as to make it unnecessary. It further hopes by honest effort and good work to make itself a necessity to patrons, and particularly to all associations interested in reform work. Prompt attention will be given to calls, and lecturers furnished in all possible cases. Susan B. Anthony, Rev. Anna Howard Shaw and Carrie Lane Chapman are the first to signify their allegiance to the Bureau, though negotiations are in process with a number of women and men, who will be announced later. Miss Anthony is available for the month of February, Rev. Anna Shaw for March in Eastern Ohio, Canada and Western New York; Mrs. Chapman for February (section not yet determined upon)."

DURING the series of enthusiastic and successful meetings which Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Willard have been holding in the north of England, a special gathering of school-teachers took place in Middlesborough early in December. This town is in the center of the vast iron districts (the English Pittsburg), where the effects of the terrible strike of last summer amongst the Durham coal-miners is still visible. The population is almost entirely composed of the wage-earning classes, and the influence of the board or elementary school-teacher is naturally a potent force for either good or ill. It was therefore with a feeling of peculiar satisfaction that Miss Willard and Lady Somerset made this their first point of departure in their campaign in favor of the introduction of scientific temperance instruction in public schools. At least one hundred teachers were present, eight-tenths of whom were women, and limited although the time was, a discussion of considerable animation followed, and a resolution in favor of temperance instruction was carried. The ball has since been kept rolling by the letters full of suggestions which several of the teachers have written, and which it is hoped will tend to elucidate the subject and adapt it to the English education code.

IT has been a complaint in some quarters that Miss Willard wrote to the Knights of Labor to the effect that she should be glad to see them in power, and some very kind friends of hers have made it appear that she was deserting the political standard which she was one of the first women in this country to grasp, namely the Prohibition party. We are prepared to state that she simply meant that she should be glad to see labor in its place of power, side by side with capital, and did not refer to any political movement, although she knows, of course, that this consummation can never be except through a party. It is well known to our readers that she believes in the party of the future of which the Prohibition party shall form the nucleus. There has also been some friendly (?) comment on the sketch of Mr. Stead in the Review of Reviews wherein he suggests that the W. C. T. U. is the most practical working church of the present and might well become the women's temperance catholic church of the future. It ought certainly to go without saying that a man as brilliant and rich and original as Mr. Stead puts forth his own ideas in his own magazine at his own sweet will without expecting the W. C. T. U. to be responsible for the same. Certainly no action of our society has ever given color to such supposition in regard to its work. By the way, we have never made our editorial bow from the office of THE UNION SIGNAL to Mr. Stead for his capital sketch of our leader, but we wish to do so now and here. Not one "lift" that has ever been given her has amounted to more in the way of strengthening her hands for the work to which she is called.

BETWEEN THE YEARS.

BY AURILLA TURBER.

A year of days behind us lies,
A year of mornings, fresh and new,
Whereat we rose to think and do;
A year of evenings, when the sun
Bidding "good by" with lingering light,
Saw ever yet some work undone
As came the shadows of the night.
It may be in these days gone by,
That God has smiled and we were glad;
It may be, in these days gone by,
He touched us close and we were sad;
It may be that for willful sin
His hand upon us hard has been.
What have we now to show for gain,
Because of joy, because of pain?
Stand our souls taller than they stood
One year ago? Then by the right
Of souls to grow to highest height
The year behind us has been good.

A year of days before us lies
Whose sunlit mornings will arise
With courage clad for trusting eyes;
Whose evenings, coming cool and still,
Will bear the brimming cup of balm
To peaceful soul, to steadfast will,
To heart that claims the blessed calm.
It may be in these days to come,
That joy will walk along our way;
It may be in these days to come,
That grief will drape the sky in gray;
It may be we shall blindly turn
From that best good for which we yearn.
What then if bright or sad shall fall
This year to you, to me, to all—
If at its limit we shall stand
Stronger by strength of sinews trained
To service? If wide ground be gained,
The year before us rises grand.

THE TRIUMPH OF FAITH.

A True Incident.

BY LYDIA HOYT FARMER.

Author of "A Knight of Faith," "A Moral Inheritance," "The Life of La Fayette," "A Short History of the French Revolution," etc.

"I must go to the Devil's Pit to-night at eleven o'clock," said a lady evangelist dressed in the plain garb of the Society of Friends.

"Why, my dear Mrs. Taylor, that is the worst place in all New York City; I did not know that you were aware of its existence," answered the gentleman at whose home Mrs. Taylor was visiting.

"I did not know of it until last night," she replied; "but a message came to me from my Master, 'Go to the Devil's Pit at eleven o'clock to-morrow night to rescue a soul. My message is clear, I must obey."

"It would be at the risk of your life; even the policemen fear to enter that den of iniquity."

"I would not endanger the lives of my friends, and I am willing to go alone, if needs be. Friend Benton, if thou wilt take me to the mayor of the city I will state my mission and ask for a policeman as guard."

"But do you not think such a risk of your life is uncalled for?" asked Mrs. Benton. "Your labors for the Lord are needed elsewhere. It seems to me such an errand is visionary."

"My message was clear; that is all I know; but where the Master sends me I go. If death comes in the path of duty I am ready; better die doing duty than live shirking it. I would not have thee and thy husband exposed to danger on my account. I fear nothing when I am sure the Master is leading."

"Do you know to whom you are sent?"

"Simply this, whether sleeping or walking I know not, a voice said to me: 'Go to the Devil's Pit to-morrow night at eleven o'clock to rescue a soul!' Thou knowest, Sister Benton, when the Master commands I can do naught but obey. My gray hairs and plain dress will gain me admission where others could not go. I hold there is no religion in the cut or color of a garment, but I find great protection in this plain garb I wear in the slums of the cities where my work often takes me."

"If you think you must go, Mrs. Taylor, I will see what protection I can get from the mayor," said Mr. Benton as he rose to leave the house on his errand. Coming back some hours after he said: "I have secured two policemen, and Rev. Dr. Dean and his wife with my wife and myself will accompany you in carriages to this strange destination. If I cannot persuade you to give up this peculiar infatuation your friends will not allow you to go there alone."

"Thou art kind, Friend Benton! I have no fear for myself. The Master can protect me as well in the Devil's Pit as He did Peter in prison. I don't look for miraculous angel deliverance, but when the Lord sends His children His defense goeth before."

It was a night black with darkness. Not the palest moonbeam escaped through the cloud-banks. Not a star glimmered. Even God seemed to have forgotten the world.

Two carriages, each one protected by a policeman on the box with the driver, turned from the respectable thoroughfares of New York City and entered a district where were crowded together the very dregs of humanity. The carriage lamps and the policemen's lanterns were the only lights to guide them through the black darkness of the surrounding squalor. Now and then sickly gas jets flickered in the smoke-begrimed shades of corner lamp posts, or, as a door was quickly opened and shut in some gambling house or dance hall, a flash of light was seen for a moment, only to make the intense blackness more perceptible. As the carriages neared a dark alley the policemen ordered them stopped, and descending, said to the occupants:

"It's as much as your lives are worth, ladies, to come to this black hole. We warn you not to attempt it. Even the policemen keep shy of the Devil's Pit."

"I am not afraid," answered Mrs. Taylor. "But, friends," she continued, "thee had better stop behind while I follow the policemen, for enter that place I must; my message commands it."

"We will not leave you alone, Mrs. Taylor, in such a district," replied Dr. Dean; and the party descended from the carriages, ordering the drivers to wait there until they should return.

"If ye will go," said one of the policemen, "wait here at the end of this alley, me and Ben will go to the pit first, and reconnoitre. If we turn the white light of our lanterns toward you, then you may follow. But I warn you, if we turn the red light, make for your carriages as quick as ye can, and drive fast from this dangerous place."

In the black darkness stood that little party of five, as the light from the lanterns faded away. One, two, three minutes dragged by as though the wings of time were weighted with lead. Not a word was spoken. It was no time for talking. But the silence vibrated with momentous results. Peradventure, Michael and his angels were battling with the unseen powers of darkness, over the weal or the woe of a soul.

What soul needed the human instrumentality of this weak woman's help, she knew not, but followed the Master. Let men doubt as they will, regarding a special providence; let scoffers cavil at Divine guidance, it changes not the facts in the lives of those who have experienced what they testify. This incident is founded on fact, and is not the imaginary dream of the author.

What appalling deeds of evil were being committed all around them by those who loved darkness rather than light. "For every one that doeth evil hateth the light." Under cover of those black skies what demoniacal spirits inhabiting human bodies, prowled and plotted and perpetrated their foul plans? Yet, I say that one lone woman was more powerful than the hosts of unclean spirits from the bottomless pit, led by the great Red Dragon, the beast from the awful abyss; for the Lord God Almighty was her defence, against whom neither the hosts of Gog nor Magog can prevail. For evil is powerless before the presence of Omnipotent Good.

A light is seen in the distance! Is it white or red? "Come quickly!" cried Dr. Dean and Mr. Benton, each grasping the arm of his wife. "The lanterns show the red light of danger, we have no time to lose! Mrs. Taylor, follow us close; here, take my other arm," said Mr. Benton. But in the darkness each gentleman thought the lady was under the care of the other, and so they hastened to the carriages, only to find with alarm that Mrs. Taylor was not with them. They feared to leave their wives to go back, they also feared to take their wives back into that dark alley, and thinking the policemen must have reached their friend, they hastily got into the carriages and waited further developments.

We will follow Mrs. Taylor. In the darkness she stood there alone with her God. "Shall I follow my friends?" asked fear. "Go to the Devil's Pit at eleven o'clock to rescue a soul!" Had she rescued that soul? She hesitated no longer but turned towards the dangerous den of the wicked. The policemen met her with cocked pistols.

"Hasten, lady, to the carriage! Did you not see our red lights? It will cost you your life to go further. The The furies will tear you to pieces. Where are your friends?"

"They have gone to the carriages," said Mrs. Taylor, calmly; "but I must go on to that house!"

"Why, woman, you're mad!" exclaimed the second policeman.

"I tell thee, the Lord has commanded me to enter that place this night, and I shall obey Him if I die on the threshold."

"Why, lady, do you know what creatures you'll face?"

"If it is the mouth of the bottomless pit itself, I must go there to rescue a soul. If ye policemen will not accompany me, I shall go there alone. I fear nothing when my Master commands me to go."

"Well, it shan't be said that a lady went where a policeman was afraid," cried the man Ben. "Wait here a moment, me and Dick will go once again and see if we can prepare you a way;" and the policemen turned back towards the loathsome place, from which came the sounds of awful blasphemies and ribald songs. Unknown to the policemen Mrs. Taylor followed them close, and when they reached the door, they found her beside them.

"Open the door!" she calmly commanded.

"You'll be killed if you enter!" they protested.

"Open the door!" was her only answer, and as the policemen forced open the door, a sight met her eyes which made even these men, holding their cocked pistols, quake with fear. One instant, that gray-haired woman stood in that doorway, with eyes uplifted to heaven; the next, she walked boldly into the midst of that crowd of swearing, drunken, fighting men, and knelt down and prayed aloud. At first, her voice was drowned by the oaths and the curses and vile gibes of the besotted wretches, but as one and another became conscious of her presence, their astonishment at her unheard-of temerity silenced them, and for a few seconds the voice of that praying woman was the only sound heard in that evil den. Rising from her knees and opening her eyes, she instantly knew for whom she had been sent to that place. A young girl, pale as death, with terror-dilated eyes and hands clasped in agony sat apart from the crowd of diabolical revellers. Mrs. Taylor quickly crossed the room, grasped the hand of the girl, saying, "My dear, come with me! I was sent for thee."

"I knew God would rescue me some way," whispered the poor girl, trembling with horror; and through the amazed crowd of blear-eyed, filthy, brutal wretches those two pure women passed hand in hand, unharmed, led by Omnipotent power, and guarded by angelic hosts for. "The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear Him and delivereth them."

"I would have sworn you'd be torn to pieces," said the astonished policemen, as they followed Mrs. Taylor and her young charge out of that den of iniquity, where already the orgies of sin had been resumed.

"What is thy name, dear? and why art thou here?" asked Mrs. Taylor of the quaking girl beside her, around whom she had thrown her protecting arm, as she perceived that the terrible suspense and agony the girl had borne had rendered her too weak to walk without help.

"Oh, Mrs. Taylor, the Lord sent you!" sobbed the anguished young lady. "I have been at your meetings, I knew God had heard my prayers for help, as soon as you entered the door. My father is Dr. Wenthorne."

"Why, my dear, I know thy parents well. They are faithful, Christian people. How came thee here?"

"I will tell you. I was engaged to marry a young man with the consent of my parents. I thought he was upright and true. My father has lately lost his property, and since then Jack has seemed somewhat different, I see it now. I know now he was trying to marry me only for money. This evening he asked me to walk. My mother gave her consent, as she had often before. About two hours ago, as Jack and I were taking a stroll, we met a woman whom he introduced as his friend. Just then a man touched him on the shoulder; they talked together a moment, and then Jack said to me:

"'Annie, my friend will take you to her house for a little while. I have some important business I must attend to at once. I will call for you there in an hour.'

"Unsuspecting any evil, I went with the woman, who was middle-aged and modestly dressed, I saw by the light of a gas-jet near by, and it being so dark a night I could not recognize the streets through which we hurriedly passed. When we reached what she called her home, she opened the door, and we entered and before I was aware where I was, I found myself in that awful place where you saw me."

"Poor child! What didst thou do?"

"I sat there praying to God to save me some way. I couldn't see how; but I knew He had all power, and my faith was firm that He would rescue me, and not let those men harm me. I saw then the awful treachery of the man I had trusted. Oh, there he comes!" whispered the frightened girl, as she shrank closer to her protector.

"Never fear, dear! But wait, I must speak to that man," said Mrs. Taylor.

Through the darkness the man was now more plainly seen as the lanterns of the policemen flashed their light across his deceitful face, and he started back, but Mrs. Taylor said in firm tones: "Young man! The Lord has protected the young girl thou didst so basely seek to destroy, and has sent me to rescue her before it was too late. Remember, Almighty God can defeat all the spirits of evil combined. I warn thee to repent of thy sinful life before God cuts thee down in thy infamy. I warn thee to leave this city at once, for I shall put this young girl's brother on thy track to-night, and I give thee just six hours to get out of town, for I must prevent bloodshed if possible, and I know the spirit of the young man whose sister thou hast basely wronged. I could deliver thee up to these policemen at once, but I will give thee this one chance to reform thine evil ways. May the Spirit of God lead thee to repent."

Base as the young man was, he stood trembling and aghast, confronted by truth and purity as manifested in those two women against whom all his diabolical cunning had availed nothing, and he slunk away into the darkness, whether to go on in his infamous crimes or to repent like the thief on the cross, is not known.

The young girl was restored to her parents, and grateful thanks were rendered to Almighty God for her marvelous deliverance.

The policeman, Ben, was converted, declaring "that if faith in God could work such a miracle as that which took place before his own eyes he was bound to get it."

The devoted evangelist went calmly on her consecrated way, confident that she had naught whereof to boast, being a weak, timid woman, but knowing that when a child of God reflects in his or her life the image of the Divine Christ, and by faith, which is the gift of the Holy Spirit, lays claim to the title of his inheritance in the power of Almighty God, which inheritance is offered by the Infinite Father to all his children, then just so much of the Omnipotence of their Heavenly Father will be exercised in their behalf as they shall lay claim to through their title of faith. According to their faith it will be unto them. And that faith is not a blind belief, but an enlightened apprehension of the Omnipotence, Omnipresence and Omniscience of the Infinite Creator, Upholder and Saviour of mankind.

Evil has no power in the presence of omnipotent good. Error has no power in the presence of omniscient truth. Death has no power in the presence of omnipresent life. Human beings have no real power, only as they reflect the image of Infinite power and holiness, as manifested in the Divine Christ, the Way, the Truth and the Life. Then through acceptance of the Lord Jesus Christ, the Divine Son of God, as the renewing power in their own souls, through the enlightenment of the Spirit of God, their faith shall claim an inheritance as God's children, in omnipotent power, and none of the faith-checks signed by the Son of God and presented at the Bank of God's Promises, by believing souls, will ever be dishonored by the Heavenly Father, who has given to His children an inheritance in His infinite power and love.

REFORM FORCES; HOW CAN THEY UNITE?

BY CLARA C. HOFFMAN.

The New York Tribune declares "that this nation pays more for its liquor than for every function of every kind of government, that our liquor bill costs more yearly than the civil service, the army and navy, Congress, including the river, harbor and pension bills, all our wasteful local governments, all national, state, county and local debts—and all the schools in the country."

Here is an economic question of gigantic proportion that quite overshadows tariff and tariff-reform. The legitimate and inevitable outcome of this enormous traffic, in debauched manhood, outraged womanhood and defrauded childhood—in poverty, crime, disease and utter wretchedness is simply beyond human calculation.

Two great political parties have lent themselves willing tools to the liquor monopoly. Nothing is to be hoped from them as parties in the way of reform. The People's party, organized for reform along economic lines, has utterly ignored the greatest question of dollars and cents before the nation to-day. So nothing is to be hoped from the People's party for reform in the drink question.

Most churches have felt compelled by the moral issues involved, to make strong utterance in their eccleciastical assemblies, against the liquor traffic, its support and perpetuation by votes of Christian men. The great M. E. church at its last general Conference said: "No political party has the right to expect, nor ought it to receive the support of Christian men so long as it stands committed to the license policy or refuses to put itself on record in an attitude of open hostility to the saloon." The utterance of the Presbyterian General Assembly was in similar words and to the very same effect. Other denominations have made kindred utterances.

If these churches are honest, if any vital principle of truth and righteousness lies back of these brave, worthy words, then here are the reform forces that, united and aggressive, shall move in solid phalanx on the hosts of iniquity in this country. Seventy-five thousand clergymen and three or four million church members, who are voters, will constitute an army strong enough and influential enough to draw to itself other millions of voters whose names are not on the church books. Besides this vast army of sovereign citizenship, will stand America's uncrowned sovereigns, women whose moral and spiritual force will be mightier than battalions armed to the teeth. No gift of prophecy is needed to foretell results. The blind and stupid, and doubting can see it clearly. Victory would be swift and certain.

This is the hour of destiny to the moral and religious forces of this nation. This is the hour of destiny to the church. If now the church is slow, faltering, faithless, she loses her grip on the conscience of this nation, and she will not regain her hold.

Foolish and futile will be all appeals to political parties committed to the license and liquor policy. One political party, and only one, is pledged to reform, not only as touching the drink question but as touching every wrong and shame that blots and blurs our national escutcheon. The great majority of this party is in and of the church; but in numbers too small to swing these splendid organizations into line as reform forces. It is the shame and weakness of the church that she needs to be swung into line to combat, with union of effort, the hosts of evil. But we face conditions—not theories. The church is not in line. The church is not awake, alert, and united.

What then? We must make direct, emphatic, persistent appeal to the church. We must press the truth home, upon the pulpit, the officials, the pews, the people. We must be fearless—until the Christian conscience of the church is stirred into action, until Christian patriotism rises in its might, as it has risen in the past, as it will rise in the future, to save our nation from the deadly clutch of the drink demon.

HOW MUCH DOES THE NATION PAY FOR DRINK?

BY WILBUR F. COPELAND.

Author of the Handbook of Prohibition Facts.

Some rather wild statements have found their way into print. The facts are sufficiently alarming without overstating them. The estimate given below of the drink bill has been admitted by several liquor papers to be fair and conservative. In fact, the liquor press is accustomed to felicitate itself and to congratulate the country on the growth of so great an "industry."

The drink bill for the year 1891 may be fairly stated, in round numbers, as $1,200,000,000. That is to say, the people of this country pay out each year, directly, that amount for intoxicants.

The method of computing the amount is this: The United States Bureau of Statistics each year publishes an estimate of the amount of spirituous liquors, wines and malt liquors consumed in the United States for the fiscal year, which ends June 30. This official estimate is based on the amount "withdrawn for consumption," as reported by the Internal Revenue Department, plus the amount imported, minus the amount exported. According to this official estimate, there was consumed in 1891, 91,157,565 gallons of spirituous liquors and 977,479,761 barrels of malt liquors. The amount of wine for 1891 is not obtainable, but the amount for 1890 was 28,956,981 gallons. There is no reason to believe that the amount decreased in 1891.

The average retail price of spirituous liquors is probably equal to six dollars a gallon, if not more; of beer, eighteen dollars a barrel; of wine, two dollars a gallon. On this basis the drink bill for 1891 may be stated thus:

91,157,565 gallons of distilled liquors, plus 25 per cent to reduce the 50 per cent proof strength required by the internal revenue laws to 40 per cent, the usual retail strength; less 12½ per cent, the proportion estimated by the United States census (bulletin No. 22), for medicinal, mechanical and other legitimate purposes—@ $6 a gallon,..	$598,221,519
977,479,761 gallons, or 31,531,605 barrels of malt liquors @ $18 a barrel.....	$567,568,890
28,956,981 gallons of wine, @ $2 a gallon....	$57,913,962
Total.....	$1,223,704,371

This estimate does not take into account on the one hand, the fact that much liquor is bought by consumers directly from the manufacturers or otherwise at a less price than we have named as the average retail price; nor on the other hand, the fact that many places sell liquor for much more than the average price named. The one fact will offset the other near enough for all practical purposes.

The magnitude of this sum may be shown more impressively by a few comparisons. For example:

Annual drink bill.....	$1,200,000,000
Aggregate interest-bearing and non-interest-bearing public debt of the United States, not including treasury notes and certificates, Dec. 1, 1891.....	$977,739,986
Aggregate capital of the national banks of the United States in 1891	$660,108,261
Total value of dutiable merchandise imported into the United States in 1891.....	$478,674,844
Total collections of tariff revenue from imports in 1891.....	$219,522,205
Total ordinary expenses of the United States government for all purposes in 1891.....	$365,773,905
Total amount paid for pensions to soldiers, sailors, their families and others in 1891.....	$124,415,951
Total cost of maintaining the War and Navy Departments of the government in 1891.....	$74,833,961
Aggregate loss of property by fire in the United States in 1891....	$131,260,000

The estimate of $1,200,000,000 as the annual drink, it should be distinctly understood, is only the direct cost—the amount, approximately, that passes over the bars of the 200,000 or more liquor-selling establishments in exchange for intoxicants. That the estimate is not too high is shown by the fact that it is allowing only about $6,000 annually as the average business of the saloons and liquor stores of the country. Any person reasonably familiar with the liquor business knows that the amount named would not go far in paying license fees, rent, help, "police protection," political blackmail and the rest.

How much of this $1,200,000,000 is total loss, is a very complex question in which many difficulties are involved. A full discussion of the subject would be impossible in a short article. Some writers regard the revenue paid back into the public treasury as saved from the total loss; others include also the wages paid to labor engaged in the manufacture and sale of liquor, and money paid for materials, as saved from the total loss; still others befuddle the average reader with the statement that the money "goes into circulation," and hence is not a loss. The whole bubble of sophistry explodes when perforated by this one pointed question: "Loss to whom?" If to the consumer, the whole $1,200,000,000 is lost, unless the consumer can be shown to derive some economic benefit.

But the indirect loss not included in these $1,200,000,000—the cost of maintaining police departments, courts, penal institutions, insane asylums, the chief business of all of which is to take care of the victims of drink; the loss of property through drunken carelessness, materials spoiled by drunken workmen, time lost in manufacturing establishments and in many trades where one man's drunkenness may enforce idleness upon twenty sober men; the doctor's bills for sickness caused by drunken exposure and brutality—these and many other items easily run up the cost of the liquor traffic to a sum that is frightful to contemplate.

COLUMBIAN COINS.

BY B. V. CUSHMAN, M. D.

THE TEN THOUSAND DOLLAR BEAUTY.

Columbia is delighted with Uncle Samuel's Christmas gift of five million souvenir coins, whose mint value is $2,500,000. Their practical value is likely to prove much more than double that amount. Col. Elliott F. Shepard's consignment of ten thousand was reputed to be going at three dollars apiece before Christmas. None will be sold for less than one dollar.

The coin is of standard half dollar size and weight bearing upon one side the head of Columbus, according to Lotto's portrait, and upon the other, the Santa Maria in full sail. Beneath the caraval are two supporting hemispheres, the Old and the New World, dividing the figures 14 from 92; while encircling all is the legend, "World's Columbian Exposition, Chicago, 1892." The first coin attempted was a failure owing to a flaw, but the next, which is now the famous "No. 1" turned out in perfection. It was carefully sealed, and with the superintendent of the mint's certificate was delivered to the World's Fair commissioner who waited to receive it, and bear it to President Higinbotham. No half dollar ever attracted so much attention as did this upon its arrival at Treasurer Seeberger's office. After the excitement and admiration had partially subsided, Mr. Higinbotham, holding the souvenir aloft, said: "This coin is sold, gentlemen, to Wyckoff, Seamans and Benedict, of New York, for ten thousand dollars, for which I,"—here the agent of the New York firm handed him a check,—"have received their check. This, gentlemen, is the largest sum ever paid for a single coin in the history of the world." He then set it in its circular silver frame, suspended by a dainty silver chain in the little cubical glass case prepared for it, which was then securely sealed, while three cheers went up "for the Remington people who had the courage to offer ten thousand dollars for a Columbian coin." A multitude of Manhattan's sins both of omission and commission should be covered by that transaction.

The other prize coins are: Nos. 400, 1492 and 1892. They are still in the possession of the treasurer. Vice-president Ryan has received a consignment of five thousand, to accommodate, he says, those who want to purchase single coins, or a limited number. A room in the Rand-McNally building has been fitted up like a small bank, with a force of clerks to fill the orders of those investing in the Columbian half dollars.

MONTANA'S SILVER STATUE.

The design for the much discussed figure of Justice is finally ready for the moulders. It represents a woman poised upon a globe upborne by an eagle with wings spread. Miss Ada Rehan is the model, and when done in silver she will measure eight feet from top to toe. She holds a scepter in her right hand. and in the left a pair of scales at even balance. The pose is vivid, as if she were just scaling the summit of the globe. This western maid has cast off the historic bandage that blindfolded her predecessors, and looks out open-eyed upon the wrongs of her race. The base of the statue is to be of ribbon-rock, gold-bearing quartz and silver appearing on the surface. The plinth of gold, valued at two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, forms an eyry for the eagle and his double burden of earth and woman. It will be the gem of the mineral exhibits and Montana may well be proud to give it the choicest spot in her building. A guard of four Montana men, dressed as mountaineers, carrying Winchesters, will be constantly on duty to prevent marauders from chipping off fragments of the soft but costly substance of the silver maid. This is diminutive, a mere paper weight compared with which stands just inside the archway entrance of the Grand Basin. Here is a woman sixty-five feet tall with form of perfect symmetry, every line and curve, every length and girth being in accord with the old Greek sculptor's criterion of proportion. She stands upon a pedestal built in the water which lifts her thirty-five feet, so her outlook upon the Exposition buildings is from the stately height of about one hundred feet, as she faces the Administration building, with hands uplifted. In the right a globe is held, upon which an eagle lightly rests with wings outstretched. The left arm and hand, extended above her head, carries a pole and liberty cap. Heavy drapery falls in close folds to her feet, and on the bosom rests an eagle. Her crown is a diadem of electric lights. The modern "tailor" would find her "hard to fit" and "impossible to give a stylish figure." But there she will stand, silently yet eloquently rebuking every woman of us with a "waist line," and mutely encouraging the which the National Council of Women urge all women everywhere to adopt as their costume for visiting the Exposition. A flippant representative of the secular press declares that "every male member of the community will regard this action of the Council as the most important step taken in connection with the World's Fair." It demands a dress sufficiently short to enable the wearer to go down stairs without the risk of becoming a source of danger to the person following behind. "Herein lies its chief interest to every man" quoth aforesaid journalist.

It is altogether fitting that Illinois, the great maize state, should have a

CORN KITCHEN.

There will be kept on exhibition one hundred different toothsome viands made from Indian corn. If some of the good cooks of our acquaintance "down in the state" come here to exercise their arts for the instruction and delectation of the world, farmers will find better market for their corn hereafter. The housewives of this state are showing much pride in their general kitchen exhibit. There are plenty of domesticated women in Illinois, although her women doctors, lawyers, preachers and financiers are more talked about.

DELICATESSEN.

The genuine "greatest delicacy of the season" is prepared and according to late advices at World's Fair headquarters, now awaits shipment from Lanark county, Canada. Every cow in the county contributes three days' labor and her good will. The total "pan-out" is a cheese weighing twenty-two thousand pounds. It is a mammoth disk six feet thick. Its Welsh rarebit capacity is estimated at five hundred thousand.

THE WORLD'S CONGRESS AUXILIARY

is in charge of one of the most valuable adjuncts of this great convocation. Mrs. Charles Henrotin reports much interest among New York philanthropists and people of letters. Mr. William E. Dodge, president of the International Christian Alliance, is confident that thousands of persons will come from abroad to attend the religious congresses in September. That the Authors' Congress in July will draw the pen people in large numbers is guaranteed by the fact that Edmund C. Stedman and Mr. Johnson of the Century are working hard for its success.

THE EVANGELISTIC DEPARTMENT AND THE CHURCHES.

An Important Appeal.

BY ELIZABETH W. GREENWOOD.

World's and National Superintendent.

To each Evangelistic Superintendent of a National, State, County or Local W. C. T. U.:

DEAR SISTERS:—In addition to the usual work of the Evangelistic Department, outlined in my former circulars, it is my earnest desire to secure this winter a very widespread arousing of the churches through the presentation of truth as to the evils of intemperance and the need of temperance work.

Over twenty-five millions of people gather each Lord's Day in the churches of our land. Some are aroused and interested; many are still indifferent. Hence, I believe, no greater work can be done than through a concerted movement to arouse public sentiment in the churches of the nation. An aroused church means the speedy removal of the evil.

which is now being successfully tried by your superintendent in her own city of Brooklyn is as follows: Let each state evangelistic superintendent secure copies of this circular from the National superintendent and forward one to each county and local evangelistic superintendent in her state.

The local evangelistic superintendent should at once present the matter to her W. C. T. U., securing the indorsement of the union. A letter should then be addressed to each pastor of her city or town as follows:

LETTER TO PASTOR.

Rev.....

Dear Sir:

The "Woman's Christian Temperance Union," of ....., through its Evangelistic Department, aims this winter for a special series of temperance meetings in our churches, in harmony with such effort throughout our nation. Would you be willing to give your pulpit one Sunday, morning or evening, during the month of February or March, 1893, for the presentation of the temperance theme, under the auspices of the local W. C. T. U., either preaching the sermon yourself or allowing us to arrange an exchange by which some other pastor shall present the theme in your pulpit as you present it in his? If a lady speaker is preferred we shall be glad to make this arrangement. Our idea is a general and concerted presentation of gospel temperance truth by pastors of our town and the entire nation during the present season.

Will you coöperate with us in this effort? Please address an answer as soon as possible to the writer, fixing the date in February or March when such a sermon shall be preached. We aim only for an arousing of public sentiment, yet shall be grateful if any churches feel inclined to give at this special service the whole or half of a collection for our W. C. T. U. work. We shall be still more grateful if at these services, and at other times, our pastors will pray for the temperance cause and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

In behalf of the union.

Mrs.....

Address.....

ARRANGEMENTS.

When the reply to this letter has been received, arrangements should be completed at once. When possible, let printed or written facts be sent to the pastors, in reference to the work of the National and your local W. C. T. U.

In my Brooklyn campaign a leaflet has been issued setting forth our local work and also the summary of our National W. C. T. U. work by W. T. Stead, editor, in the October Review of Reviews. When possible, temperance leaflets might be distributed at the door at close of service.

The week preceding each sermon let these special temperance services be advertised as under your auspices and a large committee appointed from the union to be present. A very careful record should be kept of the number and character of these services and reported to your state superintendent that she may report to the National superintendent.

AN EXHORTATION.

Dear evangelistic superintendent, will you not receive this appeal with enthusiasm and push this work with unremitting zeal, that the months of February and March, 1893, may witness a national arousing in our churches? What the results may be no human mind can estimate. The influence will be felt in the home, church, society and at the polls.

Let there be special vigilance on the part of each superintendent to guard our devotional hour from eleven to twelve a. m., in each state and county convention.

Increasing experience but intensifies the conviction that where this practice is strictly adhered to, no matter how pressing the crowd of business, delegates have received unusual help and inspiration. Towns and cities in which they gather have been spiritually stirred, and the wheels of our great temperance machine have run without friction. We aim, for this year, 1893, and in all the future for a general observance of this hour in every World's, National, state and county convention. "They who most honor the Spirit, are those whom the Spirit most honors."

When this hour is placed at the opening of the convention, either morning or afternoon, it is practically a failure. Confusion abounds; reverent worship is impossible; officers and committees are seldom present; citizens cannot attend. An impression is given that this service is of less importance than the routine of business, and the hour is robbed of its power.

The tendency of all great congregations is to lose the devotional spirit. In many of our religious gatherings, the devotional hour becomes almost a misnomer and sometimes a burlesque, while the daily papers report the ministers as in the lobbies, and a mere handful in the devotional meetings. Let us keep our altar fires brightly burning.

This circular-appeal can be secured from the National superintendent for sixty cents per one hundred copies Will each state evangelistic superintendent order at once, copies sufficient to send one to each county and local superintendent in her state? Thus our efforts will be in harmony and she will save the labor and expense of printing her own circular.

A WOMAN'S YEAR—ENGLISH PROGRESS.

BY WARNER SNOAD.

President English Women's Progressive Society.

Eighteen ninety-two has been essentially a woman's year. Its greatest triumph is, of course, the bill passed by the Legislative Council of New Zealand granting women's suffrage; but at home the woman's cause is not standing still. The University of St. Andrews has opened its doors to women, and despite the strictures of Sir J. Chrichton Browne another fortress has gracefully surrendered. St. Andrews has not only determined henceforward to admit women to any class or classes they may select, with a view to graduation in arts, science, theology or medicine, but has also taken what, if we may judge by the action of some of our own universities, is the still more generous step of offering to its women students a share in its pecuniary benefits. In the year 1893 a sum of upwards of £30,000 will become available for bursaries or scholarships at the University, "one half of which is reserved for women students exclusively." St. Andrews, moreover, emphasizes its attitude toward the medical education of woman by the further statement that "those who intend to enter the medical profession will have a prior claim to these bursaries, although they are tenable while arts and science classes are being attended.

St. Andrews is not the only triumph. At a meeting of the council of the Royal Geographical Society it was unanimously agreed to admit women as Fellows on the same terms as men. Admission to the Royal Geographical Society means another opportunity, another door open for women and one not to be lightly estimated.

Yet another important event of the past year occurred at the proceedings of the British Medical Association, the extraordinary general meeting called for the purpose of considering the motion of Dr. J. H. Galton: "That Article IV. of the articles of the Association be altered by expunging the words, 'No female shall be eligible for election as a member of the Association.' The disabling clause it was proposed to expunge had been added to the original articles by vote of a large majority of the members in 1878. Thus the barrier by which in 1878, 3,000 men opposed the possible admission of the eight English women then eligible for membership, has been leveled as useless in 1892, when there are in Great Britain 140 registered women physicians, and "more coming" from the schools successfully established for them in London, Edinburgh, Glasgow and Dublin.

Another striking proof of the growth of opinion upon the woman question is the important position assigned to them at the Church Congress at Folkestone. Of equal significance although in an entirely different class and groove is the decision of the Forester's Club and Friendly Society to admit women upon the same terms as men. This decision although apparently of trifling importance compared with St. Andrews and the Geographical Society, is in its way quite as striking a proof of the tendency of the times; for the Foresters represent the opinions of an enormous mass of working men, and to allow women to enter their hitherto jealously guarded clubs is a distinct step.

Thus upon the one hand men are admitting women's intellectual power and capacity for scientific research, and upon the other their right to the common necessaries of life, not as inferiors, but as equals. The very fact that these reforms are at the extremes of the social scale is in itself encouraging, if we remember the old adage of burning the candle at both ends. Opponents of progress may rail as they will, but we who work for women, may of a truth take courage and go forward. All honor to the chivalrous men who help us.

SIR JAMES SAWYER'S ADDRESS AT THE GREAT BIRMINGHAM GATHERING.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—It is conceded that Birmingham, England's third largest city, has been from time immemorial the center of political life. The platform of Birmingham's historic Town Hall on Friday, December 9, presented a magnificent demonstration to the immense strides that temperance sentiment has made in Great Britain. Within those precincts the voices of England's eminent men have rung out in speeches that made history; John Bright's sonorous tones fell like measured music on the listening ears of the men of his generation and moulded their thoughts for peace and justice; Gladstone's fiery and persuasive eloquence has turned the current of public opinion into the channels of a wider freedom for the oppressed; Randolph Churchill and Chamberlain and a host of other politicians have passed across that stage. The first notes of Mendelssohn's great Elijah were sounded there, and the magnificent chorus of that most splendid composition was there given to the English world.

The vast meeting that assembled recently within its walls was second to none in importance and significance. The temperance cause is now recognized as one of the most vital questions of the hour. Reform has come within the range of practical politics, and it is a subject which Mr. Gladstone has lately characterized as one no politician dare ignore. It was not, however, to meet the leaders in the House of Commons for which that vast assembly gathered, but to greet the two women, who, in the old world and the new are endeavoring to solve the mighty problem of the world's greatest ill, to rally their forces around the standard of home protection. Sir James Sawyer, one of England's nobles, distinguished as a medical authority, after an eloquent welcome to your and our leaders, made a thoughtful address which deserves preservation in the scientific literature that is throwing electric signal-flashes into common life and into the temperance cause. The following is an extract from

THE ADDRESS.

"As a physician and as a citizen I deplore the evils which are wrought amongst our people by the alcoholic poison. I deplore these evils in common, I believe, with all physicians, and in common, I hope, with all thoughtful citizens. We know that our jails, our workhouses, our hospitals, our lunatic asylums and our asylums for idiots receive a large proportion of their inmates in consequence of the destruction which alcohol works on men's minds and on their morals, their bodies and their fortunes.

"Will you allow me to impress upon you a great and particular danger which the drinking of alcohol brings with it? Medical science, by the aid of microscopic research, has made great progress during the last ten years in the knowledge of the causes and cure of many common diseases. We have learned that many diseases owe their origin and characteristics to minute micro-organisms which come to us in the food we eat, the fluids we drink, the air we breathe, the clothes we wear or the things we touch. These micro-organisms find their way into the blood and tissues of the living human body and multiply there, and each kind of them produces in that body its own characteristic and special disease. There is one kind of micro-organism for typhoid fever, another for erysipelas, another for consumption, and so on. Each produces its like and its own and no other, just as a cabbage comes from a cabbage and a cocoanut from a cocoanut.

"Now, how is it, seeing that these noxious micro-organisms are so numerous and so prevalent that we do not oftener fall victims to them? We have found out the reason. There are within our bodies, in our blood and in our tissues, numberless little cells which protect us. These cells are known as leucocytes. When a healthy leucocyte meets a disease producing micro-organism, when this little guardian of our health and of our lives meets his nemy in the gate it becomes very active to destroy it; it spreads itself out, encompasses the micro-organism, takes it within itself, and consumes it.

"We have found out, too, that many agents have a paralyzing action upon leucocytes and destroy their power of dealing with the micro-organisms of disease in the way I have described. One of these agents is alcohol. So you may be sure that if you are in the way of infective disease, your risk of taking that disease is increased if your body be in the least degree under the influence of alcohol."

It may be appropriately added that the above cause is cited by other famous scientists for the frequent fatal result of disease in an habitual drinker.

A WORD FROM AN INTREPID SOUL.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—For six weeks past I have been hoping to write to you through these columns, but that last home-coming was so distressingly painful that I have been unable to write. I ought not to have expected to rally more quickly, since this summer's work was more than double that of 1891. My careful physician put his Scotch-Irish foot down on all visitors, and all work, and I was truly shut in from the 20th of October to the 23d of November, when so much pressure was brought from all sides for help in the Thanksgiving work that I had my shutters opened and took up active life again. The calls of these two weeks convince me that nervous prostration requires more than one month's rest.

My pastor and physicians have been trying to teach me that a soul cannot work without a body, at least in this world, and that I ought to consent to let go all other interests and care awhile for just the needs of this feeble body. I have been trying to be an apt scholar, but after these days and nights of inactivity and restlessness the conclusion of the whole matter with me is that I would rather be "killed all the day long" with work for others, and die to self, than to live useless and idle, with so many golden opportunities for service slipping by every hour.

In the very midst of those quiet, suffering days came your letter of loving greeting "by vote of the convention," and you can readily realize the joy it brought, that it was like "cool waters to a thirsty soul." How sweet the courtesies which spring from love, how priceless the blessings of friendship!

Christmas has passed again with all its multiform possibilities of giving pleasure and teaching of the dear Christ-child.

The very atmosphere surrounding the flower mission department teemed with tender plans of cheer for the sick, help for the needy, and ministries of all sorts for lonely hearts.

Wouldn't it be lovely to be able to follow you on your errands everywhere and have a share in all your good times? You remember Mrs. Whitney says, "There is a great song forever singing and we're all parts and notes of it if we will just let God put us in tune." Therefore,

"If you have a kind word, say it,
It stills the sigh, awakes the song.
Can you do a kind deed, do it,
It lifts the burdens, makes hearts strong."

No one knows better than I how precious are kind words and expressions of love, for no one had ever more blessed, beautiful things to come into life.

I wish I could give each one of you who had part in this last surprise a little conception of my appreciation of the exquisite floral album which you helped Miss Emma Swartz and her sisters to make for me. A few weeks agone I received a letter from her saying: "Will you please accept from some of the World's white-ribboners, and from myself personally, a little souvenir of wild 'flowers' in the form of a floral album as a slight token of our love and sympathy for you and our appreciation of your beautiful ministry of flowers. I hope it will be a surprise and a pleasure to you."

Just imagine what a surprise, as (like that about the music box you sent me on the fiftieth birthday) I never had heard a whisper of it, and if you can do so, realize the pleasure it is to have flowers from almost every state and territory in our land, and from Burmah, Hawaiian Islands, Nova Scotia, Sandwich Islands, South Africa, Jerusalem and many other foreign countries. Every page is a picture, with its treasures daintily pressed, retaining their colors and arranged with an artist's touch. These are enclosed in a large, pink celluloid cover, exquisitely painted and trimmed with bows of white ribbon.

A young friend from St. Louis has taken the measurements that she may have a glass box made in which to keep it, and it is "a joy forever." Far more precious than the tangible gifts is that which lies behind, and the marvel is that she should have thought me worthy of all this tender thought and busy work. That you should have taken such infinite pains to make me happy humbles me, while it lifts my soul up to God who gave me such friends.

I cannot express myself now; wait until we learn our heavenly language and then I will be able to tell you what I feel. Our prayers are for both of our dear ones in their absence beyond the sea.

Faithfully and gratefully your sister.

Louisville, Ky. JENNIE CASSEDAY.

THE PERSECUTED JEWS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The secretary of the Society for Relief of Persecuted Jews, in a private letter, sends the following account of the hardships of the oppressed Israelites which will interest all humane souls:

DEC. 6, 1892.

In Roumania many hundreds of families have been evicted illegally by order of Prime Minister, against the wish of the peasants among whom they have lived, and are now seeking shelter wherever they can. Respectable, superior looking men are suddenly beggared, turned out of their houses and farms with leases unexpired, the doors locked against them, all their property, furniture, clothes, cows, etc., seized, their debtors forcibly stopped in the very act from paying their just, legal debts—the wives and sons cruelly beaten in many cases; some have died of the brutalities inflicted.

The effect of Mr. Scott Moncrieff's presence amid all this and the publication in the Times Daily News of some of the facts, have, we hope, gained a respite till spring for those not yet turned out (snow is on the ground) on condition that they sign a paper stating their intention voluntarily to go next April. Go they must, but it is under compulsion. Mr. Scott Moncrieff writes his heart aches to see the misery and despair—to hear of the horrible beatings and cruelties.

As to Russia, the Jews everywhere are in daily terror, hunted, maltreated, ruined in business, expulsions continual and families separated. The expulsions from Moscow are expected to be resumed now in the Russian winter, and the remnant mercilessly driven forth. To-day's Telegraph reports some hundreds of fugitives at Konigsberg, in "greatest imaginable misery," many even without necessary clothing. These poor creatures were expelled from Russia two months ago, reached Wamberg, failed to get off to America (because of cholera), were sent back to Russia. There they were refused entrance and are at Konigsberg. Mr. R. Scott Moncrieff found Salonica, Smyrna and Constantinople, full of the miserable refugees—despairing, starving, but given at least a refuge and a little bread, by humanity of the Turkish government. More have been admitted into Palestine and our agents implore aid now that winter rains and winds and snows are before them, so that as last winter, lives may at least be saved. Our fund is now low and we are doing what we can to make known the indescribable need, in trust that help will be given. We have a few donations towards the land-purchase fund. But bread, water, clothes and shelter are first necessities. E. A. FINN, Sec.

TEMPERANCE WORKS IN THE CAPITAL OF BULGARIA.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Your readers will doubtless be interested to hear occasionally a word or two about the temperance work in Sophia, the capital of Bulgaria. You have had letters from Mrs. Locke, from Philippopolis, but I think that you have never had anything from our city.

I am a recent comer here. After completing my studies in the United States, where I had been for over ten years, I came here at the call of the only Bulgarian Evangelical church in Sophia, a city of over thirty-five thousand inhabitants. I arrived here the 20th of August last, and immediately assumed the pastoral duties of the church which had been made vacant a little less than a year ago by the death of its beloved pastor, Rev. N. T. Boyadjieff.

I found a well organized temperance band in the church, which is the best monument that my predecessor has here in Sophia. There are, indeed, many other things by which Mr. Boyadjieff will be long remembered, but above all is the temperance work which he inaugurated here. He organized the band, there being, I think, only six young men at first willing to sign the pledge and become members, Mr. Boyadjieff continuing to be their president until his death. It is just about one year since this organization took place. When I came here I found about ninety members. At the first business meeting of the band which I attended the project for a Bulgarian Temperance Union was discussed, the idea having originated here. Now copies of the constitution for such a union are sent to all the bands in Bulgaria, of which there are about twenty. As soon as their views in regard to the matter are obtained we shall proceed to a permanent organization of such a union. We number now one hundred and thirty in the crusade against intemperance.

At the first of our meetings I was requested to give an account of the temperance movement in America, which I did very briefly and they were intensely interested and encouraged in their work. I am now giving, at each meeting, the substance of one chapter of a book which I am reading entitled, "Broken Fetters." It is a history of the temperance movement. As we do not have yet any literature to speak of on the subject, they listen with great interest to this reading.

In the evening, December 3, we held a public meeting in the interests of the temperance cause in Sophia. The church was crowded to its utmost capacity, making an audience of about six hundred people, the majority of whom were liquor drinkers. Many temperance songs were sung and such topics as the following discussed: "We must work against intemperance," "The influence of the saloon on the home," "Our duty as a nation," "The competition of woman with the saloon-keeper," and "The loss and gain of total abstinence." For two hours and a half the undivided attention of the audience was held, and at the close of the meeting twenty-one persons signed the pledge and joined the band. The universal sentiment was that more such meetings ought to be held. We expect to hold several this winter. If any one has temperance literature to spare it will be gratefully received.

The capital of Bulgaria, like the capitals of all other countries, is a city of officials. Most of these are young men. The saloons are numerous and occupy the best corners of the streets. They are all built under ground and bear the common name, tunnels. These tunnels are dens of iniquity where fat salaries are squandered and many women and children are deprived of the plainest home comforts. MARCO N. POPOFF.

LITTLE QUESTIONERS.

BY ERNEST FREESON.

In need of rest, near twilight hour,
The work of day well done,
We found the steps a resting place,
A stepping-stone for more than fun
For children all aglee.

My "fairy pet" picked choice of flowers
For button-hole bouquets,
First put them in, then took them out,
Tried hard so many winsome ways
To please me and obey.

One tiny flower was strangely new;
My answers would not satisfy:
"See there, it looks and nods at you,
Who taught this lovely rosebud how
To dress so daintily?"

"Our Father above, whose light and love
Shines down on us, does all the while
Dress up the flowers from out the dust:
This op'ning bud is but a smile
From Mother Nature's wrinkled face:
We little know, can only trust
The God of all, my child."

Casting an eager, wistful glance
Along the hall, with scarce a chance
Of seeing through,—"Master-twin" soon caught
A glimpse of some dark form;
Quick as thought, the words were out,
"Look! look! Somebody on the hallway floor!
See there, a lonely stranger fast asleep!"
Twin looked so keen, inquiringly,
In whispers, earnest plead,
"Come, sister, come, let's go and see
If we can wake that sleepy head!"
By careful touch and gentle call
They found it would not wake at all:
(What seemed so real was shadow only.)
Downcast, they turned about, as if to say,
"To know brings low, fond fancies."

Ah, what are older thinkings here
But shadow-thoughts, thrown out,
So like the dark-clad stranger
Found sleeping on the floor;
Real substance in appearance,
Resemblance, nothing more—
Till some inwrought experience
First opens wide the door
Of heart, of mind, of soul,
Toward light divine.

Brave, earnest questioners—
My Hopeful Joy, Gladena May—
You can find the truest answers
Child-like trusting day by day.

BOLTING THE CAUCUS.

BY WILLIAM FUTHEY GIBBONS.

"Bettah not go in dere, honey!"

"No. 26. Isn't this Senator Blunt's room?"

"Yes, but de senahtah's powerful busy jist now. He done tole me he couldn't see nobody, 'cept on impohtant business."

"I think he would see me. I wish you would tell him, please, that Ethel Wood, Mr. James Martin Wood's daughter, wants to see him a minute on important business."

A moment later the senator glanced up from the pile of letters he was looking through to say rather irritably, "Well, Sam, what now? Be quick!"

"A little girl wants to see you, sah, on impohtant business, she says," and Sam smiled as he presented the daintily engraved card Ethel had sent in.

"Who is Ethel Wood, I wonder?" said the senator, pulling out his handsome gold stop-watch.

"She said she was Mistah James Mahtin Wood's daughter, sah. She's only a little girl, sah."

"Tell her I can see her for just five minutes."

Ethel was not at all scared, as she expected to be, when Sam opened the door to show her into the great senator's presence. With very little hesitation she told him what she wanted.

"Papa brought me along because the doctor said I needed rest from school. On the way down to the capital I asked him what he was going to do here, and he said that the League had sent him to see you and some of the other men about some law, I think it was the Davis law he called it. Anyhow he told me it was to make it so that the folks could regulate the saloons."

"Did your father send you here?" asked the senator, looking a little annoyed; for he remembered now that he had refused to see his old classmate, James Wood, on the ground of pressing engagements.

Ethel's face was so honest that he could not help believing her when she said, "No, sir; he doesn't know I came." Then, seeing that the senator did not want to talk, but busied himself with biting the ivory paper-cutter, Ethel went on to talk about the Davis Bill. "I wanted to tell you about Jim. If it would shut up the saloons, I think it would be a good thing for poor Jim. Jim is the man who cuts the grass in our yard, and plants the flower beds in the spring. He used to be an awful drunkard once, and one time while his wife was sick he got drunk, and she died of pneumonia. But he's trying to keep sober now. Only sometimes he says the temptation is one too many for him. You know in Horton where we live they make all the saloons stay on the side of the railroad where Jim lives. And Jim has to pass 'em every one, before he can get up town to his work. I like Jim so much. He mended my tricycle when it got broken, and he's a real nice fellow. Only I wish he wouldn't ever drink. I know you don't believe in saloons, Senator Blunt; so won't you please get the men to have this law to let folks shut 'em up? It would be so much better for poor Jim. I know I mustn't stay long nor bother you, but I thought the men would do this much for Jim, if you'd only tell 'em about him."

The hot, stuffy Senate Chamber had never before seemed so uncomfortable to Senator Blunt. The long speeches were uninteresting. Nobody paid any attention to them; with a few exceptions, the members of the Senate were doing anything but listening. The only persons, outside the galleries, who seemed to be taking any interest in what was said were the shorthand reporters. One of these had left his own desk and taken his seat beside the speech-maker.

But in the gallery there was one listener who never took her eyes off the man who was speaking. Senator Blunt saw that she did not understand the arguments which the gentleman from Sussex was using, but in an indistinct way she saw that he was speaking for the Bill. When the dry, wordy speech was at last ended, the senator saw her look at him as if she expected that the man who represented her father's district would speak.

Now there was a movement in the front of the chamber, and the clerks went through the usual routine before calling the roll to decide whether or not the Bill should become a law. Ethel leaned over to her father and asked what it meant. The senator saw her face light up and her body quiver with suppressed excitement when she knew that within the next few minutes the question would be decided. He wished that he had not been present when the Bill was to be voted on. A few weeks before the senators of his party had met in caucus to decide what attitude their party should take towards the Bill. Then it had been declared that if the Davis Bill became a law through the help of their votes there would be danger that at the next election their party might be defeated. But from Senator Blunt's district there had been pouring letters and petitions asking him to vote for the Bill. Ethel's face was now turned full upon him, like a final beseeching appeal to separate himself from his party. Personally the senator was not a bad man, although not, as he said himself, "a temperance crank." But he knew that failure on his part to support his party's measures at the capital might mean that the party would not help him to reëlection in the close district which he represented. On the other hand, perhaps the right in the case was on the side of the Bill. There were doubtless many men like Ethel's Jim.

While he pondered, the presiding officer had tapped the desk with his gavel and the calling of the roll had begun. "Allen?" "Aye!" "Andrews?" Aye!" "Baker?" "Aye!"

Senator Blunt knew how they would vote; they belonged to the opposite party. If his own name had only come a little further down the roll, then it would not have been so hard. But for him, a leader of his party, to start what might be a stampede,—could he do it? The clerk was coming to his name soon.

"Beggs?" "No!"

Blunt would be called next. Ethel's face, the pile of letters—yes, he dared do it!

"Blunt?" "Aye!"

A little flutter of excitement stirred the chamber. Several men of his party stopped talking and fixed their eyes on his face. Senator Blunt tried to look unconcerned; he took up his pen and pretended to write a letter, while the rest of the roll was called. What he really did was to keep account of the votes as they were shouted out from the various parts of the house. Before the last name had been called, he saw that the Bill had been carried. He dropped the pen and looked toward the gallery to see Ethel's face. When the clerk read out the number of those who had voted for the Bill and the number of those who had voted against it, the senator saw her give one quick look at her father. He smiled and nodded down at her to assure her that what they wished for had been accomplished. As she and her father left the Senate Chamber she looked back once more, smiling radiantly at Senator Blunt, like an approving conscience.

In the leading paper of Horton on the next morning the following comment appeared:

"The Davis Bill has finally passed the Senate and will doubtless become a law. Up to the last moment its fate was uncertain. The break occurred when the senator from Westmoreland recorded his vote for the Bill. Seven other senators who had been kept in place heretofore by the caucus whip followed Senator Blunt's lead, thus securing a majority of three for the Bill. This action of the Senate is a long step in the direction of good government, and we congratulate the people of the commonwealth on the prospect that the Davis Bill will become a law."

From another point of view the following dispatch was written:

"Through the unexpected treachery of Senator Blunt and seven other senators that political monstrosity, known as the Davis Bill, has passed the Senate. There is slender hope that it will be vetoed by the governor. In spite of the action of the party caucus four weeks ago these gentlemen have seen fit to vote for the Bill. How these caucus-bolters and pledge-breakers will settle with their constituencies remains to be seen. The opinion expressed by your correspondent when the Bill was first introduced was that if supported by us it would cost us several thousand votes next November. The odium attached to the passage of the Bill attaches to these recreant senators alone. If the gentlemen who have voted for the Bill wish to be thrown overboard the party does not object to their playing Jonah."

AROUND THE EVENING LAMP.

BY FRANCES E. WILLARD.

As you sit around the evening lamp can you not resolve that you will commit to memory at least a verse a day from the best poets? I shall never cease to be thankful to Prof. William P. Jones, my earliest preceptor in the Woman's College in Evanston, who asked all of us girls to form this habit. Indeed, he made it a rule for his rhetoric class, and would give us scraps that he had cut from the newspaper of the day, and say, "Learn that; it will be a gem laid up in the casket of your mind." This became so much a habit that I have now pinned to my bureau a little collection containing seven of the best sonnets ever written, some of which I am committing to memory, and upon others I am refreshing the knowledge I already had. Goethe said that a civilized person ought every day to hear a little good music, see a fine picture and learn a few words from some reasonable mind. Now we all have the landscape of great nature, and the wonder of the sky, the greatest sight on which human eyes have ever gazed, and we may all make music to the rhythm and harmony of our own lives, even if we cannot hear an instrument. Most of us could hum or whistle some sweet tune of the home or sanctuary, and as for books or papers, they are as thick as the leaves of Vallombrosa. By the way, that expression reminds me; as you read it, did it occur to you who said it first, and where Vallombrosa is, and why one should speak of the leaves of Vallombrosa? My observation is that the average mind goes around such a quotation as the foot goes around a stone in the path, regarding it as a sort of interruption to be got away with, and I should classify twenty young persons by their attitude toward such an item as that coming up in the midst of their reading or conversation. There is an inward pain I have often called "the sorrow of the mind." It is like a hurt, a blow on the cheek. I have had it ten thousand thousand times with my two thousand pupils, in seeing how they did not fasten with alert and delighted attention upon some such saying injected into the reading or conversation in which they were participating. A teacher watches for the eye that lights, for the lips that ask the question, "What does that mean?" for the hand that turns instinctively toward dictionary or encyclopedia to make the brain, which that hand serves, master ever thereafter of that saying. Thus each one may keep good company, for the noblest people are in books, and I have noticed that those who have followed this course are the true aristocracy, and the whole world is open to them. Carlyle was a Scotch peasant, but he kept such good company that Queen Victoria sent for him, offering to give him the title of nobleman, which he declined, feeling that he had always been a nobleman in his own right. He understood so little of the manners at court that when presented to the Queen, after speaking with her a few minutes, being tired, he said, "Let us sit down, madam," whereat the courtiers were ready to faint at his presumption. But the Queen was great enough for the emergency, and gave a gesture that seated all her puppets in a moment.

THE ORCHARD PARTY.

BY MYRA GOODWIN PLANTZ.

"It's all nonsense about cider making people drunk," said Fred, with all the positiveness of fourteen. "Uncle Ben makes it on his farm every year and he's a good man. If I have to give up sweet cider to send my name to the World's Fair, it can't go."

"Cider tastes so good I wonder if it really makes people drunk," said his sister Minnie.

"I can answer that with a true story from my early life," replied Grandma, and the children came to her eagerly for they all enjoyed Grandma's, "When I was a little girl."

"We lived in town as you do, and we, too, had an uncle in the country. Uncle John had a large orchard and it was the greatest treat of the year to visit him during apple time. The air was fragrant with the odor of Rambos, juicy Northern Spies, Pippins and Baldwins. The trees were beautiful, bending with golden and crimson fruit. There was as much of a holiday over apple gathering as the Germans make harvesting the grapes on the Rhine.

"The neighbor boys were hired to pick the finest apples and lay them carefully in barrels, while little boys picked up the windfalls that covered the ground. The best of these were taken to town in wagons and the poorer ones to the cider mill.

"Part of Uncle John's business was selling sweet cider and vinegar, so he had a large press run by a horse. At the mill the apples were dumped into the mill and ground, rotten apples, worms and all, except when auntie prepared some apples for her own cider."

"Worms!" cried Fred.

"Of course; farmers have no time to stop for worms in cider, nor can they afford to grind up good apples, so cider is always flavored with worm juice."

The children made wry faces over this bit of information.

"Besides watching the pickers, climbing trees, eating delicious apples and sucking sweet cider through straws, we children enjoyed the bustle inside. There were apple bees in the evening when the young folks came in and pealed apples for apple butter and drying. The girls used to throw the long apple peel over their heads and the letter it formed on the floor was the supposed initial of their future husband's name. We liked to watch auntie stir the great brass kettle of spicy apple-butter, and we had frequent tastes in our little saucers. We liked, too, stringing pieces of apples to hang up to dry. One lovely September day auntie said, 'If you children will keep out of the way while I'm baking you can run over and ask the Smith children to spend the afternoon here. You can have a little party in the orchard. I'll make some little pumpkin pies and apple turnovers and ginger-cakes, and if you are real good Eliza can make you some molasses candy.'

"We were delighted and lost no time in inviting our friends. In fact, we were so afraid we would worry auntie and lose our treat we bothered Mrs. Smith until we heard uncle's dinner horn, and the Smith children were on hand by the time we had finished our dinner. We had a fine time playing hide and seek in the barn and romping in the orchard. There we spread our party when the hired man brought out auntie's big basket of good things. She hated our drinking so much cider so she put in a bottle of creamy milk. But Uncle John was not so particular, so he told us to go to the mill and get cider for our feast. He meant the sweet juice running from the press, but that was warm and tasteless. We found some in a barrel near, just snappy enough for our liking, so we sucked that awhile and took a tin pail full to our party. After eating and drinking we all felt sleepy and tired. 'Let us go to the barn and rest on the hay,' said Johnnie Smith, and we were all glad to do that. I was too dizzy and sick to get as far as the house. An hour or two later they rang the bell for us to come for supper but we did not respond. Then they called and began hunting us. The men, after supper, joined in the search even in the woods and by the river, and by eight o'clock both my uncle's family and Mr. and Mrs. Smith were nearly frantic over our disappearance. About nine, Jake, the hired man, went up in the loft to throw down the hay he had forgotten in the search. There he stumbled on a heap of five sleeping children. We were all sleeping a drunken sleep, and when we were taken into the house we were as sick and foolish as any old man who had become drunk on whisky."

"Oh, Grandma!" cried the children, "you really drunk?"

"Yes, and 'John, who afterwards became your grandfather, was even in a worse condition. Both families were horrified. They had often seen men the worse for drinking cider but to have their own children drunk was another thing. It made a temperance man of Uncle John and we children wrote cider on the first pledge we signed, which did not happen to include that dangerous drink."

"I can believe you, Grandma," said Fred. "I'll sign my name against cider if it really makes people drunk."

"So will I," said Minnie; "who wants to keep away from the World's Fair to drink worm juice, anyway?"

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

SHELF-WARDROBE.

Good morning, chickens. Come in. Glad to see you all. Now look around as much as you please and then I'll show you how to make something. That? That's a jig-saw, such as they use for fine scroll-work, little brackets, etc. Has a place for drills, you see. No, not gimlets. A gimlet is the most unsatisfactory tool I know of for light work—tapering point, sure to split a small piece. You want twist drills like these—same size throughout and cutting surface the full diameter. Then, if one breaks you can file it into shape in a minute. And you can bore without splitting. Yes, I have twenty sizes, from a sewing needle to one-fourth inch. Yes, you'll have to use gimlets when boring by hand. This is a lathe like a watchmaker's, only larger. Yes, that grindstone runs by water power same as the other things.

Now I'll show you something I've just been making for that old lady who has been sick so long. Aunt Mary calls it a shelf-wardrobe, so that must be what is is. Goes on the back of a door or in a stray corner. Shelf like a mantel, ends braced, hooks under and curtains reaching to the floor, sliding both ways from the center and fastened at the ends. First the wood work, shelf, back, two ends, ledge. Length of shelf to suit location. This is 1x9x36. The ledge is a thin piece like a curtain stick, mitered at the corners. Gives a finished look and keeps things from sliding off. The back is 1x4x36 and goes flat against the wall, the shelf nailed to its upper edge. Put the clothes hooks on this piece, at such height as to leave two inches between their ends and the under side of the shelf. The ends come next. Always plan a piece of work to the end before beginning actual operations, whether you are building a house or a boot-jack—yes, I'll tell you about my boot-jack, some day. Take a 1x4, see that the end is square and measure off two, four and eleven inches on one edge, and seven, nine and eleven on the other. Connect two and nine, and at four and seven mark a right angle until you touch the oblique line; square across at eleven. Now saw all the lines and you have the two end pieces. They go under the shelf, against the back and reach to within one inch of the front edge of the shelf. Nail them in and the wood work is done.

Now for curtains, but we want a wire first. Use stove-pipe wire, not the heavy kind. Put a one inch screw into the under side of the shelf, half an inch from the front edge, and three-eighths from the end, leaving one-fourth inch in sight. Fasten on the wire, carry it through the crack of the screw and at a corresponding point at the other end, attach it to a screw-eye, and wind around the shank, turn the eye until the wire sounds like a violin-string, taking care that it is parallel with the shelf. Support the middle with a staple. Smooth the wire with emery-paper and put on a drop of oil, then the curtains will almost slide themselves.

The curtains should just clear the floor. Let your big sister make them, and tell her she may have them scant or full, with plain gathers or one-way laps, box plaits or twistemajigs, or any way she likes. Fasten some hooks, not rings, every two inches but be sure to get them half an inch below the edge, so the curtain will touch the shelf and keep out dust. The curtains are to be fastened around the ends back to the wall at top and bottom. They go outside of the screw and screw eye, and just under the ledge—which you see projects over the end pieces. When opened, they bunch up at the two corners.

Yes, Jimmy, I do know what to hang it on. Two long screws right through the back into something solid. There is an easy way of hanging it on hooks so it can be taken down, but this will answer for most cases, and I do not want to tax your brilliant young minds too heavily.

Here comes the postman with THE UNION SIGNAL. Jennie, you read aloud while I finish this.

DRINKING beer will spoil good cheer.
Who boozeth over grog will soon be in a fog.
Where strong drink enters folly centers.
Small beer gives small cheer.
The biggest poor-house is near Gin Lane.
Dictionaries declare gin is a snare.
Strong ale makes the strong ail.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—I know you will all enjoy the following story and one of the essays on cider sent by our Cozy Cornerers in answer to my question, Why do we include cider in our pledge? a few weeks ago. Next week we shall have more of these letters from some of ou earnest members. Look out for them.

MABEL'S INFLUENCE.

Little Mabel stood watching old Tim make cider in the cider-mill.

Old Tim liked cider, and I am sorry to say he sometimes took something stronger.

Mabel liked cider, too, but she had signed the pledge and never meant to break it.

"Want a drink?" asked Tim.

"No, I thank you," replied Mabel. "I can't drink cider, I've signed the pledge."

"Oh, there ain't no harm in a little cider," argued Tim.

"But," replied Mabel, "sometimes it leads to something stronger."

"Well, I guess that's so. I never used to drink anything but cider. Do you s'pose that pledge of yours would help me any?"

"Why, yes, I do," replied Mabel.

"Could you get me one, do you s'pose?" asked Tim.

"Oh, yes," said Mabel, "and a white ribbon, too. Oh, I'm so glad!"

Tim signed the pledge and kept it, though it was hard work. He always said it was Mabel's influence that led him to do it. JESSIE BARBER.

CIDER ESSAYS.

Why do we include cider in our temperance pledge? Because it is one of the most common temptations for boys to form a drink habit, which leads so often to the saloon. Cider is made of apples, ground in a mill, and then fermented till it is "hard." There is eight per cent of alcohol in cider, while there is only five in beer. I know of a farmer who makes lots of cider and when it gets hard sells it to boys and they get drunk. More drunkards have started out with cider than any other way. Our minister says that cider is the devil's kindling-wood, so I am sure the only safe way for boys and girls is to have nothing to do with it. C. MARRIOTT.

OUR BILL OF FARE.

"Between the Years" is the title of our introductory poem, by Aurilla Turber. "The Triumph of Faith" is a true test of trust and duty well told by Lydia Hoyt Farmer. Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman, our eloquent speaker, contributes a pointed article to our series on "Reform Forces." Wilbur F. Copeland, a member of The Voice staff and author of the well-known "Handbook of Prohibition Facts," furnishes a valuable explanation of the manner of computing the estimates for the national drink bill. Dr. Cushman's Columbian article is, as usual, full of pith and point. Miss Greenwood's appeal to the churches will doubtless find a responsive chord in every Christian heart. Warner Snoad, our loyal English friend, reviews the past year in the light of woman's progress. The Correspondence page is crowded full of interesting matter. The Household department kindly gives half its space this week to Our Children, who are generously provided for by Aunt Jane.

A THOUGHT FOR THE NEW YEAR.

"This temperance question is getting to be a terribly-in-earnest sort of a thing, somehow," remarked one business man to another, as they met, newspapers in hand, on a street car.

"It strikes me it is the fellow on the other side of the fence who is in earnest," was the somewhat gruff answer. That was all, but it started a train of thought.

The evil agencies are earnest with a zeal that is unremitting in its efforts. It is heedless man, whose soul is in hourly peril because of this vigilance, who forgets to be watchful, losing himself in trivialities and risking eternal welfare to "gain the whole world."

Satan assumes many forms, lurks behind innumerable masks, sets an endless variety of traps, great and small, to ensnare man's footsteps. But all his masquerading and scheming has only one end, namely, the destruction of souls, and how blindly, yea, even smilingly, they let themselves be entrapped! By his persistent earnestness the evil one—this "fellow on the other side of the fence"—conquers. So in earnest he is that he has hardly time for a triumphant laugh when he scores a victory, or for a groan over a lost battle. Why? He is in pursuit of souls! Arrayed against him is the King of Heaven. When through Him a redeemed one passes over from the battle-ground where sin and righteousness meet, well enough He knows that "the gates of hell" shall not prevail to draw that soul back into the outer darkness. There is no time to be lost. The enemy of souls knows this far better than do those in peril. Procrastination brings an hour at last when it is too late to cry for help and the great gulf is forever fixed between the lost and redeemed.

As the new year comes in, Christendom (or rather its great, warm heart, the church of the living God) pauses upon its threshold during the Week of Prayer to contemplate the deep things of life, the earnest questions that involve eternal destinies. Oh, that she would take on a seriousness now as never before! That she would put on the whole armor of God, not a piece here and there, but the whole, invincible armor, that she may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil, for we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places, not against flesh and blood—mark that. Yonder saloon owner, yonder voter with the license ballot in his hand, yonder evil speaker who is poisoning the minds of our youth—they are not our only enemies. We fight deadlier foes: principalities, powers, rulers of darkness, spiritual wickedness. The "temperance people" are fighting the outcropping results of inward sin. Should prohibition votes alone gain the victory, saloon doors swing to, and the liquid poison of the country be poured out upon the ground, the earth would scarce have made one revolution about the sun ere those who fought so heroically for God and Home and Native Land would find themselves confronted by some new enemy wearing as deadly a front as the old.

The axe must be laid at the root of the tree. The cause of the trouble must be removed. The fountain must be purified to have clear water. Right there is the blessedness of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union in the work of gospel temperance. Here she comes into touch with the church of God. In every pulpit where Christ is faithfully preached, in every home where the Christ-life is faithfully upheld, the temperance battle is grandly victorious. A soul won for Christ and clothed in heavenly armor against which the darts of intemperance and impurity fail of their mark, is a victory indeed. Bishop Newman said in a recent sermon that the things Christ did not do were greater than the things He did. He established no reformatories, endowed no asylums, gave no instructions for the building of jails, homes and like places, but instead declared, Ye must be born again. Such public institutions we are in the habit of pointing out with pride. Looking deeper, are they not our shame, since each one is a silent, yet swift witness to the presence of sins thus far unconquered? We could not cure the leper, but we could provide tombs where he might hide his unsightliness.

"Ye must be born again"! Sign pledges, vote clean tickets, rally in great numbers, sing ringing choruses, but forever cry to the multitudes without ceasing, "Ye must be born again."

If with the initial week of this New Year the spirit of the Crusade, which was the spirit of prayer, which is the Spirit of God, should set on fire the hearts of His people, how grandly the battle would go and how blessedly overwhelming would be the victory. Oh, that an earnestness born of a conscious purity might characterize the soldiers of the Right, they being dead to the world, dead to self, alive unto Christ, meeting open sin with clear-eyed spirituality; quenching all the fiery darts of the wicked with the Sword of the Spirit which is the Word of God; turning to naught the tempter's cunning by the wisdom learned of the Holy Ghost in the words of the Master; growing strong in the Lord and in the power of His might; opposing intemperance which is sin, by true temperance which is holiness manifest in daily life "without which no man shall see the Lord." Then shall the year of eighteen hundred ninety-three be in deed and in truth, Anno Domini, the Year of Our Lord.

A FAMOUS PHYSICIAN'S TESTIMONY.

Sir Andrew Clark says that health is that state of the body in which all its functions go on without notice or observation, in which existence is felt to be a pleasure and in which it is a kind of joy to see, to hear, to touch, to live. That is the choice blessing we call health, and none on earth is choicer, or, alas, so rare!

Sir Andrew continues: "Now let me say that is a state which cannot be in any way benefited by alcohol; it can bear it sometimes for a while without obvious injury, but benefited by it, never. I venture to say there is a certain state of joy of existence, for I cannot call it anything else, a sense in which one feels what a pleasure it is to look out upon the green fields, to hear pleasant sounds, to touch pleasant hands, to know that life is a satisfaction; this I say is a state in which a sort of discord is produced by alcohol; this is a state in which sooner or later the music goes out of tune under the continued influence of alcohol. This is an ideal life that rarely in this age comes to us dwellers in cities and towns. From the sins of our forefathers, from the unsuitable surroundings in which we dwell, from our own vices or mistakes, it somehow or other rarely comes to any one of us.

"I call perfect health the loveliest thing in this world, and alcohol even in small doses will take the bloom off, will injure the perfection of loveliness of health both mental and moral: I go still further and say, alcohol is not only no helper of work, but a hinderer of work, and every man that comes to the front of a profession in London is marked by this one characteristic, that the more busy he gets the less in the shape of alcohol he takes, and his excuse is, 'I am very sorry, but I cannot take it and do my work.'

"I am the general physician in the largest hospital in London; I do not desire to make it a strong case, I desire to make it a true case, and I tell you I am considerably within the mark when I say that, going the round of my hospital wards to day, seven out of every ten persons there owed their ill health to alcohol. I do not say this seventy per cent were drunkards, I do not say that one of them was what you call a drunkard, but day by day, just as the grass grows and you cannot see it, day by day this little excess, often a little one, is doing its work; it upsets the stomach, the stomach upsets the other organs, and bit by bit, under this fair and genial and jovial outside, the constitution is being sapped. This is the truth concerning more than three-fourths of the disorders of what we call fashionable life. There is another side to this question that I call its awful side, it is that the use of alcohol becomes a part of a man's very nature, and he hands it down to his children as part and parcel of their very being. What are we to think of those that are born drunkards? How can any man think without dread of this terrible fact, for fact it is as surely as that two and two make four, that this desire is becoming part of his nature, and that he is handing it down to generations yet unborn.

"The United Kingdom Temperance and General Providence Institution of London proves by its experience from 1866 to 1891 that the actual claims in the temperance section if calculated on policies are about seventy per cent of the expected claims: while in the general section out of which total abstinence is left, the actual claims are about ninety-seven per cent of the expected claims. The temperance argument is here in nutshell form."

THE VOTE.

A great many people are wondering why they do not get the vote of Mr. Bidwell at the late election. Considering that more than a month has passed since the election it seems a reasonable demand. Perhaps the "why" of the delay may be suggested by recalling a few facts.

The first and fundamental difficulty is that the political press are not consumed with a burning desire to blazen any fact about prohibition except one. If they could inform the people that the party had disbanded in disgust and despair, it would be known as far as the telegraph reaches in twenty-four hours. The troubles of the alcoholic Israel would be consigned to oblivion with profound thanksgiving.

That portion of the partisan press which adheres to the Republican party regard the Prohibition party as the cause of its defeat. Assuming that the Prohibition party is recruited entirely from its ranks, it counts every Prohibition vote as rightfully belonging to it, and affirms with passionate earnestness the folly, if not something worse, of those who vote the Prohibition ticket. But for the treasonable stupidity of sixteen thousand, more or less, Republicans in Wisconsin who threw away their votes on an impracticable issue, that state would have been saved to the Republican party—so Republicans reason. In 1884 New York went Democratic and elected Mr. Cleveland by the pitiful plurality of one thousand forty-seven, while over twenty-five thousand New York Republicans threw their votes away to the Prohibition fanaticism. To the thorough-paced Republican partisan all this is exasperating to the last degree. The party owns the voter, in its opinion. To break away for the sake of expressing a conviction, or organizing a reform, or for any purpose is intolerable. It is even worse than going over to the Democracy.

Well does Dr. Herrick Johnson say of this party craze: "It proceeds on the sheer assumption that the right of intelligent suffrage forevermore must be limited to a choice between two men; that the conscience of this Nation never can voice itself at the ballot-box save through the two great political parties; that a vote has only a numerical value and that a principle cannot by any possibility be made an issue in politics, so long as both parties ignore it or trample on it and a majority of independent voters cannot be commanded for it. This is simply 'practical politics' drunk with the wine of godless partisanship and worshiping itself." In 1888 and now in 1892 the same treason to the Republican party is repeated. Enough Prohibition votes were thrown away on Bidwell in several states to have given those states to Harrison.

Cherishing these sentiments, and in fact being dominated by them, as the politicians and office-holders are, nothing is more hateful than the Prohibition party, and nothing more ardently desired than its destruction. Of course, with them as with other men, "the wish is father to the thought." With each recurring election the hope amounts almost to belief that now at last the pestilent disturber will be heard of no more.

About the only difference between the Democratic and Republican verdict is the proportion of contempt injected into it by the latter. With such elements controlling the great mass of the newspapers it should not be a matter of surprise if silence broods over the vote.

Now appears another actor. In 1884 the Associated Press gave orders not to send by wire any returns except those pertaining to the two great parties. This had a fair show of enterprise, but its effect was to give the more violent partisans the opportunity to say that the Prohibition party had disappeared. This was said, as a part of the early news. Here and there a Prohibition vote might be found by those who looked for it, but so few and scattering that the impression is made during the first week after the election that the Prohibition party has gone to oblivion. So made, no subsequent publications reach the masses of the people. When the various political almanacs are published, some come to know the facts.

As soon as the official count is made, and the secretaries of state have the record, the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL will be furnished with the figures, which they can use as they have opportunity. Among those returns published from time to time some grains of truth are found, but as a whole they are entirely unreliable. With the exercise of a little patience we shall get the correct figures as nearly as they can be secured.

We hear it said, and in quarters which are worthy of respect, that a large number of Prohibition ballots are thrown out uncounted, the officials arguing that it is not worth while to bother with a ballot or two, which cannot change the result any way. When this is done in some thousands of precincts the aggregate is considerable, but there is no way to prevent this, and we need not worry about it. The vote, as it will appear, will stand as a protest and a nucleus. What changes may take place within the next four years cannot be foreseen, but the duty of the Prohibitionists to stand firmly by their guns is too plain for argument, whether they be many or few.

"HE SHALL FALL HIMSELF INTO HIS OWN PIT."

The latest and boldest attempt in the way of trusts and combines is that of the whisky distillers. They propose to legislate to themselves $100,000,000 by pushing through Congress a bill to advance the government tax on whisky from ninety cents to one dollar and fifty cents per gallon. The bill, as now offered, provides for a tax of one dollar and twenty-five cents, but if this does not arouse too much antagonism, their purpose is to amend by raising it to one dollar and fifty cents. The boldness of the trust is the more striking because of its assumption of the success of its nefarious scheme from the beginning. Capital is usually timid and reconnoiters carefully.

The whisky trust has already purchased a large proportion of the present stock of manufactured spirits, aggregating 130,000,000 gallons. Every distillery in the trust is running at its full capacity, which will make the total product, on or before March 1, 1893, at least 200,000,000 gallons. This does not include stocks in the hands of retailers, which are said to be unusually heavy.

In making this enormous investment the trust relies for correspondingly enormous returns upon its power in Congress. It expects to get both Houses to pass, and the President of the United States to sign, the bill advancing the tax to one dollar and fifty cents per gallon. Do the distillers hold a balance of power in the predominant parties? Why are they so confident of their ability to control national legislation that they invest millions of dollars on this presumption? Does not the recent election show very forcibly what is the will of the people regarding monopolies? No member of Congress, from either party, can fail to forecast the future of trusts, and of all who foster them by protective laws.

The people will no longer countenance the building up of giant monopolies which shall dictate legislation, federal, state or municipal, and we think we see in this move of the liquor fraternity the beginning of the end. We await with interest further developments.

IS THE WORLD'S FAIR TO BE OPEN SUNDAYS?

The statement was made some months ago by THE UNION SIGNAL that the opposers of the Sunday closing of the Fair would not be defeated until they were utterly routed, and that everything possible would be done to secure the repeal of the condition imposed by Congress upon the appropriation granted. Recent events show that we were not mistaken. The board of directors not long ago passed a resolution by a vote of twenty-six to four in favor of Sunday opening, and a Chicago paper of recent date begins a half column article thus: "The World's Fair Sunday-Opening Association [italics ours] is actively engaged in securing the expression of the will of the people on the question of repealing the act of Congress closing the Exposition Sunday." The article states that postal cards sent out indiscriminately show that four out of every five persons want the Fair open on Sunday and adds that, "petitions for an open Fair on Sunday will be showered upon Congress to a greater extent than that body has ever before known," and that these petitions will come from all over the Union and from all classes of people.

If Christian people ever deluded themselves with the hope that the question of Sunday opening was finally settled, they may as well awake at once to the truth that there is not merely a strong desire that the Fair be opened but an organized effort to reach that end. A "Sunday Opening Association" is in actual existence and its "secretary" is traveling through the land ostensibly ascertaining public opinion and doubtless making sentiment as he goes. Before we let this matter go by default, let us get clearly before us the issues involved. We must look beyond the plausible arguments which urge the necessity of Sunday opening as a diversion for the idle and vicious who will crowd Chicago at that time, and as a means of education and recreation to the toiling masses, and remember that the open Fair means a long stride towards the utter destruction of our American Sabbath. Open Fairs, museums, etc., on Sunday "for the laboring classes" mean inevitably in the end no Sabbath for the laborers or any one else. Setting aside all religious considerations, let thoughtful people consider what our day of rest is to all classes of society, what our life would be without it, and then decide this question. Unless we are prepared to accept this alternative of no Sabbath at all, we must never consent to an open Fair on Sunday. On these grounds, the patriot and the humanitarian, merely, should make common cause with the Christian; nothing but greed for gold can be urged on the other side.

To the Christian, the question is of far more serious import, for the annihilation of our day of rest is also the annihilation of our day of worship and, to many, of almost the sole opportunity for religious development. It is a deadly blow at Christianity and in Christianity center all the hopes of our nation's life. Without it, we shall go as all the nations of the past have gone before us. Our hope of immortality as a nation and our hope of immortality as individuals is the same. Unless the "little leaven" shall leaven the whole lump, our destiny is destruction, our end, death.

CONQUERED REALMS.

The bicycle is already a great realm for women, and is doing for the masses what horse-back riding has long done for the classes, especially in England. Many an expert bicycler among women has told us that her steed of steel had opened to her a new world and given life a zest that she had thought had passed away with youth. The sense of freedom and of power, the breathing of fresh air, the change of scene, the movement of muscles well nigh dormant until they have once more a sense of life; all these are among the blessings that a cycling woman realizes.

We believe it is Dr. B. W. Richardson who has declared that swimming, of all other exercises, is the one to be most recommended, and swimming classes for women are now established in all our leading cities. The whole range of athletic sports in so far as they may desire to enter it, and schools for physical culture with gymnasia attached, are springing up on every hand, in which the costume is wholly conformable to nature and to reason, so that no graceful movement of the body is impeded, no organ constricted, and the whole life of the body is maintained during the practice in this instance, at least, in a natural condition of equipoise and liberty.

Young women are beginning to be admitted as "choir boys." Why not, since they now graduate as bachelors in the established church? Indeed, they are inching along into every place worth entering, and the girls of the future will wonder beyond telling why it was ever otherwise.

The fact that the Greek letter fraternities in some of our colleges are voting women in as members is a thing that would have been hooted at ten years ago, or even five.

One of the most notable and appropriate changes in the customs that are so very hard to change is the larger participation of women in those sacred rites that accompany the consigning of all that is mortal of our loved ones to their mother earth. This change was introduced so far as we know by the white-ribboners; it came about in the most natural way, at first by the request of dying comrades; it now happens not infrequently that some one of our women make the address, and others act the part of honorary pall-bearers of the local union, marching in procession behind the relatives. A like instance in connection with the burial service of a man, most appropriately occurred at the obsequies of him whom we love to call the women's laureate, John Greenleaf Whittier. All the dreariness of funeral exercises was banished from his burial day, as his coffin was placed in the garden behind the old home at Amesbury, and among the honorary pall-bearers were those whose names are loved throughout America: Mrs. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps-Ward, Miss Lucy Larcom, Mrs. Alice Freeman-Palmer and Mrs. Mary B. Claflin.

Out-door exercise and enjoyment are two of the greatest factors in the totality of human happiness and establishment of human homes, and into these realms woman, for generations huddled away inside the kitchen and the parlor, is now not only invited, but exhorted to enter.

A CORRESPONDENT asks THE UNION SIGNAL for information respecting Hire's Root Beer, "said to be healthy and non-alcoholic." Having no personal knowledge of the extract in question we asked information of a druggist, not a temperance man. His reply was, "Hires', like any other beer, is alcoholic." Webster defines beer as "a fermented liquor made from any malted grain—a fermented extract of the roots and other parts of various plants, as spruce, ginger, sassafras," etc. Alcohol is an invariable product of fermentation, in quantities varying with the nature of the malt and processes used.

Dr. Samuel Johnson wittily said that "an ocean ship is a prison, with a chance of being drowned."

One of the pleasantest ways in which semi-invalids and young people who hardly know what to do with their time can put in some of it is said to be the following: "Paste pretty pictures from the best papers into scrap-books with Bible texts and temperance sentiments so as to catch the eye. Then give these books to soldiers' reading-rooms hospitals, homes for the friendless, etc."

Confidence and trust are the sweetest things we can give to a friend. Suspicion is always cold and cruel to a sensitive heart, and it were better to be often deceived by unworthy friends than to be guilty of causelessly wounding a noble soul by unjust suspicions. And although they are rare, we should always be looking for noble souls everywhere. We may find them when least expected.

Our life is two-fold. It consists of a material form built after a divine pattern and a living spirit existing in and through that form. An injury to the soul injures the body, but a limb may be broken or the body crushed in pieces without injuring the soul. The body is lifeless without the soul, but the soul may live forever without the body. The body is dependent on the soul for life. Why not dependent on the soul for health?

I was interested the other day in reading the account of a recent, joint convention of four districts down in Missouri to note some new features in connection therewith and pass them on to you. A critic was appointed, whose duty it was to criticise the general proceedings of the convention. Another noteworthy feature was an amusing and instructive examination of local presidents! It was suggested, too, that the examiner prepare a catechism for local presidents. Such proceedings, besides being enlivening and beneficial, prevent our meetings from becoming stereotyped in character, and are worthy of imitation.

Mrs. E. H. Gammon, of Batavia, Ill., was stricken down December 23 in the midst of seemingly perfect health by a stroke of apoplexy and died in a few hours. Mrs. Gammon was known over the entire land for her noble Christian character and for her world-wide yet unostentatious charities. She and her noble husband, who preceded her to the heavenly mansions less than a year ago, were specially interested in the work among the colored people of the South. Gammon Theological Seminary, of the Methodist Episcopal church was founded by Mr. Gammon, and received from him half a million of dollars. In this work Mrs. Gammon fully sympathized, but her benevolence was not confined to this field. She was a munificent giver in the foreign missionary work, one of the foremost workers and givers in the woman's home missionary society of her church, and the poor and needy of her own town have lost a friend who is not likely to be soon replaced. By her death the world has lost one of its noblest women.

ON DUTY.

WORLD'S W. C. T. U. DIRECTORY.

Founded 1883.

President—Miss Frances E. Willard, Evanston, Ill.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

FALL CALENDAR.

On October 12 a dedicatory service was held at 1313 H St. N. W. The parlors, which are large and commodious, are used for District headquarters, the other part of the dwelling for the work among fallen and indigent women. One of the former has been recently converted, and a reconciliation effected between parents and child, for which we praise God.

On Sabbath afternoon, November 13, a mass-meeting was held at the Congregational church; Mrs. Alfred Wood, delegate to the National Convention, gave an account of that great gathering. Miss Delamartyr sang a solo, Mrs. Fonnell read a poem, Mrs. Schafner made an address, in which she spoke of temperance and social purity work in China.

November 20 a memorial service was held at Foundry M. E. church for one of our mothers in Israel, Mrs. Martha Shively; her life had been a great blessing to home, church and the W. C. T. U. Her light shone brightly upon all with whom she came in contact; in very many respects we are the poorer because of her departure. Her sick chamber was a place of glory; the holy life went out most beautifully.

November 30 a new auxiliary was organized at Brook land (a suburb), Mrs. West, the wife of the Baptist minister, was elected president.

December 3 a protest was sent to President Harrison in regard to Mr. Hazleton, the attorney of the District, being appointed a District Commissioner; it read as follows: "Believing that Mr. Hazleton has permitted himself to be used in the interests of the liquor traffic in this city and of the country, our protest against his nomination is hereby most prayerfully presented.

December 18 a mass-meeting of Loyal Temperance Legions occurred at Metropolitan M. E. church and an interesting program was rendered. On the same evening our organization was invited to hold a meeting at Ryland M. E. church. A large number of young persons were in the audience. Rev. Chas. Baldwin, Mrs. S. D. La Fetra and Mrs. M. E. Cohen made addresses, touching vital points in our work, and the meeting must have been educational to the young folks especially.

A white ribbon reunion and social meeting under the auspices of North Capitol W. C. T. U. took place at District headquarters, North 1313 H street, W. N., Wednesday, December 14, at 7:30 p. m. This is the program:

Song service in honor of National motto, "For God and Home and Native Land."

Prayer—Scripture Lesson.

Hymn in honor of District motto, "Loyal Unto Death."

Sentiment: May the day soon come when woman shall be equipped for the protection of home and children with the same potent weapon which her enemies wield for their destruction—the ballot.

Response, Mrs. Ruth G. Havens.

Treasury Notes, Mrs. T. A. Williams.

Sentiment: The Woman's Christian Temperance Union, "Organized mother-love," feared by the rum power, hated by all enemies of truth and purity, wounded in the house of her friends, yet holding steadfastly upon her chosen path, in the serene consciousness that never for her was intended the divine anathema, "Woe unto you when all men shall speak well of you."

Response.

Sentiment: Frances E. Willard, loyal champion of the weak and tempted, staunch defender of the home, the friend of all humanity, America's uncrowned queen.

Response.

Hymn—"Blest be the tie."

I glean from the above "Treasury notes" some suggestions that may "stir up the pure minds by way of remembrance" of our entire sisterhood. "Every treasurer should be impressed with a sense of the importance of her office and with the fact that in the final analysis our showing as to members and income depends on her." Treasurers in this case means local treasurers, for, after all, in every branch of our work it is to the local unions we must look for the real work. The auxiliary union is the foundation of the organization, and on its efficiency or apathy depends the success or failure of the parent body. But the auxiliary is composed of individuals, and as they are so is the auxiliary.

Do individual members realize how much they have to do with the life of the organization? The financial success of the National W. C. T. U. depends largely on the state dues, and in consequence the National treasurer depends on the promptness and energy of the state treasurer. But alas! the last named may be all that can be desired, but if the local treasurers are not prompt and energetic also, the state treasurer is helpless. This burden cannot all fall on the local treasurers; if the individual member is responsible for the life of the organization, she is also responsible, so far as she is individually concerned, for its financial success. In other words, if each member would pay her dues promptly, she would not only experience that relief that always comes when one's debts are paid, but she would also feel she was contributing her mite to the great work. It seems such an important step to take —the joining this great army of workers, that it is scarcely possible to forget the time your membership fee expires. Charge your memory with it and when the year comes around again, make glad the heart of your treasurer by paying your dues promptly.

The response (in part) of Mrs. Ruth Haven to the first sentiment on the program was as follows: "We used to read in our geography that monarchy is of two kinds, absolute and limited. I heard a man say the other day that the only extant example of an absolute monarchy is Russia. Now I should say that the most stupendous instance of absolute monarchy, unchanged throughout the centuries, is the absolute monarchy of man. Women are his subjects. Power makes tyrants, and power long continued and unlimited makes tyrants unconscious of their tyranny. Just as wealth practically boundless makes men selfish and unconscious of selfishness. Do you suppose Carnegie knows that when he cuts down the wages of men earning from twenty-five to seventy-five dollars a month he is cruel and selfish. He would scorn the deed if he could see it with eyes made keen by want and privation and longing. So if men were conscious of their tyranny, if they could even credit that we are in earnest in our desire for liberty and equality, I do them the honor to believe they would voluntarily limit their monarchy. It is their habit of thought that if woman is ever to have any privilege she is to obtain it by their generosity. They talk of what they are willing to concede to women, when in the light of eternal justice they have nothing to concede. They have declared formally that all men, in the generic sense, are born free and equal, and what they would concede is only what they have wrongfully obtained and willfully withheld, not a gift but a restitution, not a contribution to the public moneys but a restoration, through the conscience fund, of the principal without any interest. Equally unconscious are the subjects. Born slaves may have in them nothing which senses loss or lack, or yearns for liberty. They take their condition for granted without analyzing its origin or questioning its authority. This, alas, is the most pitiful evidence of their total thralldom.

"There are a few vital issues which open the eyes of women here and there, and fill their hearts with eager longing and raise their voices in earnest entreaty or imperative demand. Principal among these are: First, the unequal financial conditions which harass and degrade women in the marriage relation—the man working ten hours a day for fair compensation, the woman working fourteen hours a day and living and dying a beggar. Second, the unequalities based on sex, of the pay of wage earners everywhere, in consequence of which a man may accumulate a competence by the same amount of labor as will afford to woman only a subsistence. Third, the obstacles placed in the way of women who have talent and ambition for unusual fields of labor. Fourth, the unequal, unjust, unrighteous legal discrimination against married women in the matter of obtaining, holding and disposing of property so that while the gospel only gives a man possession of a woman's soul and body, the law gives to him whatever else she has inherited, earned or acquired. And fifth, the ungodly laws and regulations which this absolute monarchy creates and maintains relating to a traffic more desolating than war, more deadly than pestilence, more devastating than famine. Probably this cause has united a larger number of women in the prayerful desire for liberty and equality than any other. Probably this, preëminently, has opened the eyes of women to see their legal helplessness. This has made timid, modest women understand that we are not simply grasping for a privilege but following after a duty. Men regard the temperance movement as a harmless plaything, but when women hold the ballot they will begin to understand that it is loaded. Without the ballot women are as voiceless as the mummies of Egypt."

GEORGIA.

LETTERS FROM LOCAL WORKERS.

A successful district convention has been held in the seventh district, Mrs. A. M. Street, district president, presiding, at Somerville, Ga., which was well attended, and made a good impression.

From Cartersville writes Mrs. J. T. Norris: "We had a few days since an interesting mass-meeting of the children at the M. E. church, all the churches uniting. Addresses were made by Dr. Dobbs, pastor of the Baptist church, and by Mrs. Dr. Felton. There were recitations by the children. About seventy children, it is said, signed the pledge. We are looking for Miss Lily Reynolds on Friday, and hope to organize our L. T. L. then."

Mrs. Mary Crawford, Greshamville, says: "We had a good W. C. T. U. meeting last Saturday night. I can see signs of a revival of the union."

Miss Lily Reynolds, state superintendent of juvenile work, writes December 6 concerning her recent tour in the seventh district: "I spoke sixteen times in eleven different places, all but three of which had already our organizations. I think in such the interest was increased; the purposes for which they took up the work were established on surer and more definite foundations, and a better idea is given of the needs and methods to supply them than they had. Two of the three places went to work immediately to organize both the W. C. T. U. and the L. T. L."

Mrs. E. M. Evans of the Linden street L. T. L., Atlanta, Ga., writes: "I have a very flourishing Legion. I say I, because I have no help, but have to carry it on myself. I have now thirty-one active members, all in one class, and teach them the best I can. I use the Temperance Manuals, 'Alcohol and the Body,' and 'Beer and the Body.' After the devotional exercises and lesson we have recitations and dialogues and songs by the children. To keep them interested I give them something to do. A bright little boy is president, a little girl, vice-president; another little girl secretary, and another for organist, and two boys for ushers. We have a flower-mission committee who carry flowers or any little delicacy to those who may be sick in the community. Then we have a literature committee who distribute temperance and religious papers and leaflets in all the homes of that locality. The visiting committee visit all absent members to find out their excuses for not being present, and to urge them to attend. Each committee brings in a written report of their work once per month and reads it before the Legion. We are now arranging for a public meeting to be held soon at Linden mission. We will invite all the parents to come out, and before we close our meeting we will take up a collection. We want to pay our dues so we can send a delegate from our Legion to the W. C. T. U. convention. I may not conduct my Legion just as it should be, but I am certain I am instilling temperance principles into those little ones which they will never forget."

EAST WASHINGTON.

THE PRESIDENT'S WORK.

Since the 25th of October last I have spent twenty-eight days and traveled 972 miles in the interest of the W. C. T. U. in East Washington.

Two new unions and one L. T. L. have been organized, fifteen points visited and twenty meetings held.

The first meetings were in North Yakima, where we have had a good union for years.

We had two good meetings there, one public and one with the union, secured eight new members, one honorary life member, a collection and a pledge of fifteen dollars for state work.

Roslyn, the next place visited, is a coal mining town in the Cascade Mountains. Here we found a band of heroic women keeping open a small reading-room at a cost of fifteen dollars per month, not including the fuel, lights and literature. It is a heavy burden for a handful of women, yet they felt that it must be done for the benefit of the miners who have no homes in which to spend their evenings. Two meetings were held here, four new members added to the union, a generous collection taken and the union pledged ten dollars for state work.

Ahtanum is a country union, and the members live so far apart it is difficult for them to hold regular meetings. There is a fine new academy located there, however, and a good church and parsonage, the property of the Congregational church. We were gratified to learn that both the pastor of the church and the principal of the school are stanch Prohibitionists, the latter being a nominee on the state Prohibition ticket. A pleasant meeting was held there and two new members added to the union. We suggested to them that they take up the Demorest medal contest work, which they thought they would do.

Kiona is a new station on the N. P. railroad, a few miles west of Pasco. A new union was organized there with nine members, two of whom had belonged to the organization elsewhere. This union starts out well and we may expect to hear from it again later on. From here I returned home, and after resting a few days, started out again.

Columbus, a small town on the Columbia River, was the next place visited. Our union there is weak numerically, but strong to do and dare for the right. We should have had two meetings there, but were delayed so that we did not reach there until too late for the meeting with the union. We had an evening meeting which resulted in three new members for the union. They gave us a collection and ten dollars for state work. They also voted to give ten dollars toward a memorial tablet in Willard Hall.

Goldendale, the next point, is a beautiful town, but off the railroad, and can only be reached by stage. The union here has done telling work in the past, having with the aid of their noble husbands, fathers and brothers carried the town for prohibition more than once. Two good meetings were held and the union pledged twenty-five dollars for state work.

The next place was Centerville, a small country town. The union there had not met for some time. The president is a young woman, and away in school most of the time. She is a very earnest worker, and deserves great credit for holding on to the work under many discouragements. We had a good public meeting there, and hope the union will survive. They gave us ten dollars for state work.

From Centerville to Bickelton, our next station, is forty-five miles by stage, and thirty miles by railroad. The union at this place had not met for more than a year, but we found good, true women there, and some of them were anxious to have the union revived. Two meetings were held and the union was re-officered, though the weather was so disagreeable that but few of the women were present.

Dixie was the next place visited. The Good Templars are occupying the ground there so fully and our union is so small and weak, I fear they will be obliged to discontinue. I urged them to hold on to the organization if possible, but if they could not do that to send their membership to the nearest union.

At Waitsburg we met with the union, but it was a dark night and but few were present. This is a loyal union however, and can always be depended upon in any good work. They assumed ten dollars for state work.

Dayton union is wide awake. They anticipated our coming and had laid out work accordingly. We were met at the train and taken to the pleasant home of Mrs. Wm. Bradford, president of the union. It was Saturday noon when we reached there. At three p. m. we met with the union. There was a large number present and we had a very pleasant and we trust profitable meeting, talking over the work together. The next day a Loyal Temperance Legion was organized, and in the evening a large mass-meeting was held in the court house. Everything seemed to have been well arranged for, but we think the music deserves special mention. A large choir with organ and cornet—led by the pastor of the Congregational church—furnished such music as was an inspiration to the occasion. Nine new members were added to the union. A good collection was received and the union assumed twenty-five dollars for state work.

From here we went to Covello, where a new union was organized with seven honorary and seven active members.

Pomeroy was the last place visited. For many years there was an active union there, but about one year ago the union disbanded, for lack of a leader, I was told. There is a live Y there, however, that is doing good work. They have a column in their city paper, have parlor meetings once a month, and have taken up a number of the departments of work.

They have more honoraries than active members. Some of the honoraries are young men, some are the fathers and mothers, and some are the grandparents. They gave ten dollars for state work.

THE TEMPERANCE EDUCATION LAW AND OTHER NEWS.

The unions of our state have all united in one supreme effort to secure the passage of the temperance education law through the incoming legislature. Petitions are being circulated all over the state, and legislators interviewed and entreated to give their influence in its favor. Thousands of signatures of the best people in the state are being attached to it. The Fayetteville W. C. T. U. circulated one a few weeks since, and received a large number of signatures. Almost every one to whom it was presented signed it readily. Among other signatures secured was one from a distiller and a saloon-keeper, and one from an ex-saloon-keeper. Quite a number of prominent anti-Prohibitionists signed it, saying that while they were opposed to prohibition, they thought it would be a good thing to teach children in school the evil effects of drinking alcoholic liquors, using tobacco and opium. Strange to say one Prohibitionist refused to sign it.

Mrs. Hunt will be at Nashville, and that is almost a guarantee of itself that we will get the law. The legislature meets early in January. There are some other laws we hope to secure. Among them a better tobacco law, and one for the better protection of girls. This work is in the care of Mrs. Emily M. Lettle, our efficient superintendent of legislative work, with the able assistance of the East Nashville W. C. T. U.

Only two unions have sent in reports for this month.

Tullahoma meets every other Wednesday, and is doing more and better work than last year. They have a public meeting every two months, sometimes oftener, doing much good in this way. They have taken up one or two new departments of work, among others the department of social purity.

Jonesboro union is coming to be one of the most efficient working unions in the state. They have a comfortable and well-furnished hall, meeting regularly every Thursday afternoon, with an interesting program each time. They have mothers' meetings and monthly Bible readings. They have live, wide-awake superintendents of the following departments: Sabbath observance, social purity, narcotics, communion wine, press work, suppression of impure literature, prison work, work among colored people, Sunday-school work, dress reform, parlor meetings, and mothers' meetings, and much good is being done in all of them. Literature is freely distributed, and wall pockets are kept well filled in public places. They edit a column in their town paper. They have a large and enthusiastic Loyal Temperance Legion which meets every other Sunday, and thus much good is being done among the children. Special attention is given to prison work, and frequent services are held in the jail for the benefit of the prisoners. They have had two entertainments from which quite a little sum was realized. The mothers' meetings are more largely attended than any other. They feel that the Lord is with them in their work and that He will give them the victory.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

Philadelphia was the scene of the third state elocutionary contest for the grand gold medal last month, at which Miss Mary E. Barr, a Lancaster county Y, won the medal, reciting beautifully, "The Nation's Curse." The other contestants were presented with a handsome volume each, "Beautiful Gems," by Miss H. Frances Jones, state superintendent of Demorest medal contests. The Silver Lake quartette delighted the musical ear and Rev. C. H. Mead delivered a fine address.

Our Y's frequently present to us the application of a good idea. A recent illustration of this is the invitation card of the Camp Creek Y of White Heath, Ill., which is a model of neatness and well planned. On the outer cover is the word welcome and beneath it the text: Isa. 32:20. On the back are the directory, time and place of meetings. Within are appropriate quotations and the words:

"We invite you to our meetings. Come, whether you care to become one of us or not.

"'Come with us and we will do you good.'

"The Y is a social as well as a Christian institution.

"We know you"

THE fifteenth annual convention of Oswego county, N. Y., at Fulton last fall had some special features of interest. Parlor conferences were held after the sessions which were helpful to workers. The Fulton union met the delegates at the church and escorted them to the tastefully decorated Opera House in the evening. Here they were welcomed in a unique way, for when the curtain was raised it disclosed to view two hundred children of the L. T. L., who greeted them with a song of welcome and then marched gracefully away. Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap set forth the responsibility of the American citizen in the temperance reform, strongly urging prohibition. The convention was pronounced "One of the best ever held."

RELATIONS OF TEMPERANCE TO LABOR AND CAPITAL.

There is no branch of the temperance work more important than that relating to labor and capital, and the purpose of all temperance work is such that the end sought can never be attained without interesting and awakening the sympathy of these classes.

In entering upon the duties of this department it is my purpose to pursue the same plan of organization that has been adopted by all the other departments, viz: the appointment of state, district, county and local superintendents.

In these respective appointments it is always desirable that the superintendents be chosen from those who are identified with labor organizations. I am aware that a seemingly insurmountable difficulty meets us at this point, as comparatively few members of the W. C. T. U. have acquainted themselves with the aims and objects of labor organizations and often prejudices exist which destroy the influence of those who have so interested themselves. There is but one way to overcome this difficulty and that is to familiarize ourselves with the methods and purposes of our co-workers. There is an unaccountable and unwarrantable indifference existing between the temperance and labor reforms which I believe springs entirely from ignorance of each other's purposes—an ignorance which has given birth to prejudice, and prejudice is characteristically intolerant and overbearing.

As a worker in both branches of reform, I would suggest that we make the acquaintance of our neighbors in reform. You will be astonished to find how nearly the purposes and aims of labor organizations correspond with our own. True, they are working on different lines, their methods are somewhat unlike, but the goal sought is the same. their purpose, like ours, is the betterment of the human race. Then why should we be strangers? Or why indulge in unjust and unchristian criticism?

The duty of local superintendents should be to distribute temperance literature among labor organizations. I would recommend that the first literature distributed pertain to the effects of alcohol on the system, particularly its effects upon the brain, and show the injustice practiced upon the victim of alcohol and that those addicted to its use are ever at the mercy of designing men. It should also be the duty of local superintendents to discuss labor questions in their unions, set apart a day for that purpose and invite leaders of labor organizations to take part in these discussions.

The duty of district and county superintendents should be to bring the subject before their respective conventions. See that it is made a special feature of these occasions. Secure lecturers and invite labor organizations to be in attendance at these lectures. Prepare papers for discussion, inviting ministers, business men, employés and employed to take part in these discussions.

Since law-making is the most important labor that man is called upon to perform, and since our law-makers are largely addicted to the use of intoxicants, I would recommend that each state superintendent petition the legislature of her state to abstain from the use of spirituous liquors while engaged in the sacred vocation of making laws. Science teaches us that the habitual drinker, though not a confirmed drunkard, is constantly under an alcoholic influence that fosters his baser passions at the expense of his moral nature. No people can be well governed whose laws emanate from brains steeped in alcohol.

I would also recommend that fraternal delegates be in attendance at all labor conventions where practicable, otherwise send fraternal greetings.

Above all, interest yourself in the welfare of all laboring classes, particularly the unemployed millions—the sober, honest, industrious, intelligent unemployed millions who are not asking for charity but for work.

As yet only five states report superintendents in this department, and since so little has been done, and the work comparatively new, it seems advisable not to undertake too much, and except the states where the work is already advanced I believe it would be well to confine ourselves to organization, distribution of scientific literature, lectures, petitioning abstinence of legislators and sending fraternal delegates and greetings to labor conventions.

Sisters, with these purposes before us, let us enter upon the new year with faces set toward our industrial Zion, and as co-workers with the Master let us go about His work fully assured that victory is ours.

Yours for the toiling millions.

Nat. Supt. Relation of Temperance to Labor and Capital.

Our Library Table.

ST. NICHOLAS, bound in two volumes for 1892, is as attractive as usual, and will be received gladly by its host of young friends. It is artistic from first to last, and its contents are sound and sweet throughout.

The Century Co., New York City.

HOPEFUL WORDS FOR THE SICK AND SUFFERING, "published by a lady as a thankoffering to the Lord for restored health." It is a dainty little "offering" and contains many good, comforting thoughts.

Thomas Whittaker, 2 and 3 Bible House, New York City.

THE NATIONAL TEMPERANCE MIRROR, published by the National Temperance League Publication Depot, London, is an illustrated magazine "for the home circle." This is volume twelve, and is sound and good—"sweet as a nut" as the saying goes. It has stories for young, middle-aged and old, live items on pertinent temperance questions, poems, songs, and a variety of "good things."

Agnes Repplier has selected and compiled into A BOOK OF FAMOUS VERSE a choice collection of the most widely-known poems of Shakespeare, Collins, Longfellow, Tennyson, Aldrich, Bryant, Lowell, Coleridge, Milton, Shelley, Keats and others. The book has its mechanical finish from the artistic hands of Houghton, Mifflin & Co., and is inside and out, a very beautiful little volume.

Readers of the CENTURY will welcome the bound volume including the issues from May to October, 1892. It is its own best commendation. The little legend "Vol. XLIV" tells a forcible story that needs no enlargement. This serial holds a high place in the literary world, maintains it easily and is a household treasure that has within itself the assurance of lasting fame.

The Century Co., New York City.

GARNERED GEMS OF SUNDAY SCHOOL SONG, by H. R. Palmer, contains nearly two hundred pages of good music. Aside from the hymns of other writers, old and modern, Mr. Palmer has here a collection of his own compositions, among which are the well-known "Yield Not to Temptation," "Bethlehem's Star," "Have Courage, My Boy, to Say No!"

The John Church Co., Cincinnati, Ohio.

THE AMERICAN NEWSPAPER ANNUAL is an encyclopedia of information of the American advertising field. Briefly, it contains Catalogue of Newspapers and Periodicals, a Gazetteer Description of every place in the United States and Canada where a newspaper is published, Newspapers Arranged by Counties in States, Religious, Agricultural and Class Publications, Press and Editorial Associations, etc., etc. Neither money nor labor seem to have been spared to make this work most valuably complete, and it is a success in its own way.

N. W. Ayer & Son, Times Building, Philadelphia.

The Business-Man's Hand-Book, published by Pettingill & Co., Newspaper Advertising Agency, 22 School Street, Boston, edited by R. W. Rexford. Perhaps an indorsement of the editor's own words concerning this book will be to the point: "It contains much valuable information in small space. It does not cover everything a business man should know, but will often answer a question for him on very many points." Some of the contents are: Items of law, monetary information, weights and measures, interest tables and facts "worth knowing," also a selected list of daily, weekly, religious and agricultural newspapers, magazines and monthlies published in the United States and Canada, with a complete list of newspapers and periodicals issued in New England, together with circulation, rating, etc.

THE CONWAYS, a charming story for young people, by Effie W. Merriman. Lee & Shepard, publishers, Boston, Mass.

This is a story of life in a Western village, changing for a time to Chicago. The events are on the plane of actual life, and the characters are wonderfully real and natural. Most of them appear to be sincerely good, but they have their peculiarities and comic twists, and make a well-contrasted group, in varied, interesting situations. If their talk is free and easy, it is without guile. Among other topics dealt with is the improvement of the town by planting shade-trees, and laying pavements and sidewalks. By means of a fair and other expedients the money is raised —though amidst trials and delays—and the town becomes beautiful. There is among some of the children a class-feeling between the well-to-do and the poor—a feeling which a few nobler ones reprobate and put down. Their changing fortunes give the continuous interest and attraction to the story.

STOP-OVER PRIVILEGES DISCONTINUED

To avoid manipulation and illegitimate use of its tickets, the Wabash Railroad Company has found it necessary to discontinue the granting of stop-over privileges on all kinds and classes of tickets, and after January 1st, 1893, passengers will be obliged to purchase tickets from point to point. The new arrangement, however, which will be fully explained by any of the Company's Agents, will be found to be equally as convenient to the traveling public as the old, while the Company will be enabled to protect itself from imposition.

A GOOD EXAMPLE.

At the mid-year meeting of the Illinois state executive committee composed of the state officers, district presidents and state superintendents of departments, held in Parlor O, Palmer House, Chicago, on December 29, 1892, a motion was unanimously carried, expressing pleasure at the announcement that a memorial supplement to THE UNION SIGNAL in view of the death of its late editor, Mary Allen West, would soon be issued, and embodying a pledge to make a special effort at that time to secure new subscribers to the National organ. This is an example that might well be followed by all our members. It would also be wise to use this special issue largely for free distribution, as it will portray the work of one of the representative women of the organization, and must impress those who read it with the magnitude of the cause for which she lived and died.

We will gladly send sample copies to any who will undertake to secure subscribers on application.

The probable date of this special number will be January 17, 1893. It cannot, however, be definitely stated, as it is desired to include an account of the funeral ceremonies at Galesburg, after the remains reach that city.

For promiscuous circulation the following special rates are made if received in advance: For single copy, 5 c; per dozen, 50 c; per 100, $3.

Send orders without delay as we cannot go to press a second time and the first edition should be made large enough to meet all demands.

COMPILED BY

ANNA A. GORDON

OLD—NEW—TESTED—FRESH

OLD because it contains the favorites of White Ribboners everywhere, the songs which have become their watchwords.

NEW because rich treasures of word and song have been prepared for its pages.

TESTED because its hymns have borne the wear and tear of use.

FRESH because it rings clear and sweet for the home, the nation, and the truth of God.

It is divided into the following sections:

Devotional Meetings	Mass Meetings
Evangelistic Services	Prohibition Rallies
Gospel Temperance Meetings	Special Days
Memorial Services	Closing Hymns

TESTIMONIES FROM THE PACIFIC.

See what they say of the Junior Partners.

STOCKTON, CAL.

There is strength in the writer. He makes you see and realize it all. That scene where murder's madness creeps into the alcohol-driven man's heart and makes him do its will is wonderfully thrilling. The delirium tremens scene is a masterpiece of English. Withal the work is logical and dispassionate. It marshals its facts, and when it advances a theory it is always with a fact behind it. It will interest all classes and have an immense sale, for it is destined to be the temperance work of the time.—The Mail.

SAN FRANCISCO.

Of all the great books that have issued from the press these many years, bearing the result of drink, it is doubtful if any has appeared so startlingly realistic and so awfully true as this story, "The Junior Partners." The great increase of insanity in our day is traced to its causes by one who has made the subject a careful study. It is one of the most readable books we have met with.—Gospel Temperance Union.

This very helpful book will be in great demand on presentation.

THE HOLIDAYS

Are over and every one will settle down to regular business. It is just the time to get up clubs for THE UNION SIGNAL and the other publications of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association. You read THE UNION SIGNAL and enjoy it—could not keep house without it. Why not say so to your neighbor and friend? In no other way could you so effectively spread the principles of the W. C. T. U. Christian people should be working with us heart and soul, but many of them do not understand our aims. Try to have the circulation of THE UNION SIGNAL extended in your church. By so doing you will secure new members in the W. C. T. U. Will not vice-presidents in local unions make this a prayerful duty now at the beginning of a new year? Report success to TAKE NOTICE.

On a circular just sent out from this office to superintendents of literature in local unions, by an inadvertence paragraph No. 5 in last year's circular appears; please note that the semi-monthly Crusader is no longer issued, but the monthly has been adapted to the use of Sunday-schools and Loyal Temperance Legions. Every child should have a copy; please investigate, and if not already supplied, send at once for as many copies as will provide one for each family of children connected with your Sunday-school or Loyal Temperance Legion. Price 15 cts. per year.

Sample copies sent on request.

DO YOU WANT

To secure one of our beautiful souvenir spoons? You know they are of solid sterling silver, and are artistic in design. The work of the W. C. T. U. is emblemized from the small beginning in the Crusade church, which appears in the bowl, to the world belted with the white ribbon, which surmounts the handle. The floral emblems of the World's and the National organizations both appear, and the face of our National and World's president is in relief on the handle. If you want one you can have one—a coffee, a tea or an orange spoon as you desire. For particulars see page 15.

HELPFUL.

Helpful to young or old—graduates of the L. T. L., Y's or members of the W's—all will find profit in a careful following of the experiences and developments of the Cheeryvale Law Club, which gives in interesting form the history of temperance legislation. You need to know it. Well, it is one of the very many helpful things to be found in The Advance Guard. If you have not seen this new publication, send for a sample copy. Price per annum, 50 cents, single copy, 5 cents. Sample copy free.

EXTENDED.

Realizing that it was not possible for the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL to do all that could be done under our new and unparalleled offer, it has been decided to extend it, and it will hold good until March 1st, 1893.

Fully believing that it would be one of the greatest aids to our cause, as has been said again and again in these columns, if THE UNION SIGNAL were more generally read, and being unable to personally canvass all the territory of all the local unions, nearly 10,000 of which are scattered over this country, and desiring your help in this direction, the proposition here outlined is made to all ages and sexes.

NOTE.—To any one, young or old, readers of "Aunt Jane's Cozy Corner" included, who will send us a club of eight new subscribers at one dollar each, we will forward promptly one of our beautiful W. C. T. U. solid silver after-dinner coffee souvenir spoons. These spoons have the die of the Crusade Church at Hillsboro, Ohio, imprinted in the bowl; Miss Willard's picture embowered in the National floral emblem, the trailing arbutus on the handle, while the top of the handle is surmounted by the world belted with the white ribbon. The back of the handle has the World's floral emblem, the water lily, and the initials of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association. These spoons are both beautiful and valuable, being of solid sterling silver.

REMEMBER, we will send an after dinner coffee spoon, polished or oxidized, for eight NEW subscribers at one dollar a year.

FOR TEN NEW subscribers at one dollar each, we will send a similar spoon with gilded bowl.

FOR TWELVE NEW subscribers we will send a tea spoon of the same design, or with the Temple in the bowl, instead of the Crusade Church.

FOR FIFTEEN NEW subscribers at one dollar each, we will send a teaspoon with gilded bowl.

FOR EIGHTEEN NEW subscribers at one dollar each we will send an orange spoon, polished or oxidized, with the Temple or the Crusade Church in the bowl.

FOR TWENTY NEW subscribers at one dollar each, we will send an orange spoon, gilded bowl.

This offer is open until March 1st, 1893.

TESTIMONIALS.

OUR DAY is unique among our periodicals. Its place is filled by no other monthly or quarterly. It gathers up the considerable opinion and views of leaders, experts and specialists in various departments of religion, sociology, politics, international law, political economy, temperance, the Sabbath, the Mormons, the Jesuits, and all other questions of vital interest.

No thoughtful man or woman of "the living present" can afford to be without it.

CYRUS HAMLIN.

LEXINGTON, MASS., Oct., 1892.

OUR DAY is a periodical by itself, occupying ground covered by no other periodical. It has met the tests and proved its right to be.

Able, widely informed, sustained by experts, it repays the closest attention of the reader.

Opinions, convictions it has on all the living questions of the time, and a very incisive and fearless way of uttering them.

Yours truly, E. B. WEBB.

THE Parliament of Sweden has passed an education bill providing that instruction on the nature and effect of alcohol shall be given in the public schools.

DR. NORMAN KERR affirms that hot water is more efficacious and infinitely safer to use in the collapse which follows cholera than any form of alcoholic stimulant.

IN face of the fact that there were over one hundred thousand arrests for drunkenness in Ireland last year, four hundred and fifteen new licenses have been granted.

ENGLAND has two hundred and six million children in its Band of Hope; they are organized in each church so far as possible, and tend to represent the union movement.

A LONG-TIME laborer in foreign mission fields says that Christian churches might as well keep their money at home until they use their influence to remove the drink traffic.

GENERAL BOOTH'S farm colony, which six months ago was in confusion, is now in complete running order, with the officers' and farm laborers' comfortable houses, granaries, barns, brick yards, etc.

IT is said that there is enough iron in each person of good size to make a ploughshare. This being true we surely ought to see less pliable backbones than the average voter of this age seems to possess.

GEN. EATON, United States Commissioner of education, states that eighty per cent of the crime of this country results from intemperance and that ninety-five per cent of our depraved youth are born of drunken, depraved parents.

A NEW YORK up-town church introduced a new service recently on Sunday evening. A free parliament or symposium was held in place of the sermon, the congregation being invited to state its reasons for believing in God, each speaker being limited to five minutes.

A FEATURE of the Christian Workers' convention in Boston was the object lessons given by John Quinn, the converted gambler. By exhibiting the implements and explaining the devices, he demonstrated the impossibility of winning a game by any but the manipulator. Mr. Quinn believes that gambling could be stamped out were it not for the police connivance.

A MANUFACTURER in Belgium marked seven hundred five-franc pieces before paying his workmen. Two days after the keepers of adjacent grog-shops at his request handed him all such pieces as had been given them. They returned more than three hundred, showing that each workman had spent more than half his wages at the public house in less than two days.

IT is estimated that one million dollars of tobacco revenue of Great Britain is drawn from juvenile consumers; if ever there was an illustration of saving at the spigot and losing at the bung-hole, this is one. The Anti-Narcotic League has drafted a bill for presentation to Parliament asking that the use of tobacco be prohibited to young persons under sixteen years of age, and that it be made a punishable offense to sell it to any such person.

Frauds and Imitations.

The Compound Oxygen Treatment of Drs. Starkey & Palen, established 23 years ago, by its wonderful success in the treatment of 60,000 patients within that period, has established a world-wide reputation for the cure of chronic diseases, so many having given incontrovertible testimony as to its remedial powers. They are the only and original manufacturers of this remedy. They originated the name, and first applied it to their preparation, the formulas for the preparation of which are known only to themselves. The name, therefore, is of no avail unless accompanied by the genuine article. There are some others who profess to sell and administer it. We have received many letters from those who have tried these imitations, and found them worthless: we therefore warn the public against them. Let it be clearly understood that Compound Oxygen is only manufactured in Philadelphia, Pa. Any substance made elsewhere or by others, and called Compound Oxygen is spurious and worthless. SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Terrific blizzards are reported from the northwest.

M. Charles de Lesseps made his confession in a Paris prison January 5.

A Chicago justice decided last Thursday that the docking of horses' tails is illegal.

The new Columbian stamps are being widely circulated and are universally admired.

Thirty-one men were badly injured by a natural gas explosion in Chicago last Wednesday.

It is announced that the Prince of Wales will come to America in his private yacht next summer.

Cold weather temporarily interrupted construction work on the Exposition buildings last week.

Hope for the recovery of Mr. Blaine has been abandoned and at this writing his death is momentarily expected.

Germany is alarmed at the growing dimensions of the Saar mining district strike, which has existed over a week.

Heavy snow-falls prevailed along the Atlantic coast and great lakes last week and as a consequence many steamers were delayed.

The steamer Rio de Janeiro, carrying the body of the late Mary Allen West, arrived in San Francisco January 8, four days late.

Three million tons of ice broke loose in the Ohio river near Cincinnati, January 8, and many vessels were crushed by the gigantic glacier.

A committee from the Illinois W. C. T. U. visited the state legislature last week in the interests of the three measures which they wish revised—municipal suffrage, a home for erring women, and a higher age of consent.

THE National Minutes for 1892 are now ready for distribution at fifteen cents a copy—the cost of postage merely. They contain, besides the minutes of the Denver Convention, the President's annual address and general officers' reports. Every white-ribboner should be equipped with this indispensable sinew of her peaceful warfare against the powers of sin.

JUST as we go to press, January 10, the House is taking up the resolution of Congressman Durborow, favoring Sunday opening for the Columbian Exposition. Four days have been set apart for its discussion. It is not too late for white-ribboners to send a telegram to the representatives of their districts urging a vote for God and Home and Native Land. We recommend an appendage to the telegram of Jeremiah 32:36.

MONDAY'S papers announced the arrival of the vessel at San Francisco, January 8, bearing Miss West's remains, and it is surmised that the final funeral services and interment will occur in Galesburg the last of this week. We regret exceedingly that we are unable to furnish our readers accurate information, but up to the time of going to press our telegrams asking for particulars have not been answered. Our memorial number will be issued next week, provided the body reaches Galesburg this week.

THE Chicago Christian Endeavor Union, knowing that in the homes and societies of many Endeavorers there accumulates a great deal of unused, first-class literature, such as books, papers, periodicals and magazines, has decided to establish a "Christian Endeavor Literature Exchange." Let any who have or can gather any such good literature to be given away advise the Exchange of what they have. Let any who are so situated that they can make use of good literature also advise the Exchange of their address and what they need. The Exchange will then furnish those having the literature with the addresses, not the literature, of those standing in need of it. Address Chicago Christian Endeavor Literature Exchange, Post-office Box 1013.

HOSTS of readers, doubtless, looked in vain through last week's paper for the Temperance Temple Items. They were omitted for the first time in four years through the writer's inability to prepare them. Mrs. Carse has been seriously ill for two weeks, but at this writing is happily improving and able to leave her room. We miss the cheerful and energetic presence of our W. T. P. A. president, as well as our "Temple builder," and shall rejoice when she is once more fully restored to health. Her column may be found on page 12 of this issue.

SOUTH CAROLINA has a new law regarding the sale of liquors. The bill is known as the Evan Dispensary system. It goes into effect July 1, 1893, and substitutes for the eleven hundred bars of the state, thirty-nine county dispensaries, provided each county desires the dispensary. There is to be a board of control, which shall see to the execution of the bill. The legislature is asked to appropriate $50,000 for the purchase of the liquor which is to be sold at the various dispensing points and carried away for consumption. All liquor is to be sold in unsealed packages in quantities varying from half a pint to five gallons. This act is not to apply to prohibition districts.

THE regular series of gospel temperance meetings opened in Willard Hall Sunday afternoon, January 8. The beautiful hall was well filled, and every one was delighted with the splendid address of Mrs. Helen M. Barker, who said she counted herself fortunate in being the one to inaugurate these meetings. Mrs. Carse was present, "merely because I could not stay away," she said, with moistened eye. Every one who knows how eagerly she has looked forward to the completion of Willard Hall and these gospel temperance meetings knows just how happy she must have been over this initial gathering. It is not deemed practicable to hold Sunday meetings regularly for the present, but daily prayer-meetings will be held from twelve to one o'clock from this time henceforth as long as the Temple shall stand, and all white-ribboners in the city are cordially invited to remember this sacred trysting place at twelve o'clock.

IT is a matter of doubt whether the high tax liquor bill now pending in Congress is a movement in the interests of the government, the whisky trust or the speculators. It is ostensibly a means by which the national treasury may add about thirty-five million dollars to its vaults, with which to meet the deficit of the outgoing administration. It is certain that it had its origin in one of the great whisky centers, being introduced by a Congressman from Bloomington, Ill.; and it is equally sure that the whisky trust, and the jobbers and wholesale dealers outside the trust, are buying up and storing all the stock in sight, making evident that the proposed increase in the government tax is expected to benefit the liquor traffic. In this light what becomes of the "tax it to death" policy of some well-meaning temperance men? Will the tax apply to stocks now in bond? is anxiously asked in financial circles, which inquiry also involves a point of constitutionality—retroactive legislation. Under the uncertainty it is expected that the liquor traffic will pay up its tax at the old ninety cent rate, for which purpose the enormous sum of two hundred million dollars will be needed, and will remove the stocks now in the bonded warehouses before the new bill should become operative. But the traffic will sell this released stock at the increased price the additional tax of thirty-five cents will make necessary. There are two points then for thinkers to consider in the proposed bill: First, who will be benefited? Evidently the liquor traffic, or it would be selling, not buying and storing. If the government, for whose revenues this increased tax is supposed to be levied, then this means the withdrawal of two hundred million dollars from general circulation, and the other point comes strongly into view: Can the country stand such a diminution of its circulating medium without a panic? Financiers say not.

SINCE it has been decided to finish the canvass for signatures to the World's Petition by April 1, of this year, Miss Willard is very desirous that where this work has not yet been undertaken, or where it is not completed, an extra effort be made in the few months that remain to secure a good showing of names from each country auxiliary to the W. W. C. T. U. Do not let the shortness of time deter any white-ribboner from immediate action in this matter, for often much better results may be obtained by a short, systematic canvass than in any other way. We can confer no greater favor upon Miss Willard, who is so burdened with duties and responsibilities, and who has found it so hard to go on with her work during the trying days of the past year, than by entering heartily into this commendable effort. The petition is to be on exhibition at the World's Fair and we want to see every country where our organization is known represented there.

IF THE friends of Sunday opening of the World's Fair would be frank and include in the reasons why the gates should be ajar on the Rest Day of the week, as the first consideration, that it will bring in very much more money, we should consider with greater interest the other arguments that they put forward; but it is well understood that the almighty dollar forms the turning point in the decisions of the directorate and the commissioners. Nor can we greatly blame them for they carry heavy burdens, but we should admire them more if they would give the "inside facts" in their pronunciamentos. They are always for the working man and never for the dollar in what they say, but the opposite is largely true of what they do. The same criticism applies to the attitude of the management on the subject of liquor at the World's Fair. It is perfectly understood that every concession brings in an immense deal of money to swell the aggregate of receipts, and the men engaged in the liquor traffic are not at all behind the management of the World's Fair in their appreciation of the "figure side" of the whole problem.

WE wish that the church on wheels might become more frequent. It seems that Bishop Walker, of North Dakota, has had one built for his use; he calls it a Chapel Car, and before it was put together he secured the promise of the railway companies to take his car from place to place as he might wish. He then called on George M. Pullman, whose practical mind entered at once into the plan. "Build a car," exclaimed the great maker of moving palaces; "I had never thought of that, but why not? We build palace cars for horses and peddlers, for photographers and theatrical companies, but this is the first time the church has come to us. I shall not only build you a car, Bishop, at a price I do not care to have quoted, but here's my check besides." Other rich men contributed, until there was no further trouble on that score. One of the trips made covered three months of time, during which the bishop visited between twenty and forty places and held between fifty and sixty services. Everywhere the car was crowded, and although it has sittings for but seventy-five as many as one hundred and ten have been accommodated, and this in places where but a dozen or so families lived. The bishop was wont to send ahead about ten days from one group of houses to another to say he was coming. He says that the enthusiasm and spirit in song that he has witnessed and enjoyed in that car surpasses everything he ever knew before. The close contact of the people seems to have a peculiar influence upon them and the effect is very like a revival. The bishop is very democratic, and acts as preacher, janitor and fireman all in one. Of course this endears him to the people hardly less than the fact that he enters into their duties, joys and sorrows with full spirit. Would it not be well to have a temperance car, in which the apostles of the better time should peregrinate the prairies? Who would like to build one for the white-ribboners?

SHEAVES AND LILIES.

BY JULIA MILLS DUNN.

Climbing up the golden stair,
One by one they gathered there,
Bearing each his rustling sheaves of ripened wheat,
Saying, "Lord, behold my sheaves!"
Each the Master's presence leaves
Casting down the fragrant burden at His feet.

Then I stepped from out the band
With a lily in my hand;
Pure its waxen petals shone 'twixt broad, green leaves,
Like a taper in the gloom—
So its whiteness filled the room
As I whispered, "Master, lo! I bring no sheaves—

"Only this, Lord, have I brought;
Yet among the fields I wrought
Striving patiently and long, amid the throng;
They have brought their sheaves of gold—
Only this poor gift I hold,
Yet I bore the heat and burden, Lord, so long."

Then into my heart there crept
Sudden shame and fear. I wept
Bitter tears, in self-abasement bowing low;
Yet I felt the Master's smile
Shining on me all the while
As He answered me, compassionate and low,

"'Tis the toil and not the burden
That shall win the precious guerdon,
'Tis the spirit, not the fruit, thy Lord perceives;
Whoso faithfully hath striven,
Unto him the crown is given,
Though his gleaning only yield him scanty sheaves."

As He vanished, lo! a light—
And transfigured to my sight
All the lily shone in opalescent beams;
And its delicate perfume
Seemed to hover in the room
When the morning sun awoke me from my dreams.

Moline, Ill.

LICENSE NO. 400."

BY J. F. COWAN.

It was blazoned in large, gilt letters upon the handsomely-painted wagon drawn down the street of the crowded city by fat, glossy bays.

I thought I detected something familiar in the good-natured, stupid face of the portly looking driver, as I stood upon the curbstone waiting for him to pass. "Good-morning, Dan," I accosted him.

"Mornin' to you, sir. Oh, if it ain't the old master!"

"Yes, Dan," said I, "and the old driver seems to have found a better master, judging from this fine-looking turnout."

"I dunno, I dunno," said Dan, shaking his head slowly. "The 'master' may be all right, sir; but it's about the business I don't know, you see."

"I'll just jump in with you, Dan, and ride a piece; and we'll talk it over," said I.

"Glad to have you," said Dan, his face shining with a look of gratification as hearty as his words.

So I climbed up on the vacant end of the seat of the handsomely painted wagon, with its big, glossy bays, its brass-mounted harness, and its general air of prosperity and pride.

"First, tell me where you are going, Dan?" I asked.

"Well, sir," said he, scratching his head and fumbling in a pocket in the front of a canvas apron he wore over his coat, "I'll have to get out my order book to see, sir; first place, No. 1910 Archer street. That's away out toward the suburbs, sir; a long drive."

"A pleasant one," said I, "Dan, if a man has a good conscience to take along with him. If you don't mind I'll just ride with you, and we'll talk over old times; and you can tell about how the world is using you. What is it you have to take there?"

"Let's see. Order 1," mumbled Dan consulting the book again, "'One 5 G cask s-h-e-r—sher—sherry.' It's a cask of sherry wine, sir. It's a weddin', or somethin', they're to have out there. It's among the way-up people they are."

"So it says 'sherry wine' on the book, does it, Dan?" I remarked. "But I have an idea that if you and I could be out here about midnight or later, after the wedding is over and the wine has gone down the thirsty throats that will come to the feast, more in expectation of it than for any pleasure they hope to derive from seeing two hopeful young lives united as one in the beginning of a union of devotion, self-sacrifice and enjoyment of the kind which comes of living for others—"

"Some of them it is that'll have to be helped home in their carriages by that time," commented Dan, catching my idea in naming that late hour.

"And how about the homes they are carried to, Dan?" I asked. "You used to go home in that condition yourself formerly, and how was it?"

"Oh," said he, "there'll be crying wives, children put away out of sight so as not to see the drunken man that they'll have to call 'father' next day. There'll be heart-aches all night, and headaches the next morning."

"True enough, Dan," said I. "If the right name were on your order book, then, order No. 1 would be one five gallon cask of silly babblings, of beastly helplessness, of blasted hopes, of heart-aches, of headaches, and, perhaps, bad debts and the sheriff's hammer and poverty and want, and maybe crime in the end."

Dan turned and looked around at the cask in the wagon behind him, as though he expected to see the head flying out, and the hoops bursting and all this array of evils already crowding out.

"It's a sorry enough business, it is," he said, "amongst the way-up people. But this here next order I am afraid has got more devilment in it than t'other."

I looked at Dan inquiringly. And after he had mumbled over his book awhile he gave me the information.

"It's a half of beer," he said. "It's going to a Hungarian shanty out at the edge of the town, where there's a baby to be christened, like as not. And a whole crowd of the brutes will gulp it down like thirsty cattle, and then fight and brawl over it. And like as not there'll be another wagon makin' a trip out that way before mornin'—the police patrol. It will be a God's mercy if some one isn't killed. I hardly ever make a trip of that kind, that the patrol wagon doesn't have to make a trip after me."

It was a ghostly idea of Dan's, that some way appalled me as much as my fancy about the contents in the wine cask had him, a moment ago.

I kept turning my head over my shoulder, as if I could hear the clanging of the gong in my ears. And I expected every time I turned to see in our wake a spectral equipage with its white canvas cover, the driver sitting like some weird spectacle with braced feet, reins wound around his wrists, urging his fiery steeds to their highest speed, while in the thundering vehicle behind him I seemed to see a gory corpse stretched on the straw in the bottom, at the feet of the two stalwart men who supported the limp and besotted form of what had been, a few moments ago, a raging, murderous maniac, made so by the contents of the half barrel of beer in Dan's wagon, partaken of at the christening.

"Yes, sir," said Dan, as if meditating aloud, "everywhere I make a trip like this the patrol wagon has to foller. And there's the next place, which ain't much better."

I felt like saying, "For heaven's sake, Dan, if it is any worse let me out!" But someway I had a sort of horrid fascination in learning his business which would not let me speak.

"We'll drive round by the way of the alley," said Dan, winking at me in a mysterious manner, "and we'll rap at the back gate, and—it's meself that don't like to be doin' so mean a thing, but it's me orders from the house. We'll yell 'rags, old iron, paper rags,' three times—that's the way the old driver taught me, sir—and out'll come the frowsy head of a woman, that ain't no better than she ought to be, sir; and if the coast is clear, sir, she'll fetch out her bag of paper rags, jest as a blind, ye see, and out'll go these three kegs of beer through her coal-house window in a jiffy."

"But why so much secrecy, Dan?" said I. "'Your wagon reads 'License No. 400,' and a licensed whisky-seller doesn't need to smuggle kegs of beer to a customer by the way of the coal-house window."

"Ah, but you see, sir, it's the woman herself that ain't licensed. There's where the mischief is, sir. It's a 'speak-easy' they call it, and if there was evidence against her, sir, it's to the work-house she'd be after a-goin'. There'll be a brawl in the house to-night, and jest as I'm tellin' ye, sir, the patrol wagon will follow after me."

"Is it possible, Dan," I said, "that you have become an accomplice in breaking the law?"

"I do as I'm bid," said Dan. "The house sells whisky to whoever wants it, and asks no questions. It ain't bound to meddle with nobody's business. It ain't bound to drive a customer away, sir. I'm paid to drive the wagon, sir, and not to make people mind the law."

As he spoke Dan reined the sleek horses up in front of a handsome building, with a gaily painted front, set with heavy, plate-glass windows, the lower parts screened by rich curtains of oriental tapestry, the threshold a mosaic of tiles that would have been considered a work of art in a church vestibule or a public building, and the bar, I caught a glimpse of it as the door opened to let out a portly, smooth-shaven man, glittered with trimmings of burnished brass and nickel plate. Truly, it was a palatial affair.

The owner, who stepped out to superintend the unloading of several cases of bottled wine, was dressed in the finest broadcloth, his cuff-buttons were of the heaviest gold, and his shirt front and his white hands glistened with gems.

"Dan," said I, as we drove away, "how about this place? Surely the patrol wagon doesn't follow you here? This is a prosperous neighborhood; respectability and plenty reign here."

For an answer Dan pointed me across the street, where was situated a large iron-mill. I remembered the place. I had been accustomed when passing it to look through the windows and doors and see in the ruddy glare of the open furnaces the half-naked forms of the sinewy workers hurrying about their tasks.

But now the windows and doors were closed; everything was silent. No smoke belched forth from the chimneys. No clanging rolls, and hissing retorts were heard.

"It's there nailed on the door you'll be apt to find the reason of it," said Dan.

And reason enough it was to be sure: a notice that the sheriff had closed down the works, and that the property would be offered at public sale, at a sacrifice, on a certain day.

"It's losin' money they were," said Dan, "and the men struck for more wages, and the business wouldn't stand it; and so they just broke up."

"But how is it, Dan," I asked, "that business is so prosperous upon one side of the street, and so unprofitable upon the other?"

"It's the difference in the businesses," said Dan knowingly. "On this side" (pointing to the iron furnace), "the owners pay five hundred men to work for them, and lose money on their work; but on the other side" (indicating the saloon with his thumb) "the owner has five hundred men working for him, and they pay him for the privilege."

"Good day, Dan," I said, "I must get down now. The very touch of your soft-cushioned spring seat would blister me after this. There's a heart-pang, or a crime, or a death, almost, in every stroke of your horses' hoofs. Dan, Dan!" I exclaimed, "don't you see that you are a part of a machine—a cog in the wheels that are grinding men, women and children to their deaths?"

"License No. 400," I repeated to myself, as the gilt emblazoned letters receded from my view. "Heavenly Father, if this is the record of License No. 400 for the afternoon's work of one of its drivers, what a history it would be if the whole could be written! What man or woman could longer hesitate to declare that the great, burning question of the day is, how to stop licensing four hundred, and, perhaps five hundred such institutions, with a thousand worse ones, and a thousand more still worse, that are unlicensed, but that owe their life and their power for evil to the first?"

"License No. 400!" What would be the record of the other three hundred and ninety-nine?

Pittsburgh, Pa.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION.

BY H. A. SCOMP.

Two big parties, two smaller ones. The two big parties making the tariff their chief nominal, but the spoils their real issue. They dare not seriously "tackle" their own issue. Ditto of money. Neither has any real purpose as to overthrowing great wrongs and abuses which have grown up under their protecting ægis.

A party or a church, once corrupted, has never been reformed within itself. Great wrongs done to the public in transportation, in alienation of lands, monopoly of mines and control over the necessaries of life; the domination of vile elements in our politics and the "bossism" of vile men, and so on down the catalogue—what intelligent man believes it possible for these evils to be eradicated by the parties which have fostered them? Sham issues and sham battles. What can come of them? Of course, morals can have no chance.

One of the smaller parties deals radically with economics; the other, with morals. Surely, both have abundant cause for being. One stands against the financial serfdom of the masses; the other, against their moral degradation. Certainly, between these fundamental tenets there is no antagonism; rather, are they natural allies and mutually helpful. They agree, practically, as to labor, as to land ownership, as to more money, as to lightening the burdens upon agriculture. Both are against trusts, monopolies, corporate aggressions, etc. Their faces are toward the same pole star. Both are carrying some side issues which may have to be left behind in a forced march. The political "How?" is the question. Neither expects to get its demands through a big party.

As Prohibitionists, we shall not recede a step from our demand for the extirpation of the liquor traffic. For this cause we came out from old political affiliations and became a peculiar people. We will have no union with any party which treats this cardinal idea as secondary or able to wait. The reform union must emblazon this upon its banner. On this rock we are built. "Death to the traffic" is our ultimatum in every treaty for union. This being thoroughly, honestly, and heartily accepted, there will probably be no insuperable barrier to the uniting of reform forces, so far as pertains to their purposes.

But the "how?" Let none of the reform parties deal too much in detail in its demands. We all wish an increased volume of money, safe, sound and honest, whether the coinage ratio of the metals can be fixed or not. We all desire a speedy end to the outrageous capitalization and watering of railroad stocks, along with the railroads' powers for tariff levying, unjust discriminations and corrupting legislation.

On these and on economic questions generally, the reformers are one in purpose, and the masses will go with us so soon as they can understand their own interests. Be it ours to show them the truth. The ignes fatui, which they have been following will never lead them beside still waters. The old party machines, with their medley of conflicting interests and cabals, cannot "fool a majority of the people all the time." Foiled and frenzied they will turn upon and trample their old deceivers. Disappointed and disgusted they surely will be, and just so surely will they fall in with us. Our house of refuge must show light clear and pure from every window; these wanderers groping in darkness after their fading will-o-the-wisps, will turn to the steady light close at hand.

There have never before been so many signs of promise. This is not the hour for discouragement. Let the great need and aims of reform be discussed by patriots and thinkers—not by politicians and place hunters—in a broad, catholic spirit. Let there be no harsh criticisms of opposing plans and planners, looking to the same end. Agitation based on great reforms is the program for the immediate future; for the truth must first be seen and acknowledged. Organic union must come later. The need for union must first be generally recognized. Till then plans for union will prove abortive. True lovers will not be separated by petty differences; unity of interests, ergo, unity of aims and of action—this spirit must be cultivated in the hamlets, the school districts, everywhere. Thus the revolution will be gathering force long before '96.

Just now we need not be specially anxious for national conferences to discuss union of forces. Indiscreet utterances, selfish demands, rather too much of the personal element—these are the danger-rocks of premature and immature councils. Not many of us are endowed with the wise diplomacy needful for such work. The Populists have done us much good already through their iconoclastic work. They have shattered several popular idols at which we had long been thrusting. Several of our tenets are less unpopular now by reason of the new party's championship.

"Agitate, agitate, keep the ball a-moving." Reform lines are converging like the meridians toward the pole. "Some good to all, the greatest good to the greatest number," honestly, intelligently sought will in time evolve the true union of reforms.

NERVE HYGIENE AND HAPPINESS.*

BY DR. AUGUSTUS FOREL.
Professor of Psychiatrie in Zurich.

"Too many nerves and too little nerve," complains Professor von Krafft-Ebing of our generation. What do they mean, "nerves," "nervous," "nervous prostration," neurasthenie and similar terms?

We must first clear away a common mistake, as if all this had reference to the nerves of the skin or of various parts of the body. It is no more these that are "nervous" than the fingers of an amputated arm which cause the pain that the former possessor of the arm imagines he feels there. Arm and fingers disappeared long ago, were buried after amputation and are now decayed, and yet there is a sensation of pain as if they were still present, the seat of disease.

It is nothing but the brain that is "nervous." We make the mistake of attributing its excitement to the so-called sensory nerves of the body, because usually they convey to the brain the impressions of the external world, such as light, warmth, sensation of touch, sound and odors. It is the brain alone that occasions the sprawl, the convulsive twitchings of the nervous woman, the deceptive senses of the victim of delirium tremens, the evil conduct of a drunken man, the great deeds of the genius, the indolence of the man who hangs around the saloon, the folly and the pain of insanity, the misdeeds of the criminal and the industry of the sober laborer.

In health, in the sound working capacity of the brain, lies the chief condition for happiness. Professor Hiltz is certainly right who believes that the happiness of an individual depends upon his fulfilling the purpose of his life by labor. But since man's labor is not accomplished like that of the plant and the lowest worm, for he applies a higher understanding and feeling to it, the fundamental possibility of happiness for him lies in a sound brain.

How are you going to convert a sound brain into a happy spirit, disposition and will and keep them up? By continually patching at an impaired organ with medicines and cures in nerve or lunatic asylums? Such patchwork is good, or perhaps a necessity, if injury has already taken place, or has become great. But always the best prescription is prevention, in general, that one which any reasonable person can apply without either physician or apothecary.

Would you by means of poisonous stimulants urge the incapable modern brain to some unusual activity, which necessarily must exhaust and incapacitate still more? That would be putting out a fire with petroleum. Yet it is just what we are doing when we use alcoholic drinks, morphine and similar so-called nerve tonics. We injure the organ we desire to strengthen and wear it out prematurely. We see the fruits of alcohol drinking in the saloon and in large part in the nervousness of our age. We see them in the prisons, the lunatic asylums, the idiots, the vagabonds, the idlers—consequences that are only partly the result of the drinking customs of these people themselves, those of their forefathers bear part of the blame.

Of course the use of alcohol is not the only occasion of the "nervousness" of our age. There are others, such as poverty, over-population of the cities, insufficient nourishment, but especially the unsuitable, thoughtless marriages of stupid, eccentric or evil people, whose defective brain peculiarities perpetuate themselves in their posterity and contaminate society with incapable, lazy, untruthful, immorally inclined, in brief, with individuals that are a menace to the general good.

How ought and can we oppose these evils, successfully overcome our nervousness, and grow happier? That riches cannot make us either healthy or happy, that poverty occasions unhappiness and disease, has been so clearly shown that we need lose no words upon this subject. It stands approved by experience that nerves and muscles which remain inactive lose strength and shrink; and just so the brain needs exercise, and in fact, earnest, hard labor, but not too one-sided, in order to become, and remain strong and healthy. Over-weariness and over-exertion, however, injure the brain as they injure muscles and nerves. To furnish power and working capacity, the muscles and nerves require a sufficient amount of such nourishment as will produce matter and force; but over-feeding is an injury. It is just so with the brain.

Sleep is the indispensable rest of the brain during which it recovers the substance lost by the wear of the day and gathers up strength. Good sleep is the fundamental requirement for brain health. Every nerve stimulant, and on the other hand all substances that produce artificial sleep, are nerve poisons and are to be condemned by a healthy nerve hygiene. The worst foes of the human brain are alcohol, morphia, ether, cocaine and the like. Their use is never justified except very temporarily as medicine, or in order to allay the pain and the agony of death in a fatal illness.

Every one who desires to secure and to strengthen a healthy and useful brain, must, first, not only labor physically but mentally; must really labor, and that daily, and not too little. Four hours of work a day for a healthy being is altogether too little. Let any one spend his time in enjoyment and idleness, and enjoyment soon ceases to be enjoyment. He will accumulate artificial wants in ever increasing numbers until they burden his life. He will become more and more dependent and morose. His mental horizon will grow narrower continually and more rigid. The plastic brain of youth, that is, its docility and adaptability, will become less and less active and capable of comprehending and elaborating new thoughts.

On the other hand, mental labor preserves the plasticity of the brain to a much more advanced age. Idlers, therefore, in spite of the best brain capacity, become prematurely old mentally, narrow-hearted, limited in horizon, and not seldom absolutely stupid. We often observe moderately gifted students becoming, by means of work, men of power, and highly gifted young men, by means of idleness, gradually grow useless, peevish, and now and then narrow-minded Philistines.

Secondly, one must not overwork. The work day must not be prolonged into the night. One ought not to continue to labor with an exhausted, harassed mind.

Thirdly, it is necessary to take sufficient nourishment, but one must not overeat—must partake of farinaceous food, the fats and albumen in proper proportions.

Fourthly, eight hours of sleep are a necessity and above all one must not retire too late. There must be no excesses of any kind.

Fifthly, all alcoholic drinks as well as all artificial producers of sleep and nerve stimulants must be absolutely avoided, as a matter of principle. Resolutely and bravely turn the back upon all places of tippling and seek the society of total abstainers, for to them belongs the future.

Those people who wholly abstain from alcohol and the other things mentioned are more capable of work, healthier, happier and live longer. They do not endanger their posterity, run no risk of picking up some venereal disease in a state of intoxication. . . . Poverty and social enslavement are also the daughters of alcohol and the mothers of nervousness and of brain stupefaction.

But nervous people and those who have weak nerves ought especially to regulate their lives according to these principles. Often they are cured by this means alone, without a physician, without drugs. Of course, however, since in their case the brain is already enfeebled, they are in need of a different prescription; they will be obliged to engage very moderately in mental labor, in fact, not at all until there is improvement, meanwhile exercising the muscles in order indirectly to provide the brain with power and substance. The best means of all is ordinary labor on a farm on generous, nourishing diet, and water. This method of cure I have prescribed for distinguished patients, ladies as well as gentlemen, met with the very best success.

But thus far we have as yet done nothing to invigorate and improve the brain of our posterity. To take thought for that is certainly beautiful and important, although most people are too crass, egoistic or thoughtless to take practical interest. But in many cases only ignorance is the cause of criminal neglect of the subject. It is to the latter we address ourselves.

It is criminal towards posterity to bring forth children thoughtlessly or without taking counsel with conscience. The tendency to crime is transmitted, stupidity is transmitted, mental aberration is transmitted, malice is transmitted, indolence is transmitted, selfishness is transmitted; but also, goodness is hereditary, industry is hereditary, mental and physical health are hereditary, conscience and disposition are hereditary, intelligence is hereditary. Training and the experiences of life may more or less develop or arrest the hereditary dispositions, but they can never produce or destroy them. Alcohol destroys the gifts of nature in the embryo of the brain, injures all of them and never can improve them one iota.

When the love of a man and a woman for each other awakens a desire to become united for life, they ought never to forget that they are undertaking a very grave responsibility, the responsibility for their future children. They ought to renounce marriage rather than to produce physical, or what is much worse, mental cripples. Unfortunately, however, we see noble people with highly gifted natures who carry their prudence to so anxious an extreme as not to marry, or at least not to bring forth offspring, while the most frivolous, brutal and stupid, under the protection of lax laws that had their origin in a mistaken humanity, multiply like rabbits and carelessly abandon their progeny to the state or to public philanthropy—progeny made more liable to danger by reason of previous alcoholic excesses.

And with such false political economy, such mistaken breeding, is it any wonder this increase in the number of mentally diseased, of lunatic asylums, of a weak-eyed proletariat, of morally defective vagabonds and criminals? There is talk of overwork as the occasion of these evils, overlooking the fact that this proletariat mentally never has overworked, but rather has been indolent and useless always. "Nervousness," really brought about by means of mental overwork, forms only a small and comparatively safe fraction, while the great, innumerable company of mental wrecks nearly always owe their catastrophe to diseased or defective brain conditions, to excesses, and in enormous percentage, to alcohol.

It is therefore a duty to consider hereditary conditions. Every respectable woman ought to look for solidity, soberness, good sense and a good disposition as she chooses a bridegroom. The capable young man ought to have a care not to marry a money-bag, or a hysterical siren, or a body without soul, but a sensible, modest, industrious, respectable and intelligent young woman.

Meanwhile, let the able-bodied and sound of brain not be affected by any silly, pessimistic philosophy, but seek each other in love and in marriage, bring forth children without careful regard of money, for with the right choice in marriage good fortune will not fail them.

But what shall we do with the others, with the eccentric, stupid, wicked, defective? This is a question as difficult as it is critical. They should be prevented from multiplying themselves, for they will only bring forth mental cripples, unhappiness for themselves and for their children. They bring forth unfortunates who will afterwards execrate their parents. One simple and safe counsel that ought, however, to reach the good as well as the evil, the highest genius as well as the dullard, would prevent much evil: Renounce forever all those systematically stupefying, brutalizing and demoralizing factors of human misery—the alcoholic drinks, and also the so-called "enjoyment" of narcotics. Flee the perilous counsel of the pessimists, who cry: "Another flood is to follow us." That flood of mental disaster which these very people, so heartless and selfish, inflict upon their descendants may overtake themselves before death reaches them; for selfishness brings forth misery; love, happiness.

AN INTERVIEW WITH BISHOP H. THOBURN, BISHOP OF INDIA.

BY FRANCES E. WILLARD.

It was the good fortune of Lady Henry Somerset, Anna Gordon and myself to have several most interesting fellow-passengers in our voyage to England on the steamer Majestic, and though the storms were such that we did not become acquainted early in our travels, we improved the time later on.

None of these was so helpful in conversation and plans as Bishop Thoburn, of India, who has invested thirty years of time and toil among the native population. He is known, trusted and loved by them and by the Europeans quite as well as any other ecclesiastical leader in that great country. It is well known to most of us that the Bishop is an Ohio man, with the endowments and enterprise that go to make up a type of that order. He is a thoroughbred collegiate scholar, a devoted Christian, an intrepid reformer and a great friend to the progress of women.

We asked him many questions all of which he answered in the most friendly and straightforward fashion. He was then on his way to the United Methodist Conference of India in Bombay. He informed us that women have been admitted to this general conference and that the action that admitted them has been approved by the general conference of the Methodists in the United States in an official manner by the acceptance of the minutes of the Indian Conference. The Bishop believes that women should be in all our conferences and has spoken many good and strong words for us on that subject.

In India, in 1892, he four times laid hands on the heads of young women deaconesses at the time of their consecration. For this he was called in question at the recent general conference in America, and I think that a committee was appointed to inquire into his "case." He was asked if he had ordained women to preach. He answered "No." They said that if he had consecrated the deaconesses in the manner described it was a service not set down in the Discipline. He asked if the Discipline said "nay" to any such service. Of course it did not. They made the explanation that if the hands were over the head it would not interfere with the prescribed order, but if they were upon the head, that would make all the difference. The Bishop said that he knew no act of consecration without the laying on of hands.

Finally the form of service he had used was adopted, only it lacks the contact of the hands with the head! This is a very important point in the estimation of some of the brethren. But Bishop Potter of New York City, one of the leaders of the Episcopal Church, has since laid hands on the heads of deaconesses. Meanwhile in the zenanas of India, women are needing and asking for help of their Christian sisters, and they ought not to be allowed to die without baptism if they express a desire to have it, as they have repeatedly done.

Men in India who are educated, now prefer educated wives. The Bishop said that when he went to India thirty years ago it was considered an outrage to teach reading, especially to a widow, but now women go to school so much that our Christian workers have given up school work in the zenana to a degree, because the customs and the outlook have so changed—there has been such an opening up of these hidden-away homes.

An anti-opium meeting was held in one of the cities of India, and women attended. When they were asked to vote against opium and to demand that its sale be discontinued, they said: "Why did you bring up this subject? Opium is about all the comfort we have. Why don't you get up a law that the husband shall not take a second wife; we would all stand up for that." However, when the final vote came, they all stood up against opium, perhaps rather because they thought it the correct thing, than because they were especially opposed to it.

We asked the Bishop about the sale of intoxicants in that country and he said the first step should be to grant a local option law. The natives were to a man against the liquor shops, except in the large cities, where they had become demoralized. The Bishop stood at a desk in a public square in one of the large cities, with a petition against the Sunday sale, because the sailors land and take so much as to make them boisterous and uproarious; but the lieutenant-governor refused the deputation that brought it to him. However, the agitation did good, as all agitations must.

The facts are that you can only touch the government of India through England, and the sooner our reform workers find that out the better. They should bombard the British government to take ground against the opium and liquor trades. One of the best things the government has ever done was raising the age of protection to twelve years. Previous to the agitation that led to this a year or two ago, there was no limit, and little girls of eight, nine and ten could be claimed by the husband to whom they had been promised. There was such an uprising of the native population against the law that made twelve years the limit, that fifty thousand of them turned out into the parks of Bombay to protest. It is hard for us to conceive the condition of things that would lead to such an outrageous exhibition, but with them it was a matter of course. They had never known any other way than that the husband could claim his bride whenever he chose. As an educator, this new law is a mighty power, but it is exceedingly hard of enforcement. What we want is a stronger hand on India from the great metropolis of the world and capital of the Empire.

Women now find openings to teach in the zenana. Leading men among the natives seem glad to have their daughters instructed. Only one young woman has ever spoken before the great annual council of the natives. She was a young doctor, and while she was warmly received by a few progressives, the general feeling was against a woman speaking in public. Pundita Ramabai is the chief woman in India among her people. She is honest, earnest and very gifted. One of her widows was recently converted and baptized. Her trusted friend, Miss Sundarbai Powar, who is an inmate of her home, is a most devoted Christian.

The orders from England in relation to the C. D. A. are not enforced. It is greatly to be desired that they should be enforced, and Alfred Dyer, of London, has taken up that work and devoted himself to it with great energy.

On the subject of Theosophy, the Bishop said he never knew anything more shattered than this "ism" is in India. Madame Blavatsky has been proved beyond a doubt to have been fraudulent in her pretended miracles. There was no asceticism in her life or in that of her followers. They had a good time as they went along, and Madame was especially addicted to immense oaths and frequent cigarettes.

The Bishop said that he would do all in his power to help us in our Polyglot Petition and to secure its circulation among the Methodist churches of the Empire. They have now nearly one hundred thousand members, and men and women are devoted in their loyalty to the cause of Christ, temperance, purity and the protection of these Christian homes, the very name of which was never dreamed of until, New Testament in hand, our own people took the long journey, going in the early days in sailing vessels around the Cape of Good Hope, to plant western civilization in the heart of the Oriental. All is now changed, the whole country is open to the best of influences. Our missionaries have little privation compared with what the pioneers endured, and there is no reason why the progressive and enlightened churches, founded by American missionaries, should not be conservers of that applied godliness which fosters reforms and philanthropies in its own bosom, making it unnecessary for outside societies to take up the work neglected by the church which ought to be its cherishing mother and its most vigorous ally.

THE WORLD ABROAD, OR TEMPERANCE NOTES FROM FOREIGN LANDS.

BY FELIX L. OSWALD, M. D.

Author of "Physical Education," "The Bible of Nature," "International Health Studies," etc.

A VICTIM OF BACCHUS.

Mirza Ben Hanid, the grandson of the Shah of Persia, has broken his neck on a hunting expedition to the Elbrus Range. In Europe the accident would have been ascribed to the bad condition of the road, but the Persians hold that the chief characteristics of a cavalier are, "horsemanship and speaking the truth," and Mirza's father admits that the young prince was rather overfond of wine.

UGLY STATISTICS.

The managers of a Brussels workingmen's union have printed circulars giving a summary of the increase in the consumption of spirituous liquors, and the simultaneous increase of crime and poverty. Belgium, especially in the two western provinces, appears to be swarming with vagrants, and the taxes for the support of the poor have become an almost intolerable burden, yet that pauper-cursed country permits 83,800 rum shops to filch the wages of labor and multiply the sum of misery and disease.

EXPENSIVE FUN.

In the neighborhood of Eisen, Rhenish Prussia, two gypsy herds rented a picnic camp last month for the purpose of celebrating a wedding of their leaders, who resolved to do justice to the occasion by treating their followers to a barrel of wine—the "excellent, wholesome, country wine," advertised by the Rhenish hotel-keepers. Two hours after the arrival of the barrel the gypsies were quarreling; hard words were followed by blows, and the fun ended with a general fusillade that covered the ground with corpses and cripples.

TRIBUTE TO TRUTH.

The French campaign in western Africa has scored triumph after triumph, till the butcher-king, Behanzin, has been expelled from his stronghold, and the French flag waves over the watchtower of the Dahomey capital. The surrounding country is reeking with swamps—in fact, one of the unhealthiest regions of the African continent, and General Alfred Dodds, the commander of the expedition, ascribes the health of his men to the precaution of the chief surgeon, who recommended total abstinence from distilled and fermented liquors. General Dodds, on the present occasion, has set his officers a good example.

CLIMATE AND TEMPERANCE.

Dr. Karl Bischoff, of Breslau, defends the alcohol habit on the ground that "only weakly nations, like the Hindoos, are total abstainers, and that physical vigor and the more or less general use of alcoholic liquors go hand in hand." The fact is that in the lower latitudes temperance enforces itself by the almost immediate deadliness of intoxication, while frost is an antidote and enables Northlanders to indulge their tipples with comparative impunity. Russians and Poles are vigorous, not because of, but in spite of their passion for strong drink, and hundreds of Swedish patriots have admitted that the brandy vice has sadly deteriorated the physical stamina of the Scandinavian race. Alcohol is less injurious in Norway than in Hindostan, but not a pint of brandy has ever been drunk with absolute impunity.

FATAL PROGRESS.

The Tucson Indians of southern Arizona have for ages inhabited a valley surrounded by an old stone wall, and blessed with the only good springs of that neighborhood, but they are now dying out, and ascribe their fate to the smoke of the railway trains passing the foot of their mountains. Smoke and longevity are not incompatible, but since the completion of that railroad the national fence of the Tucsons has probably been covered with the advertisements of the medical brandy quacks.

A TRADE SECRET.

The fanaticism of the Russian Jew-baiter might puzzle foreigners in consideration of the fact that millions of heathens are tolerated in the eastern dominions of the Czar. But a cynical secretary of the Governor of Volhynia, recently divulged the true motive of the persecution. "We would not waste our time dragging Hebrews to heaven if they absolutely want to go the other way," said he, "but we have to get rid of them somehow or other. They keep sober, and our peasants get drunk every week in the year, and of course the Jews, sooner or later, would get hold of all the circulating medium."

INSTINCTIVE ABSTINENCE.

The directors of the Berlin Aquarium Building have managed to get another young gorilla, and hope that he will be luckier than his predecessor, who did not outlive the first winter. A few weeks after his arrival the interesting stranger was seized with a fever, but refused to swallow the prescribed dose of antiseptic bitters, and finally contrived to recover without any drugs at all.

ATHLETIC WATER-DRINKERS.

The eastern half of the Taurus Range in Asia Minor is still covered with magnificent forests, and abounds with game, including a variety of chamois and several species of deer, exceeding those of the European Alps in strength and size. The natives, too, are models of physical vigor. Like their neighbors, the Circassian Highlanders, they are Mohammedans, and strict abstainers from strong drink, but, owing to the distance of commercial seaport towns they likewise dispense with coffee and use no other drink but water and a sort of hydromel prepared from diluted honey and a few simple spices. Their chief amusements consist of athletic games, and their highland hunters think nothing of shouldering a two hundred pound stag and carrying it home five or six miles, over the roughest roads of the Mediterranean coastlands.

BOODLE DISTRESS.

The brewers and distillers of Southern Germany have united for a solemn protest against the proposed increase of the tax on liquor. Their petition strikes quite a patriotic key, and expatiates on the melancholy consequences of the impending change, the ruin of small tavern-keepers and the wails of the peasants bereft of their only remaining form of recreation. Of their own losses they forbear to speak, evidently hesitating to deny the fact that the present profits of their business are enormous. Like the Anti-Corn Law League, they ought to organize committees to weep in public places, and hire a melodious poet to lament the distress of the poor, deprived of the privilege of poisoning themselves.

A TEST OF ENDURANCE.

Mexican papers report the death of a Durango chieftain who had attained an age of one hundred and two years, and who for the last sixty years of his life had lived on the rancho of his son, in the wilderness of the Sierra de Pinos. Getting desirous to inspect the rumored marvels of civilization he started last month for the lowlands, and after a foot journey of eighty miles, reached the city of Zacatecas, where he promenaded the business streets in open-mouthed wonder, but died a few minutes after breaking his fast at a popular restaurant. Zacatecas is an Americanized city, and the hotels probably keep an "assortment of choice liquors."

FOOD ADULTERATION.

It is a lucky circumstance that butter can be colored with a harmless vegetable extract, if we are to credit a statement of the Food and Drink Journal that nine out of ten pounds of market butter are artificially "goldened" in some way or other. The mixing of lard with corn meal and of olive oil with cotton-seed oil are still trifles, but the verdigris used to improve the color of pickles is a more serious matter, and sausage-makers have begun to practice a compound outrage by using spoiled meat and then hiding its unhealthy color by means of aniline dyes. The complaints about the "adulteration" of intoxicating beverages, are, however, rather absurd. There are liquors that would defy a committee of chemical experts to mix them with any more deleterious substance. The Swiss arsenic eaters might as well lament the practice of adulterating their favorite poison with vile chalk and magnesia.

THE NATION'S TOBACCO BILL.

BY WILBUR COPELAND.

Author of the Handbook of Prohibition Facts.

The national tobacco bill, while enormous, is more frequently overestimated with regard to its direct cost than is the drink bill. Its magnitude, however, would be appalling if it were not for the more appalling waste of money and time and life in intoxicants.

The report of the commissioner of internal revenue for 1891 gives the number of cigars on which the tax was paid as 4,474,892,767; cigarettes, 2,684,538,760; amount of manufactured tobacco and snuff, 253,896,042 pounds. Estimating that the retail price of cigars averages seven cents each, that cigarettes average one cent each, and that manufactured tobacco and snuff average forty cents a pound, we have for the tobacco bill:

4,474,892,767 cigars, at 7 cent each.....	$313,242,493 69
2,684,538,760 cigarettes, at 1 cent each...	26,845,387 60
253,896,042 pounds, at 40 cents a pound..	101,558,416 80
Total	$441,646,298 09

To this sum should properly be added the value of tobacco imported—exports not being included in the first sum—which is stated by the Treasury Department as $16,763,141. That is wholesale; the retail price would not be less than double that amount, or $33,526,282, making the whole tobacco bill, $475,172,580. This, it will be seen, is considerably greater than the entire expenses of the government, $265,773,905, and about equals the entire imports of dutiable merchandise.

New York City.

MISS ACKERMANN IN JAVA.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—After a voyage of three weeks from Australia we reached Java, and spent one week on the island. I was surprised to find so little Christian work of any kind being done there. In one large city of three hundred thousand souls there is neither missionary nor church, save the Roman Catholic. There are fifteen thousand Europeans, and not a preacher.

The whole island belongs to the Dutch, and these people have but one idea, and that is money. They have neither aim nor object in life, only to get rich, and are wholly given up to business pursuits, not even regarding the Sabbath.

The climate is very trying and the white people have fallen into careless ways of dress, having principally adopted the native dress, which consists of two garments, a sorang, a scant skirt, the fullness falling to the front and plain in the back, and a straight jacket, called a kabaya; this, with embroidered slippers or sandals, completes their apparel.

The men are engaged in business for a few hours during the day, and most of the women lead lives of complete uselessness, sitting under a punka and being fanned by a native most of the long hours.

The whole island is most beautiful; abounds in the long, feathery vegetation that adds so much to the landscapes of the tropics. Rice, sugar, vanilla, coffee and spices grow over the entire island, and fortunes are being amassed by the clever Dutch in exporting these products.

In the interior are some of the most wonderful ruins in the world, temples that compare favorably with those of India, and indeed surpass all save the one at Agra. But as these money grabbing people care nothing for the past glory of the country, or the preservation of their old landmarks, there is not so much as a railway leading to these wonders, quite unknown to the world.

Reaching the port of Samarang, I sailed for Singapore; the passage through the Java sea was smooth and though the weather was warm I was thankful to be free from the misery of sea-sickness, reaching Singapore in good time. The president of the union, Miss Blackmore, and a number of friends, met me at the steamer, and I was taken home by the president, with whom I spent two delightful weeks.

A few days' rest and we started in for a week's mission, during which twelve meetings were held, and most trying it was in this warm climate where it is an effort even to fan one's self. The result was, about forty or fifty young men signed the pledge and I initiated twenty of them into the I. O. G. T. Lodge; the membership of the union was doubled and the union reorganized. Many of the members had gone away, so the working staff was reduced to the president.

This Great-heart is a M. E. missionary who has been in the field till every shade of color has left her face and most of the flesh her bones; it really seemed cruel that the burden of this work should rest upon her, but now that some new workers have come in I trust she will be relieved of the heavy work. A Band of Hope was formed, and it is much hoped that the visit of Dr. Bushnell will still further stir the people.

Singapore is a most difficult place to work in; there does not seem to be so much drunkenness, as fashionable drinking, and this fashion has spread among all conditions of humanity. This city forms the great "corner stand" of the Asiatic world, attracting people and business of all nations! At least twenty-five languages are spoken in the streets.

If there was ever need of a temperance missionary in any part of the world, it is in the Straits settlement; and why our missionaries could not be supported on these fields as well as other ones, I cannot see. Sometimes I feel like coming home to tell the good people, face to face, the needs of these lands. You of the home country can never know how the native races are being degraded by our vices; to understand it you must see it. God hasten the time when the church of Christ shall rise in her power and might!

After the mission was over I was very much worn out, so I went for a day or two of rest over to the mainland, the territory of Jahore. We started early in the morning for a fourteen miles' drive in a comfortable stage; the road leads through a perfect jungle, but back of this almost endless confusion of vegetation are pepper plantations, rice fields, banana and cocoanut groves, pineapples and coffee. The island is only fourteen miles across so we soon reached the straits, where at the end of a long pier we embarked in a Chinese boat for the mainland.

Jahore is a province or territory at the very extremity of the Malay Peninsula, and while it is under British protection, it is governed by a Sultan, who has almost absolute power, but fortunately he is a good and wise man.

Friends at Singapore had written to say I would be over, so on reaching the landing we found the Dato (Prince) with his carriage, drawn by a pair of small, white Timor ponies; in this we were driven to his home, so beautifully situated on a hill overlooking the straits and in sight of the island.

The surroundings were delightfully restful; before us the calm waters, around us vegetation in its riotous tropical beauty, the air laden with the odor of spices and the perfume of flowers. In the cool of the afternoon we drove out to see the place, made a few calls, and in the evening attended a dinner party in honor of the birthday of some Jahore gentleman.

As there are less than half a dozen white ladies here the face of a stranger, especially a lady, was a welcome sight. On arriving at the place we found His Highness, the Sultan, among the guests, and he entered into the spirit of the gathering with as much freedom as any one. He is a very good looking man, dark of skin, with a high forehead, crowned with a heavy growth of white hair, a very intelligent face and an abstainer. He was in full evening dress, without decorations of any kind, wearing a black velvet smoking cap on his head. Being a Mohammedan, this is never removed. The Sultan and myself were the only ones who turned our wine-glasses. The next day Datin (Princess) Bently gave a luncheon, after which I returned to Singapore.

After crossing the straits we found in waiting a number of jinrickishas, drawn by Chinese coolies; we each took one and the coolie stepped into the shafts and started off on a trot, going fourteen miles in two hours and ten minutes—ten minutes less than the stage time. The stage stops to change horses three times, for that climate is very trying to horse-flesh, but these men came right through with scarcely a stop. At the end of the journey we put a shining Mexican dollar in their hand, they wiped off the perspiration, and with a grin on their faces turned to retrace their steps. It made me quite unhappy to see human beings used as beasts of burden, but they seemed glad to do it, as this is their only means of support.

A union service of all temperance workers, to plan for general effort in the city and to reorganize the W. C. T. U., was the last meeting in Singapore. This done, the result of the week's mission was fifty pledges from young men, twenty of whom I initiated into the Good Templars, about twenty new members for the union, and the union reorganized with a new Band of Hope in its charge.

It is a grand thing to send missionaries to the heathen, but the dark skinned of Asia are by no means the only heathen, and I do wish it would enter the heart of some dear soul who loves our own race to make an effort to have a temperance missionary sent to the whites of Sangapore.

LETTER FROM ENGLAND.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Awhile ago I gave you some account of the remarkable work of Miss Agnes Weston among the "blue-jackets" of our British Navy, and promised a further contribution on the twin subject of Miss Robinson's labors on behalf of British soldiers. I now redeem that promise, and as I gave before the result of my own inquiries in a personal interview with Miss Weston, and with her excellent helper, Miss Wintz, so now I speak what I do know, for I have often visited the celebrated Soldiers' Institute, in the old High street of our great garrison town of Portsmouth, and looked with deep admiration on the busy work carried on there—and directed from there, for the good of humanity. Further, all the facts here recorded are taken from the most authoritative source—from a personal statement by Miss Robinson herself, furnished me quite recently for a purpose analogous to that for which I now use it.

Like Miss Weston's work, this of Miss Robinson had its beginning in a seeming trifling incident. As leader of a men's Bible class, Miss Robinson was asked to write a letter of encouragement to three teetotal brothers of one of the members. This led to a continued correspondence, followed by meetings with these men and others, when their regiment returned home. Men from other regiments joined, and soon two hundred abstaining Christian soldiers were personally known to Miss Robinson. From these men she learned much about soldier-life, its needs, sorrows, difficulties, temptations and sins, and ultimately an overpowering desire to become in some way "the soldiers' friend" took possession of her.

Several years were spent in visiting garrisons and camps all over the country, and in corresponding with the men of eighty regiments. Few know and almost none think now of the difficulties of this early work. In those days, as Miss Robinson says, "one was thought decidedly queer for noticing soldiers at all." The memories of those days are vivid, and Miss Robinson speaks of herself as having been shy and tactless, and as "often plunging into interviews with the courage of desperation." "Imagine," she says, "an ungraceful, thickset young woman, buttoned up in a large waterproof cloak, with serviceable sleeves, cape and pockets; thick boots, skirts well off the ground, felt hat and smooth, dark hair. She is pale and ugly, but has earnest eyes that can look a man straight in the face without being stared or sneered down." Stories of her seeking permission to hold services in barracks are entertaining. Often only persistence long continued gains the needed interview with some officer in command; as often as not scant courtesy or refusal follow, sometimes permission with obvious amazement and lack of understanding as to how such requests come to be made; frequent conflict with the regimental chaplains—who ought to have been the first to help—as a fact, in many a barrack Miss Robinson was the real though not the titular chaplain.

More complete organization followed the making of Miss Robinson's work a department, in a sense, of the National Temperance League, and this led to more extensive results. Soon over ten thousand men had signed the pledge; regimental societies were formed, coffee rooms were opened in many barracks, and thousands of soldiers' children were drawn into the "Army Band of Hope." "In nearly every instance of conversion to God," Miss Robinson says, "the first step was total abstinence and separation from drinking companions." "Out of the Regimental Temperance Society," she adds, "grew the Bible class, the prayer-meeting and the Sunday-school," and "as a matter of course a Christian soldier is an abstainer—were he otherwise none of his comrades would believe in his religion." For all this Miss Robinson looks back with most pleasure and satisfaction on her personal work, dealing with men one by one, and room by room, and many are the wonderful instances to which she bears record.

In 1873, when extensive autumn manœuvers were carried out, when many thousands of soldiers were for weeks in camp, as if in time of war, Miss Robinson took the management of vast provision of temperance refreshments, with facilities for writing, reading and Sunday services. She lived in a "gypsy caravan," or house on wheels, and went through suffering and hardship that would have broken down many another, if it had not driven them from the work.

Perhaps the greatest experiment—happily long ago an assured success—was founding the Soldiers' Institute at Portsmouth. A site was granted by the war office, but revoked through clerical jealousy because Miss Robinson would not exclude Bible classes and gospel services; but the work went on, and triumph over every obstacle rewarded the untiring efforts made. At the Institute officers and men of the army are cared for morally, spiritually, physically and socially in many ways; widows and children of soldiers are sheltered till provision can be made; the sick are visited; mothers' meetings and hosts of other activities are carried on. There is no endowment, and the responsibility of the finances rests on Miss Robinson alone. She has many helpers, but the burden must be a heavy one. Yet shall she surely hear the "well done" of the Master, and already thousands have arisen to call her blessed.

NOR SAW MY FACE.

"Have I been so long time with you and yet hast thou not known me?"

My child went forth into my garden fair,
Having no wish or will to stay by me;
But that I patiently had followed him out there
He could not see.

He pass'd on from the garden to the wild,
Where cruel and fierce roaring monsters lie:
I drove them back but nothing told the child
That it was I.

He saw his brothers toiling on the road;
"I will give life and strength for them," cried he.
But that I made him strong to lift their load
He did not see.

Soul thrilling words of love bade him rejoice,
And filled with music all that desert place;
And yet he never knew it was my voice,
Nor saw my face.

And when the night came and his eyes grew dim
And dark and chill, and mists about him lay,
He did not know my hand was guiding him
Till it was day.

"OLD GLORY'S RELEASE."

BY MARIE J. HESSE.

The dull summer air settled down upon Mortonville in spite of its boom advertising and fairly folded the village in its lethargic embrace.

Swarms of drowsy flies flitted listlessly through the warm air, now and then swooping down to sip the sweets from barrels of apples and prunes set without the grocery door to attract some possible customer. The business men seemed to assume something of the luxurious ease of the town. During the long, hot afternoons not one was to be seen, for each had hied himself to a cool, shady nook in a little square which graced the center of the village, and lay on the benches, with one eye asleep while the other remained on picket duty, ready to call its owner to present arms if a customer appeared.

The citizens at large, too, drank in the general air of torpidity and counted it one of their virtues that they did not countenance any innovation to disturb their quietude and serenity.

Of course there were saloons in Mortonville, but they had always been there, and though they were admitted—rather gingerly, it is true—to be "a nuisance," what was the use of stirring up bad blood all to no purpose? If they were driven out—why, Mortonville would be very dead—business at a standstill and somebody's feelings hurt; hence saloon-keepers flaunted their signs galore, and posed as benefactors to the town! They kept business on the move to the tune of rolling beer kegs. They drew like a mustard plaster; before their doors the hitching posts were never unoccupied; they wore such an air of thrift that they came to be looked upon as a thing for village building—altogether desirable.

At one time when the fire fiend toyed with Mortonville, one of its saloons was burned to the ground, and when the morning sun looked down on the havoc, the charred body of its owner was found. He fell, not fighting bravely, but was too cumbered with his own wares to escape, and so perished miserably. Of course the citizens passed resolutions on the sad dealings of Providence and were blessed in return for their tender sympathy in having two saloons rise, Phœnix-like, from its ashes in place of the old one, a veritable double-headed monster.

Of course Mortonville had a W. C. T. U. A nice, respectable sort of organization in which she greatly prided herself. It gave the town such an air of refinement to be interested in reforms, and the citizens turned out well at their sociables and ate the pies and doughnuts of the reformers, furnished at less than one half their actual cost—to say nothing of tired feet, aching backs and heads. They went home filled with pride over their great generosity and largeness of soul.

The president of this enterprising union was Miss Dorcas Dunning. An old maid, to be sure, but people forgave her this offence, firstly, because she was wealthy, and secondly, because it was widely known that the lover of her youth, to whom she was shortly to have been married, had given up his noble young life for his country, and died fighting under the old flag at Bull Run. Romance had spread a mantle of charity about her peculiarities.

As she stood this morning on the spacious veranda in front of Judge Dunning's stately mansion, about which mercantile life had slowly crept, she looked unusually tall and commanding—a Joan of Arc at her devotions. Scanning the bright sky against which were outlined tall trees glistening with the morning dew, her soul went up in a song of praise. Long she stood wrapped in thought. How good to be at home again; where could the skies be so blue, the flowers so bright, the air so bracing?

Just then she started, her eyes rested on a spot across the way. Over Jim Beersup's saloon was stretched a bright new flag awning—stretched on the rack—dishonored. The hot blood surged to her cheeks while indignant tears sprang to her eyes. The memory of other days thronged her mind.

"Oh, it's a shame, a shame," she said.

One resolute moment longer she stood, then like the general she was, faced about to carry out a plan that flashed across her mind. The way her orders reeled off her tongue made old auntie in the kitchen hold up her black, shiny hands and beg to take them singly.

"Hold on dar, Mis' Dorcas, I's no corn-hopper; yo' cayn't po' yo' ordars into me by de sack full."

But Miss Dorcas was terribly in earnest, and so thought old Dobin as she drove him with a sort of pent-up fury from one street to another, stopping at almost every house, chasing down foot-passengers, hailing one man here and another there, till the whole town had been bidden to Judge Dunning's that night to a patriotic sociable. The great lawn was transformed with gay buntings and flags and lanterns gleamed from every branch.

"Somethin' brewin'," said Mrs. Burnton, as she stopped to discuss the event over the back fence with her neighbor.

"Yes, Dorcas Dunning has an ax to grind, I've no doubt," replied that estimable woman.

Nor was Miss Dunning disappointed. Mortonville came in gala dress, on foot and in carriages; for an hour they poured into her home and overran the lawn. Mortonville brass band discoursed patriotic music more or less sweetly during the evening. Such refreshments had never been tasted before, such hospitality never been experienced by the oldest citizen. Miss Dorcas was everywhere, aiding the youngsters in their games, drawing old people nearer together. At last she mounted the band-stand, and waving her hand led them in singing old-fashioned, patriotic songs. Just after they sang, "Oh, say, can you see, by the dawn's early light?" she stepped forward and said:

"My friends and neighbors, I have bidden you here to stir again the fires of patriotism, to again renew our allegiance to the old flag. (Applause.) For the dear old stars and stripes our fathers, brothers, lovers—(there were traces of tears in the strong voice of Dorcas Dunning, as now, pale with emotion, she turned her face upward) marched long, weary days and nights, often sore-footed, sick and weary to death. They fought bravely, and many laid down their lives on fields far from home and loved ones, and they died alone."

"That's so," "She's right," came from every side.

Looking sharply down among them she continued: "If that flag was dishonored, was stained by cowardly deeds, made a prisoner, would you not rescue it again? would you not fight as bravely as before?"

"You're right;" "Of course!" came from her audience, who now began to warm with the subject.

"Friends," cried she, "there across the way" (and the headlight of an engine flashed upon the awning) "is that flag! dishonored, disgraced, a prisoner! That flag for which you, Thomas Green, walk maimed through life on a wooden peg, and you, Richard Grant, carry an armless sleeve. There in our cemetery stand twenty white stones, shining in the moonlight, telling of twenty brave men who died for that same flag. For it, mothers, you gave up your husbands and sons, the bravest and best—for that flag! Shall we keep it a sacred trust?"

(Cries of "Yes, yes.")

"Shall that old flag, washed in the blood of heroes, be a captive over the vilest of human institutions, over the destroyer of American homes for which heroes died?"

Long before this point had been reached excitement ran high and Col. Brushby crowded his way to the speaker's side; taking the words from her lips he cried, his face all ablaze with earnestness,

"This is God's truth! Come, every man who fought under that flag; come, every woman who gave her loved one; come, every one who loves our native land, and let's free old Glory now!"

Quick as a wink the crowd swayed across the road, tore down the awning, brought it back and hoisted it to an old tree trunk where it hung limp and ashamed, till it felt the kisses of the rising breezes, then floated out proudly, joyously—free!

Such a shout as went up was never heard in Mortonville before or since.

With three of the most influential citizens Dorcas Dunning marched into the saloon and before the angry proprietor could speak she laid down three shining gold pieces, saying sternly,

"See to it that you never insult that flag again!"

Something came over Mortonville. It was not only a change of heart but of mind. Not a man could be found excepting the saloon-keepers, who urged the benefits of "the institution" as a thrift-maker or town-grower.

Of course there were still saloons in Mortonville, but they had lost caste and Mortonville was on the way to real progression.

Chicago, Ill.

A BIT OF HISTORY.

BY MRS. J. T. ELLIS.

(From address at National Convention.)

It is often asked in these days, "What is the W. C. T. U. attempting?" And if a saloon is opened in any town or city, at once the question is asked, "Why don't you women of the W. C. T. U. do something to close up the saloon?" And the question, too, is often asked, "Why don't you keep the saloons closed? I thought that was what you were trying to do."

Friends, we did close the saloons. The objective point of the woman's Crusade was the closing up of the saloons of this nation. The first prayer offered in Hillsboro was "Lord, close the saloons of this town." We did close the saloons. Many a praise service was held over a blazing whisky barrel; many a doxology was sung when the keys to a bar-room were put into the hands of some faithful woman. There was not a woman among us during those days but that believed that saloons closed by them in that way would stay closed, but we found that prayer wouldn't do it. If prayer alone could have closed the saloons of America, they would be closed, for heaven has been besieged by prayer these nineteen years; but as Mrs. Lathrap has said, we who follow her words believe that man raised this Moloch of death in our midst, man derives a revenue from it, man compels the youth of our nation to pass through this Moloch of death, man must pull it down—God never will. We did close the saloons. Our work has gone beyond that.

It was stated here on the platform, the evening of our opening exercises, that only two governors had welcomed us, and I want here to place on record that three have welcomed us, for you will remember down in the city of Nashville there was not a church in that city, when we were invited for the first time to the Southland, that would open its doors to us. They were a little afraid of us, they didn't know what nice sort of women we are, and so a hall was hired and decorated, as our women know how to decorate, and there we gathered for our first session. The seats were filled with delegates, and on either side of the aisle the pastors of the city were sitting who had come in to see what sort of women those were who had come from the North and the East and the West.

At first there was criticism in the faces of those men, and as Miss Willard gave her annual address, as only Miss Willard can give it, the faces of these men began to soften and blossom a little, and finally there came a little applause, and at the end hearty applause. A different spirit came over those pastors, and they came and said to us. "You can't hold your sessions here, Miss Willard, have my church." And another, "Miss Willard, have my church." And "My church is central."

And so it went, and we did go to one of the Presbyterian churches, the largest, and I believe the most conservative church in the city of Nashville, and that night the governor, Governor Taylor, a member of that remarkable family, where one brother ran for governor on the Democratic ticket, another brother ran for governor on the Republican ticket, and the father, who was a presiding elder in the Methodist church, ran for governor at the same time on the Prohibition ticket (and they wanted the mother to run on the Belva Lockwood ticket, but she didn't)—it was this Governor Taylor who first gave us welcome to the Southland; and I want that to be recorded, for it was a remarkable occasion; and as they stood under the old flag that night, there was first Miss Willard, and next to her was Mrs. Sallie Chapin, of South Carolina, whose husband was a confederate general, she the owner of slaves, a Southerner of the Southerns. Next stood she who was clad in widow's mourning for the husband who died for that flag, our Mrs. Buell, whose husband went out long ago from one of our Connecticut regiments; and next to her was Miss Pugh, our National treasurer, who, I believe, in the old days on her father's farm had close acquaintanceship with a station of the underground railway. These women stood together under the old flag, and Governor Taylor stood beside them, as we all rose and sang, as only our women can sing, "America."

Our brother politicians tell us there is a great political chasm between the North and the South, but it is not true. The mother-heart of this nation has bridged it over. One morning during our devotional exercises, a woman sitting down in the body of the house, arose and said, "I never was as far from home as I am to-day. I live up in New Hampshire. In 1861 I sent two of my boys down South to the army of the Tennessee. One of them died down here and is buried in an unknown grave, and I said to father, when the Convention was called to Tennessee, 'I guess I will go. I may get near Jimmie's grave;' and so I have come." And turning to the other delegates, she said, "I want to say I never have had a bit of bitterness in my heart for the mother of the boy who wore the gray any more than for the mother of the boy who wore the blue."

Dear men, here to-night, dear women, here to-night, we stand side by side, shoulder to shoulder, mother-hearts working for the overthrow of this cursed thing. May God bless us as we go out, North, South, East and West, for some day, as sure as God lives, there will come an end to this thing, and until that day shall come, let us be true to the voice that tells us to follow Him.

Denver, Col.

THE BOY THAT LAUGHS.

I know a funny little boy—
The happiest ever born;
His face is like a beam of joy,
Although his clothes are torn.

I saw him tumble on his nose,
And waited for a groan—
But how he laughed! Do you suppose
He struck his funny bone?

There's sunshine in each word he speaks,
His laugh is something grand;
Its ripples overrun his cheeks
Like waves on snowy sand.

He laughs the moment he awakes,
And till the day is done;
The school-room for a joke he takes—
His lessons are but fun.

No matter how the day may go,
You cannot make him cry;
He's worth a dozen boys I know,
Who pout and mope and sigh.

DICK WARNER'S WAY.

BY LAURA J. RITTENHOUSE.

Two young men stood under the awning in front of a small grocery store talking over business affairs in a friendly way, when an old gentleman somewhat shabbily dressed, paused before the young proprietor.

"May I sit here and wait till the next electric-car comes along?" he asked, nodding his head toward an empty soap-box.

"Certainly, sir; make yourself comfortable. The sun is pretty hot this morning, isn't it?" the young man answered pleasantly, then turning, resumed his conversation with his companion, who also owned a grocery store a short distance away. "Yes, I shall lose a good deal of money on those melons. They were either out on the road too long, or over-ripe when shipped, and I'll be minus at least ten dollars on them. That means quite a loss to a fellow just starting in business," he said ruefully.

"You're a chump, if you lose a cent on them, Dick Warner. I intend to make a big profit on mine, you bet!" replied his friend, Alfred Downing. "I propose to let other folks do the losing," and he laughed unpleasantly.

"I can't imagine how you will manage it, Alfred."

"Nothing easier, Dicky. I've hired an old colored man who came in from the country with a load of vegetables yesterday to peddle them out for me. His team is a regular backwoods affair, the wagon wheels covered with country clay, and folks will think he raised them himself, and buy without suspicion. You see it wouldn't do to send out a nicely painted delivery-wagon, with melons to sell. People would know at once that they were old ones some one was trying to get rid of. See?"

"Yes, I do, and I don't think it an honest way at all, palming off those spoiled melons on customers. I intend to conduct my business on a fair and square basis, if I never make a cent," Mr. Warner said, warmly.

"A saint still, I see; the same old Dick you were in school, trying to pose as a model for your neighbors. You ought to have been a preacher. You've missed your calling if you've gone into the grocery business with such fine, cranky notions. I'm working for number one, and my neighbors may look out for themselves. The fellow who shipped us the melons wasn't worrying about what we should lose on them, and if people buy my melons from that innocent, honest-looking old darkey, it's their own fault if they can't eat them afterward. They ought to be sharper," Mr. Downing said, rubbing his hands together gleefully.

"Pleath, Mr. Warner, mamma wanth a dothen of eggs!" piped a little voice at that gentleman's elbow.

"I'm sorry, Lucy, but my eggs would not suit your mamma. Tell her I'll have some fresh ones in this afternoon," Mr. Warner said, pleasantly.

The child trotted away, and the groceryman turned once more to his friend.

"Well, of all the simpletons I ever did see you take the lead," Mr. Downing said, contemptuously. "If that's the way you carry on business here I give you just six months before you're sold out by the sheriff. That child wouldn't have known the eggs were stale, and the worse they are the harder you ought to try to get rid of them."

"That isn't my way, you know, Alfred. I don't want my customers to suffer from my ignorance. I ought to have known better than to buy such eggs, and I will hereafter, but it will cost me just the price I paid for them to learn. I intend to dump the whole lot into the slop-cart when it comes along, and pay the man something extra to haul off my spoiled melons as well," with decision.

"Very well! I wish you joy of your fine conscience. I'm glad mine isn't so tender. By the way, there was a drummer around with an extra nice lot of cigars and cigarettes this morning. I ordered a big supply and sent him over to you. Did he come?"

"Yes, but I did not buy any; I do not intend to deal in tobacco."

Mr. Downing indulged in a prolonged whistle.

"Not going to sell tobacco! Well, that does cap the climax. Why, man alive, there's more money in cigars and tobacco than in anything else; and you'll lose lots of custom if you don't keep them. A fellow drops in for a cigar, and buys something else while he is about it, or he'll do his trading with you just because you keep tobacco and cigars, and it will be handy to get everything at the same place," Mr. Downing protested.

"I know it. I studied the matter over carefully before I decided, but as I think it wrong and injurious to use tobacco in any way myself, I concluded it would not be right to sell it to other people. It's a matter of principle with me," Mr. Warner said earnestly.

"Well, you—you—actually, I don't know what to call such fanaticism, but then it's just like you. You'll die in the poor-house yet, and no one will be reformed after all your sacrifices. It's all right for me, though. I'll get lots of customers you might have had, if you had practical, business sense. I'm actually sorry for you, Dick," and Mr. Downing walked away filled with contempt for his narrow-minded, fanatical friend.

The old gentleman who had been sitting unnoticed all this time had listened with keen interest to the conversation.

"Your friend has a shrewd business head on him. I wonder that you do not profit by his advice. He'll make money, you may depend upon it, while you—honestly, now, if you carry your old-fashioned notions of honor all through your business what do you expect to gain by it?" he said with a little twinkle in his eyes.

"The approval of my own conscience. If I can't have clean money, I don't care to have any," Dick said bluntly, and walked abruptly into his small store, somewhat resenting the old gentleman's remarks.

"Funny fellow, remarkably funny fellow! I have not seen a man like him for years," the old gentleman said as he got up and walked out to hail a street car as it came buzzing along.

Meantime, the old colored man was out with Alfred Downing's spoiled melons—large, fine-looking melons they were, too—and seeing the old, white-haired fellow with his wagon wheels covered with yellow clay from country roads, people bought the melons unsuspiciously. By two o'clock the whole lot was sold, excepting one melon.

"Come dis way now, ladies; heah's yo' fine, large watermillion gwine cheap—only twenty-five cents," he yelled at the top of his lungs, as he passed along a narrow street, lined on either side with poor little cottages.

Many a tired woman went to her door and looked longingly at the solitary melon lying in state in the mud-bespattered wagon; many a dirty, hungry child hung on to the back of the wagon and eyed the melon wistfully, but no one was able to buy it.

Presently the old man paused before a little cottage where a pale-faced, thin woman sat by a window sewing.

"Heah's yo' fine, large watermillion, lady—fraish and fine, jist from de vine! You kin hab it fo' twenty cents to close out de load!"

"Oh! mamma—mamma, please buy it. I'm so hot and thirsty, and it seems good just to think of a melon," pleaded a childish voice.

The woman dropped her work, and going across the room leaned over the cot where a small boy was lying, burning with fever.

"But, darling, you know mamma has so little money now; only twenty cents left, until this sewing is finished," she said, kissing him tenderly.

The child's lips quivered, but he reached up his emaciated arms and drew his mother's face down beside his own.

"Never mind then, mamma; I can do without it, only I am so thirsty, and it made me think of our dear home in the country, where we had melons whenever we wanted them, before papa died," and here the pathetic little voice broke down and ended in a sob.

"You poor little lamb, you shall have the melon anyhow," the mother said tenderly, her heart aching for her suffering, unselfish child. "Mamma will soon have the shirts finished, and there'll be a dollar and a quarter then."

So she took out her two precious ten cent pieces, and had soon exchanged them for the melon.

The old negro chuckled as he drove off, inwardly congratulating himself on his day's work, while the poor seamstress carried the melon into her room, where the fever-smitten boy eyed it with an eager, shining face.

"Oh! it looks so good, mamma—so good! I can hardly wait till you cut it!" he said, trying bravely to be patient.

Then his mother took a butcher knife and inserted the keen point into the big, striped melon, and as he heard the familiar, ripping sound, with the strength of pleasant excitement he sat up on the cot, his parched lips longing for the delicious red slice he knew must be coming.

But when the melon was laid open, displaying the dis colored, mushy mass of seeds and over-ripe pulp that told their own miserable story of fraud, the child gave a little disappointed cry and dropped back on the cot, utterly unable to control the tears that poured over his face.

"Oh! it is too bad, darling—it's too bad to disappoint you so!" the mother said, her own voice hoarse, and a choking feeling in her throat.

"And it was all the money I had, too, so I cannot go out and hunt another one for you."

Some one knocked on the open door then, and she went hastily to answer the summons.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—Have you chosen a motto for the New Year? If you have not, it is not too late yet for each to have some good thought to live up to the whole year. Here are some excellent ones from God's own word: Am I my brother's keeper? Wisdom is better than rubies. A soft answer turneth away wrath. A merry heart maketh a cheerful countenance. Fear God and keep His command ments. By their fruits ye shall know them. All things work together for good to them that love God. Be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath. Love thy neighbor as thyself.

Will you not suggest a text for our Cozy Corner circle?

On looking over the "Publisher's Notes" in last week's paper, I chanced to see a note which included our Cozy Cornerers as well. I wonder how many of you saw it?

Next week we will have a budget of letters from our L. T. L. members. Look out for them.

Affectionately yours,

Aunt Jane

CIDER ESSAYS.

Cider is composed of alcohol and apple juice fermented. In Normandy they raise bitter apples for the preparation of cider, but in this country cider is made mostly from the apples not marketable. The apples are first bruised in a circular stone trough by a similar shaped stone or runner, which revolves by machinery in the interior of the trough. The pulp so obtained is placed in sieve bags, made of haircloth, and pressed, and a dark colored, sweet liquid is extracted and the rest of the apple, skin and core, is left in the bag. The apple juice passes first into a shallow tub and is almost immediately placed in casks in a cool place, when fermentation begins, part of the sugar is converted into alcohol and in a few days a clear liquid is obtained, which can easily be drawn off from the sediment. I think we include cider in our temperance pledge because hard cider is intoxicating and sweet cider brings the desire for hard cider, and it brings the desire for beer and other strong drinks. I think why we include cider in our pledge is because when people drink sweet cider they think a little hard cider will not hurt them and then that leads them to drink stronger drinks. Cider is composed of wormy and rotten apples. The farmers take the apples to the cider-mill, and there they are put into the press and made into cider.

"EACH FOR HER OWN AND YET EACH FOR ALL!"

A Boston paper has recently paid THE UNION SIGNAL the compliment of criticising an editorial entitled "Our Special Functions," which appeared in our issue of October 20. It expresses surprise that THE UNION SIGNAL should feel it necessary to ask the question with which the editorial begins, "Has the W. C. T. U. of to-day a raison d'etrè?" and from the fact that such a question is asked, argues the inherent weakness of the organization. It then goes on to assert that weakness is a necessary accompaniment of any effort to do all the things which the W. C. T. U. attempts as its legitimate province.

The argument is briefly this: "The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is bound to fail because it is attempting to compress into one organization what properly belongs to forty. When it boasts of its forty-three different departments, it should see and would, if it were sufficiently wise, that it is showing forth its weakness rather than its strength. It is absolutely impossible for any one organization, whether composed of women or of men, to do justice to forty-three distinct lines of work. If the W. C. T. U. had confined itself to its legitimate province, and not attempted to graft the whole world upon itself, its perpetuity would be a thing much more assured."

We trust our brother editor is not laboring under the delusion that he has found an entirely new weapon to hurl at the W. C. T. U. This is one which has been thrown so many times that we have become well accustomed to seeing it whirl about in the air and then fall spent at our feet. The things which people do not know concerning our organization always impress us so much more forcibly than those that they do; probably because the former so largely exceed the latter.

Perhaps it is because woman's training has so well fitted her for seeing the correlation of all forces and the interdependencies of all lines of work that it has been left to her to make manifest the great fact, which the church of the future must see if it is to be, in any true sense, the church of the future, namely, that all work for God and humanity is one, that you cannot touch one branch without touching all, neither can you omit from your work any one reform without weakening all thereby. The woman who has been trained to the care of a home knows that there are numberless lines of work, each one of which is in one sense a distinct function, each one of which is dependent upon the others, needing a special training, and all equally necessary to the true home life. The woman who must be cook, seamstress, tailoress, nurse, teacher, financier, executive authority and the thousand and one nameless things which fall within the province of a wife, mother and home-maker, does not find it at all impossible to her thought that one organization should be able to embrace within its compass some part of whatever is needed in the work for God and humanity. If her training had been that of her brother, for one line of work alone, it might seem to her also that nothing could be done save one thing only, and that the organizations pledged to the doing of one thing should be as numerous as the things which need to be done. This view of the case has never before been presented to us, but may it not account for the fact that the Church of Christ has not widened to take within itself and upon itself the increasing demands of the work of Christ in this age, and indeed, for that matter, in all ages? It has been governed entirely by men, who have conceived that its work must be in one line only, and by confining the church to one line of work, be that line never so important, they have crippled its powers and hindered the coming of the day of God.

William T. Stead was right when he declared that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is in the truest sense of the term "the Church of God," and it is this all-comprehensiveness which makes it in any degree worthy of that name. The lack of this comprehensiveness has been the greatest lack of the church in all ages. If the church of the past had seen what should be its attitude upon the question of slavery, anti-slavery societies need never have come into being; if the church of the past had seen what should be its attitude on the saloon and intemperance, or, having seen, had dared to be true to the vision, the W. C. T. U. and other temperance societies would never have been needed in the world's work; if the church of to-day is wise enough to read the signs of the times and take the right attitude upon social questions there will be no occasion for countless organizations, which, unless this vision comes, must speedily be born.

So far as we know no other organization since the early Christian church has had the far-seeing vision which enabled it to affirm, "whatever affects humanity is a part of my work," until the W. C. T. U. dared affirm it. The early Christian church had the true conception of its scope and province as is evinced in its famous declaration of the forces which entered into its composition. According to our critic the church should have been censured because it took upon itself so many lines of work. "And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ" would have incurred the reprobation of this age of specialists, which would consider that any one of the departments enumerated was sufficient work for one organization.

Only the other day we heard a gentleman lamenting that, in this age of specialties and of machinery, it was impossible for any one to gain the breadth of development which belonged to the old days when a man was required to do more than one thing only. It seems to us that the same argument holds when organizations rather than men are under consideration. That organization which does only one thing, however important that one thing may be, cannot take upon itself such symmetry of development as would come if its work were more all-embracing.

Then too, while the work of the W. C. T. U. is so comprehensive it is also the work of specialists in all its departments. No one woman is responsible for its forty-three lines of work, but forty-three women are found, each one of whom is responsible for a forty-third part; the woman does the work of her own department with as much exactness and precision as if that were the only thing to be done, but the very fact that she is only one of forty-three, each one of whom claims for her own department an equal importance, widens the scope of her thought and brings her into a sense of oneness with all the forces which are everywhere working for righteousness.

"Each for her own, and yet each for all" might with propriety be our motto; and when that motto shall be perfectly carried out in all this world's work, then shall we see the dawning of that better day when the heavenly tabernacle shall noiselessly rise to its place in God's universe with each part so exactly fitted to all other parts that there shall be no sound of chisel or hammer; nothing which shall indicate friction or effort, but the adjusted parts shall take their own places in the one great structure, and the tabernacle of God shall henceforth be with men.

THE CHARACTER OF COLUMBUS.

We have received an unexpected confirmation of the statement made in a previous editorial, "Some Lessons of the Columbian Celebration," that mankind are reluctant to give up their former ideal of Columbus and displace him with the disreputable character which he really bears. A correspondent says that the aforesaid editorial "smirches the character of Columbus without furnishing the least scintilla of evidence or authority for such vilification."

As the editorial plainly referred to the literature on the subject which appeared during the Columbian celebration and filled the newspapers and periodicals for at least a week, and which contained abundant "evidence and authority" for the statements we made, we supposed that a mere reference to that literature was sufficient. But as it seems to have escaped the observation of our friend, we will refer him to two articles, whose authors are deserving of as high respect and credence as any one we know. "The Finding of the New World," in the Northwestern Christian Advocate, Chicago, for October 19, by Wm. F. Poole, LL.D., substantiates every accusation made in THE UNION SIGNAL editorial. Mr. Poole is one of the highest historical authorities in the country and there is no reason to think him prejudiced. "The Character of Columbus" by Daniel Wise, in the Methodist (bi-monthly) Review for September and October also corroborates the editorial criticised. That editorial said that Columbus was "a grasping, selfish mercenary, an adulterer and a cruel tyrant."

On the first point we would refer to the demands of Columbus which are to be found in the first named article. We will quote only two of the five. Columbus was to have for himself and heirs forever the title of Admiral of all lands and continents discovered; he was to have one-tenth of all pearls, precious stones, gold and silver found. In the article by Daniel Wise occurs also this quotation from Columbus, "Promise me vice-regal authority, enroll my name among those of Spain's proud nobility, pledge me a large share of the wealth which my discoveries may produce, and I will lead your ships to proud Cathay. Refuse me these golden gifts, these high honors, and I will not do Spain and the world this service." His career after he reached the Islands of America, his insatiable greed for gold, are in entire harmony with his avaricious demands. That he was an adulterer very few try to deny; while various attempts have been made to prove the contrary, it is a generally accepted fact that, though Beatrix Enriquez was the mother of his son Fernando, she was not his wife. He provides for her in his will, where he speaks of her as "a person to whom I am under great obligations." Mr. Poole says that on the very same page on which Wm. H. Prescott says that "the historian will find no blemish on his (Columbus) moral character," he speaks of Ferdinand as the illegitimate son of Columbus. Mr. Poole adds also that he brought the Indian women on to his ships in gangs of forty and fifty for the vilest purposes for his sailors.

As to the third charge, that he was a cruel tyrant, Mr. Poole says, "The first vicar apostolic sent to St. Domingo returned in disgust, saying he could not endure seeing the cruelties practiced by Columbus. His friend, Las Casas, said that Columbus was hated at St. Domingo for his cruelty and injustice, and that his policy killed one-third of the natives of the islands in two years. All the religious orders sent out gave the same testimony. He sent to Spain ship-loads of slaves for sale under the pretense of converting them. He kept up this inhuman traffic after it had been prohibited by the sovereigns." Mr. Wise also says much to the same effect.

We are sorry to have grieved any of our readers, but we confess that we can see not the slightest ground for believing Columbus to be better than our editorial described him. We can, however, sympathize deeply with the disappointment of our friend for we were among the number of those who "turned regretfully from this shattered idol."

INCREASED WHISKY TAX.

Representative Owen Scott, of the fourteenth district of Illinois, has formulated the bill spoken of in our last issue, increasing the tax on spirits from ninety cents to one dollar and twenty-five cents per gallon. It is conceded that more revenue is needed, that a deficit is inevitable unless some new source of income is provided. Mr. Scott is from a district which pays more money to the government than any other, and he ought to know, and doubtless does know, the wishes of the Illinois distillers. He knows, too, that there are two articles in use in this country on which almost any taxes, no matter how outrageous, can be successfully collected, viz., alcoholic drinks and tobacco.

There are so many slaves to these narcotics, that it is entirely safe to place a tax upon them far beyond what could be collected on anything else. These "luxuries," as they are euphemistically termed, cannot be used in these days without conscious degradation. Those who use them have to fight, if they oppose the tax, not only the government which imposes it, but their own manhood. Those who drink no whisky care little how high the price may be. They say, "Let the fools who drink pay for it," or if more philanthropically inclined they say, "Raise the price to the prohibitory point. Then fewer persons will drink."

These opinions and some others are not the outgrowth of either statesmanship or Christianity; they are expressions thrown off from the surface of things. If the "fools" who drink were the only sufferers the remark might seem more appropriate, but all who have really studied the drunkenness of this or of any country, know that for every drunkard who reduces himself to poverty, there is at least one, and often more, who is dragged down with the offender, and who suffers all the miseries of degraded poverty, while yet innocent of any fault. It is cruel to the point of heartlessness, to shut our eyes to the wretchedness of women and children, and only ask concerning the revenue and the state of the treasury.

It is remarkable in the first place that this proposition should originate just where it did, namely, in that locality which contains a very large percentage of the spirit manufacturing in the country. We do not know that there is any opposition or even objection to this added tax. It is said, and from what we know in general, it is easy to believe it, that the distillers have large quantities of spirits on hand and if the tax is placed at any higher figure, so much will be immediately added to the price of their stock which they will forthwith proceed to collect from their customers.

If any should see no special advantage in merely adding to the price of a gallon of whisky so many cents as the government demands let him look at the situation this way. The Spirit Syndicate pays to the government about eighty-four millions of dollars each year, having collected it from the wholesale dealers, who, in their turn, collect from their customers—the retailers and saloon-keepers. These last make their collections directly from the army of drinkers. The carpets and furniture and clothing and books for wife and children, which should be in the homes, go in here, and start on their way to the United States treasury.

Did you ever know any American citizen who would object to be a fiscal agent of the government with a sum of money aggregating $84,000,000 passing through his hands? The distillers have the proud distinction of being the main supporters of the government, no other approaching them in revenue supply, except the brewers, who pay $28,500,000, and the tobacconists, who pay about $33,000,000. They know perfectly well that the consumers of their products will make no emphatic protest on account of an advance in price. They know also that the government is coming more and more to lean on them; that their "industry" more than any other commands the respect due to multiplied millions, and they reason that no legislation hostile to them and their interests will be likely to occur while the present situation continues.

It is quite possible that a sham opposition may be made, something to point to when some customer objects to the price demanded, but well-informed people will be slow to believe that the Illinois congressman who is preparing the bill is contemplating any measure which the distillers do not regard with equanimity. They have learned several things in the last dozen years, and one is that the man who furnishes the money is not likely to be questioned very closely as to how he came to have it.

The simple truth is that a more vicious, wicked, murderous system than that now in vogue in this country and in Great Britain cannot be imagined. This has been intensified within the last decade by the High License feature. So do men become blinded by the glitter of gold, that when they are intrenching alcoholism behind impregnable fortifications they fancy they are promoting temperance, and blandly insist that wise and practical temperance men are solving the problem, or at least would solve it if it were not for the impracticable and fanatical Prohibitionists.

CURE VS. CONDEMNATION.

The duty of society to its criminals is one of the pressing problems of these times, when the question, "Where is thy brother?" has greater urgency than ever before. Conscience is fast becoming educated to a sense of man's responsibility for his brother's moral whereabouts, as well as his physical, and refuses to be satisfied with shutting the offender up where he can do no further harm. The policy of confinement for self-protection is too selfish, the system of fines too outrageous. Nothing less than making the reformation of the prisoner the paramount object of imprisonment is worthy of Christian society.

"Punishment with black aspect and red eye terrifies the guilty," says the old Hindu code. For more than eighteen hundred years the black-visaged, red-eyed pagan held sway over the penal institutions of Christian nations, but at last He of glorified countenance, who said, "Go and sin no more," is moving to His rightful place, as state after state inaugurates the system of reformatory prisons. With the new year Illinois begins a new method of dealing with first term criminals, by which the sentence becomes indeterminate, or rather its duration is determined by the conduct of the convict. Meanwhile the state puts itself on the side of the best in the young malefactor by surrounding him with the influences, educational and religious, which have proved most uplifting and restraining to men outside of prison walls.

The parole system is no longer an experiment, having been in operation in some states, notably in New York, for fifteen years, and with such results that at the end of ten years the Binghampton reformatory was able to report three thousand, three hundred prisoners discharged, of whom eighty-three and one-third per cent had not relapsed into crime. Of four hundred and thirty men paroled in Massachusetts, but twenty-nine were rearrested. About the same figures hold good in Ohio. Great care is taken to provide for identification of returned convicts. The history of every one is gathered by the prosecuting attorney of the county from which he comes, and goes on record with a minute description of him, including measurements and photograph. These records are only accessible to officers having orders from the criminal court. While of great value in identifying habitual offenders, every effort is made to spare the reformed from the brand of imprisonment.

An important point is the separation of the young and inexperienced from the incorrigible and sin-steeped. Some seem to be born criminals, entering life handicapped with downward tendencies, but far more are so by accident, by education—or lack of it. The latter may be trained to useful, productive citizenship if placed in proper environment. If left to vicious associations, and exposed to some great or sudden stress of temptation while the judgment is unhinged and the moral nature stupefied by intoxicants, they go to swell the other class, whose constitutional tendencies to crime are ready to be lighted up at the first touch of temptation. These are the "inflammable classes," rendered doubly inflammable by the general use of stimulants. With the drink factor eliminated, the problem of dealing with criminals of every grade would be greatly simplified. Until the governing class casts out from its eyes the mighty twin beam of the liquor habit and the liquor traffic it will hardly see clearly to deal with any evil. Yet it gropes toward the true solution, and we welcome every advance. Many a young convict of this city will take his first lessons in reading, writing and habits of industry within the walls of the Illinois Reformatory prison, happily without being contaminated by contact with the old transgressor whose only boast is that he "has done everything."

There is applied Christianity, too, in dealing with the individual as such. The most that the state is wont to do is to classify, and then treat with men in bulk "by companies." By the new method it sifts and discriminates in order to get at the merits of one man that it may show him mercy. It is the state's tribute to the awful value of one man and of the important issues that may hang upon one. It is society gathering up her fragments that none be lost, where heretofore the loss has been inestimable. The movement is full of promise, acting as it does with the purpose in the heart of nearly every first term prisoner to "never get in again." Let him feel that government is using its power to help him to a footing perhaps higher than he ever had before—instead of to operate a vengeance-wreaking machine—and all his aspirations are kindled. There is a chance for him yet, and prison discipline, often the first discipline of his life, develops better elements in the train of hope than any one believed him possessed of.

Prison reform is practical, having sprung up inside the system, instead of coming from without. Inaugurated by the famous sheriff of Bedford, it has enlisted the most efficient, as well as most humane of prison officials, down to the present hour, men of sound judgment ripened in long years of contact with criminals. This has saved it from the perilous period of experiment as to method, through which most reforms have to pass. The movement was started in Illinois about six years ago by Major McClaughrey, then warden of the Joliet penitentiary, now Chicago's Christian chief of police. It met with little favor in the legislature until 1891, when Governor Fifer gave it his unqualified support, and in his annual message pointed out: "The fundamental error which a true prison reform must correct is that which treats with indiscriminate rigor all who violate the criminal code, and which in the promiscuity of a common degradation drives every prisoner of the state into a life-long war against society. . . . One who has had experience with the promiscuous class which we call 'criminal' well knows that there is a time in the life of many a young man when even trivial circumstances may send him either in the direction of success and honor or in the direction of crime and its present consequent."

Taking this into account, the new method will give to the man under sentence for first offense a chance to recover what has been well called "the fatal step," making his release depend upon his good conduct and training him for better things when he shall go out. It also subjects the old offender to severer sentence and longer term. The case is safe with the incoming governor, who long ago advocated a sorting process for the removal of young offenders from the old and who has advocated some most practical measures for the bettering of the vicious and crime-bearing members of Chicago society.

We take courage when the state handles crime with a view to cure as well as to quarantine. Sooner or later it will attempt prevention, when it will study causes and come upon strong drink as the greatest. Logically the state must then "go out of the liquor business."

THE daily papers report that a young Jewess, Miss Frank Ray, is speaking in Jewish synagogues and is heard with the greatest interest. The subject of one of her addresses is "The heart-throbs of Israel."

The full development of the Christian character comes with the perfect domination of the spiritual nature over the animal. This is the source of great strength and power as well as sweetness. The truest life is always the strongest.

This is a good clinching argument that somebody has couched in vigorous English. It ought to be struck off as a motto for the walls of every home, church, schoolhouse and reading room. It might well be put on the back of our membership and pledge cards:

"I am but one, but I am one. I cannot do everything but I can do something. What I do I ought to do, and what I ought to do, by the grace of God, I will."

Sir Wilfrid Lawson recently presided over the opening meeting of the Woman's Liberal Association, and said on taking the chair: "Nobody can prove to me that one-half of the citizens of the country should be deprived of the rights of citizens because they are unfortunately women. One gentleman in the recent debate in the House of Commons said he would not be surprised if we had a woman turn into a bishop if the suffrage bill passed. Well, why should women not be bishops? There is no fighting to be done, it is an intellectual, spiritual and theological affair, and surely women are as good in these things as men. I hope to see the day when we shall have female bishops; perhaps they will do more good than male ones—indeed. it is quite possible."

The New York Tribune states that there are six or more successful women dentist in New York City and that these ladies find their profession agreeable and remunerative. According to the same paper, also, these ladies are living illustrations of a truth which is beginning to make its way somewhat rapidly in the latter days, that a true woman is "womanly" wherever she goes and whatever she does.

Great reforms are not isolated, they hunt in packs. This age is the best illustration that history affords of the truth contained in this declaration. This is the age that has understood the correlation of forces in philanthropy and reform, no less than in nature. We are told that electricity is a form of motion, and that light and heat are quite probably forms of motion also. We are ready to declare that all philanthropy is but the motion of divine love, working in the hearts of men, and we do not think it should be separated so widely as in time past into different guilds under wholly independent banners, with mottoes widely different, and a leadership that does not study the unities and harmonies of gospel work so much as it studies how to "build up" our side, our church, our society, our party. Standing in the center of a circle, one can best comprehend the relative length of the different arcs into which it is divided; and standing by reason of one's sympathy in the midst of the great circle of reform movements, one can best comprehend their relative importance and perceive the relation of each to the other and to all. This is the modern method of study in all the sciences and may well be that of all our studies of reform, philanthropy and "Christianity applied."

ON DUTY.

HOW TO FAIL.

BY EVA KINNEY GRIFFITH.

"Glorious it is to wear the crown
Of a deserved and pure success,
He who knows how to fail has won
A crown whose luster is not less."

Perhaps those who read this would prefer to know how to succeed than how to fail, but the latter is the greater thing to know. What to do with the failures of life, how to bear them or how to get rid of them, is a question that confronts all of us in every walk of life.

The student pores over his book night and day, straining every nerve to reach a given point. Examination day comes, and full of nervous fears and inward terrors, worn out with night studying and days of worry—he fails. To him it is the greatest of sorrows and he is crushed to the dust by the catastrophe.

The brightest of business men plans his work well, watches the market closely, provides for reasonable contingencies, keeps close account of expenses and turns a vigilant eye on each change in the supply and demand of the commodity in which he deals. But the unexpected happens. A cyclone razes his buildings to the ground, a flood overflows them, fire burns him out, a panic on Wall street, in which he has no part or lot, a sudden hot term of weather which destroys somebody's cargo of pork and beef, or a freeze that stops boats and trains and delays traffic, any or all of these things may happen one after another, and the smartest of business men fails. His disaster overwhelms him, and he cries out bitterly against the fatality that ruined him in spite of best endeavor.

But tnere are other and sadder failures than those which come to men in the business world. There is the mother who sees her boy or girl going wrong and realizes, with an anguish that words cannot describe, that somehow she has failed to have the influence she ought to have had over her child.

There are the moral failures. How often the ruined woman or criminal man finds out too late that the wise man's words were true, "A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches," and he has failed to make that choice. Not less sad to himself, though fuller of hope to the onlooker, is the Christian brooding over his failure to live a perfect life.

Thus are people in every walk in life mourning over failures, and wondering and questioning what to do with them. But God is in every failure. He is with the one who fails as much as with the one who succeeds. He is in your failure, dear heart. Perhaps He let it come because He saw you going wrong and the sting of disappointment and failure was necessary to turn you back into the right path. Trust your failure to God. Go and tell Him about it. Submissively ask the way out, and the way will certainly open before you. The sublime character is the one that can look calmly in the face of ruined hopes and say, "In the failure of my own plans I see the success of God's greater and better plans." Christians have lived who could say just that.

In business life the way to meet failure is to study it. Find out as far as human insight can, its causes. Then turn bravely to some new plan, seeking, as far as possible, to avoid the causes which led to the previous failure. Thus by studying instead of fretting, the business man may make each failure a stepping-stone to a final great success. The student, artist, musician and poet often fail because they love glory better than they love their art: they care more for the fame which art can bring than for the art itself. It is strain, worry, nervous anxiety to get ahead that causes nine-tenths of the failures in this world. A calm, cheerful determination to do one's best and leave results with God would bring success far quicker to the most of us than the fretting to which we are prone. And calmness and cheerfulness can both be cultivated. Like all other qualities of the mind they are matters of habit. There are birds that can sing in a storm, so there are souls whose habit of cheerfulness is such that the storms of life do not interfere with its steady flow.

History tells us that during the great Chicago fire there were some who stood and wrung their hands in despair and bellowed with grief as they saw their homes and business being destroyed by the ravaging flames. But one man, standing quietly by and watching his own fine row of business houses disappear before the swallowing fire, being asked what he was thinking about calmly answered,

"I was only thinking it was too bad for the poor rats."

That man had cultivated a cheerful thoughtfulness for others besides himself. He had met life's disasters before then. The habit of bearing small things bravely and cheerfully had made it possible for him to bear a great trouble with the same cheerfulness and have even room in his heart for so small a thing as the sorrows of a rat.

The Christian sometimes bears failure even less bravely than men of the world. Why is this? Because in the Christian life he did not expect failure. Somehow he thought that his human nature was going to be changed and that sin was going to be impossible to him. And now that he finds himself failing to come up to his own poor standard, his disappointment is great. Ah, human nature cannot be overcome at a moment's notice. Christ's image must be formed in us as we go on from "glory unto glory." The Christian's failure is only a misstep made in the dark which should cause him to turn quickly to the light. And in Christian work failure is oftentimes the finger of God pointing to some other and broader path where greater results can be obtained.

Then there are so many seeming failures in this world over which we mourn and mourn, which, after all, are not failures at all but splendid successes. The Sunday-school teacher thinks she has failed because she cannot see the results she had hoped for among the members of her class. But years afterwards she learns that her teaching saved a soul from death and turned a careless boy into a good man. The mother grieves over her failure to influence her child as she wishes, but after she has gone to her long home, the influence of her faithful life bears fruit in the heart of that child grown to mature years.

What shall you do with your failures? Trust them to God, and go cheerily on to the next work that comes to you. The true hero is cheerful and trusting as well as fearless and brave.

MISSOURI.

DISTRICT GATHERINGS AND NOTES OF WORK.

The joint conference of the thirteenth, twenty-first, twenty-second and twenty-fourth districts of the W. C. T. U., held in Rich Hill, was one of the most novel and instructive meetings ever held in this part of the state. Miss Ella Harrison arranged the program, which was a very interesting one, indeed. After the opening devotional exercises appropriate committees were appointed, also by motion a critic was appointed, whose duty it should be to criticise the general proceedings of the convention. The press department was arranged for by appointing a reporter for each county.

Then came reports of work done in the different counties represented, each telling of good work done. Reports of superintendents followed, beginning with Mrs. T. J. McConnahue, of work done in the railroad department. She reported 28,925 pages of literature distributed.

Temple work was reported by Mrs. C. E. Allen very encouragingly, considerable money being raised by means of mite-boxes, Baby Bands and pledges. Harrisonville reported that their one hundred dollar pledge was paid.

Mrs. Given gave a glowing account of work in the evangelistic department; twelve unions do excellent work, hold gospel temperance meetings, mothers' meetings and do not forget to visit the sick as well as the prisoners in jail.

Nearly all the churches in this district use unfermented wine, says Mrs. Dean, their superintendent.

Mrs. Lucy M. Wisker gave an instructive lesson from the 57th Psalm.

During the noon hour Mrs. Golliday was actively at work, and secured two new members.

A paper on finance, by Mrs. Guild, of Sedalia, was read and discussed. Mrs. Hoffman said that members should educate themselves in giving, that as a rule the poor gave more proportionately than the rich.

At night Mrs. Hoffman gave one of her matchless lectures which was well attended.

At the next morning's session reports were listened to from the counties and unions in the districts not reported the day previous. Each showed good work done. Mrs. Gilson spoke of the public reading room at Appleton City which is kept up by their union and has done much good.

Eldorado Springs, through Mrs. Phipps, reported work progressing.

Rich Hill union reported good work done and hoped to do more in the future. Mrs. Sturtevant showed progress in the line of juvenile work.

An excellent paper by Mrs. Ducher was read, subject, "Relation of church members to the liquor traffic."

An amusing and instructive examination of local presidents present was conducted by Miss Harrison. It was suggested that she should arrange a catechism for use of local presidents.

A paper on Sabbath observance was read, which was "right to the point."

A lesson in voting by the Australian ballot system was engaged in by thirty ladies. It was an amusing scene, and it is a pleasure to know that only one slight error was found by the judges of election.

Although a thunder storm prevailed, yet at the appointed hour the Opera House was well filled, to listen to the convincing address of Mrs. Clara Hoffman, our state president. After music and an earnest benediction by Rev. Blair the meeting closed.

The twenty-fourth district held its first convention at Bolivar, Polk county, in December. Although it rained hard, and then by turns would snow and sleet, the district was well represented. Twenty delegates and as many visitors were present, coming from various directions, driving over the country through the storm, over rocky roads and mud and coming from two to twenty-five miles—earnest, plucky women those.

The morning devotions were conducted by Rev. Simmons, presiding elder of the Springfield district, who spoke very earnestly of the cowardliness of the church in not standing for prohibition. Mrs. Owens read an able paper on franchise and was appointed district superintendent of this work.

An excellent paper on finance, written by Mrs. E. Bronson, was read, after which slips of paper were passed, asking those present to contribute to this work and write the amount contributed, with name and post-office address thereon. Although this was a new district, having formerly been a part of four districts, the amount pledged, with dues paid, brought us out of debt and left a sum in the treasury for future work.

The subject of juvenile work was presented by Mrs. Affleck, showing good work done at Bolivar. Miss Eva Jones, of Minnesota, spoke on methods of conducting Loyal Temperance Legions. She said we must consider it as necessary to have the regular lessons and officers, together with its teachers, in this work, as we do in the Sunday-school.

The address of welcome was given by Mrs. Affleck, of Bolivar, and the response by Mrs. Thomas, of Springfield.

Mrs. Clara Hoffman addressed an immense audience on "Our Work," which will not fail to arrest thought in the minds of the listeners, so impressively did she speak.

No change of officers was made except that of corresponding secretary, Miss Nellie Allen, of Springfield, who was elected to fill this office. Much business was transacted and a permanent district organization effected.

An enthusiastic and interesting report of the National Convention was given by Mrs. Newton. So clearly did she picture its proceedings that we almost thought ourselves there.

Professors Bruce and White of the Bolivar High Schools gave valuable information regarding the teaching of scientific temperance instruction, showing excellent instruction given.

The banner which Missouri received at the National Convention for making the greatest advance in scientific temperance instruction was conspicuous among the decorations. Mrs. Thomas, state superintendent, urged that every union find out if the required books were taught properly in their respective schools.

By invitation Mrs. Hoffman addressed the students of the Southwestern Baptist College. They listened with intense interest and it is hoped her seed sowing was not in vain.

Y night was indeed an inspiration to the work and workers; in the absence of Miss Carter, whom we expected to be with us, the Y's from Springfield and Stockton, with their songs and recitations, filled out the evening's program. Miss Nellie Allen recited, in a delightful manner, a temperance recitation, as did also Miss Roundtree. By request the latter recited "The Chariot Race," which was well rendered. The devotions were conducted in a manner which all appreciated, by Mr. O. Baker, a representative from the Y. P. S. C. E.

The music was of the best quality and was listened to with delight. The music by the choir, of which Miss Zoe Carrier was leader, the solos by Misses Prather and Nickles, with Miss Upton as organist, and the music by the children of the L. T. L., which had been under the excellent training of Mrs. Parks, deserves special mention. The committee on entertainment had homes for twice the number present, and indeed we could say that this was an exceptional gathering of the workers of the district.

A Demorest medal contest held in Seneca, not long ago, was well attended and interest manifested. Mrs. Sobieski, wife of Col. Sobieski, recently lectured at this point. She held her audience's attention and caused an arrest of thought which will result in good for the future. This union publishes each year the names of all persons who sign the saloon petitions. This year the names of some of the prominent business men which were thereon last year, were conspicuous by their absence.

Mrs. Alice Williams' lecture was highly appreciated, and after she had finished speaking a gentleman took her by the hand and said: "Four years hence I'll take the stump for prohibition." The president of this union has moved to New Mexico. All here were sorry to lose her.

Mrs. Millie Lewis lectured at Troy and Wentsville, and in the latter place organized a union of seven members.

Mrs. Clara Hoffman gave an interesting address to a crowded house at Hickory Grove and eight new names were added to their union.

Neosho was delighted with the work done by Mrs. Alice Williams. She gave two lectures and held one mothers' meeting. Sixteen honorary members and many of the ladies gave their names to the union as new members, and thus the good work goes "on and on," and with Neosho we rejoice.

The ladies of the W. C. T. U. of Holden gave their annual reception and banquet on Thursday evening last week. After the numerous guests were assembled they were called to order by the president. An interesting short program had been prepared. After "the feast of reason" was over, the audience adjourned to the banqueting hall and were served with another kind of feast which all seemed to enjoy.

At the union services held in this place, Rev. Kelso delivered one of the most interesting lectures which was intensely listened to on the subject, "Is the young man Absalom safe?" Mrs. Golliday gave a brief account of the Denver Convention which was listened to with interest and pleasure.

The union at Green Ridge, under the able leadership of Mrs. Lucy M. Wisker, is doing much good work. Their membership is increasing as is also public sentiment. Many departments of work are carried on successfully and nothing is too much for those do-everything women.

KENTUCKY.

SCIENTIFIC TEMPERANCE INSTRUCTION PROGRESS.

In sending to you an account of Kentucky's convention I omitted the report of Mrs. Margaret A. Watts, superintendent of scientific temperance instruction, which I regret very much.

Mrs. Watts went before the convention of state teachers in 1886 and presented to them the subject of scientific temperance, and now a number of schools, public and private, use text books on the subject. Some of the teachers' institutes have discussed scientific temperance and a temperance sentiment has been aroused.

The teachers of Knox county have pledged themselves to teach this branch as long as they remain workers in the common school system of the state.

Mrs. Watts has distributed thousands of pages of literature, and has done all that she could do for "the children of to-day" that "the nation of to-morrow" may be saved through a knowledge of this evil, without which it will surely perish.

The importance of having scientific temperance presented before the board of education was so impressed upon Mrs. Watts that she asked and obtained permission to lay this subject before them, and she was highly gratified when the following resolution was embraced with the others to be considered:

"SECTION 6 of Article 3.—The instruction prescribed by the board shall embrace spelling, reading, writing, arithmetic, English grammar, English composition, geography, physiology and hygiene, civil government and United States history, including history of Kentucky after July 1, 1893. The nature and effects of alcoholic drinks and narcotics upon the human system shall be in all the schools supported, wholly or in part, by the state; be taught as thoroughly as other required studies to all pupils studying physiology and hygiene as a part of this branch."

In January of 1892, Mrs. Hunt, from Boston, and Mrs. Watts went to Frankford to see what they could do with legislation. They called on the governor and state officials and took every opportunity to meet in person the law-makers. The state superintendent made persistent efforts to get a hearing before the committee on education, in which he was successful. They asked numerous questions but made few promises. The bill still lies before the House. So it only remains to wait the action of this slow moving body and keep them in remembrance of the bill, trusting that when the time comes they will vote right.

Mrs. Watts resigned as state superintendent of police matron work, and Mrs. S. J. Given, of Newport, was appointed in her place. The work was well done by Mrs. Watts; she seems to have been divinely led all the way, and the good done by her will only be known "when the leaves of the judgment book unfold."

PENNSYLVANIA.

WAYSIDE GLEANINGS.

Cheering reports come from the following counties: Chester county W. C. T. U., like the deacon's "One Hoss Shay," is "running as usual much the same"; not that every local organization is just as strong as another to carry out the simile, but that a strong and healthful activity prevails.

Kimblesville, Russellville and Kennett Square unions were unusually active in Prohibition campaign work. During the recent presidential agitation, meetings in these districts were held by the score, and were addressed by Mrs. Hoffman, Mrs. Baxter, David Burwell, Hon. J. P. St. John, M. J. Fanning and M. V. B. Bennett. Much sentiment in these localities centered on the new issue, and was duly registered at the ballot box.

The county union aided and assisted in a four days' encampment at Johanna Heights last summer, many of the unions taking tents and assisting in the exercises during the meetings.

The county conventions, which have formerly been held quarterly, have been condensed into semi-annual gatherings. The departments of evangelistic, press, juvenile, literature and suffrage, are replete with energy and systematic work.

A regular weekly W. C. T. U. column will hereafter appear in the Downingtown Archive.

Chester and Lancaster counties will entertain the next state convention.

Mrs. Ella M. Gordon, Chester county's president, represented us at the National Convention, and will bring the tidings to her constituency by reading the report at parlor meetings, socials, etc.

Bradford county held a most enthusiastic and inspiring convention in the fall at East Smithfield, and thirty-five delegates and visitors from abroad were in attendance. Spirituality marked every session. A pastor present said, "It is the best meeting I have attended in this town for a year," notwithstanding that other meetings had been held during the season.

Reports from unions were cheering; two new W's and one Y had been organized, also two L. T. L's. A superintendent of franchise was elected for the first time. A gold medal contest was held in the evening and the largest church in town was crowded although a political meeting, addressed by a noted speaker, was going on at the same time across the street. The promise, "We will do better another year," is being fulfilled.

Towanda union had Col. George Bain to lecture for them December 9.

Burlington has held a silver medal contest.

East Troy held a Y public meeting and social, while Troy makes a specialty of mothers' meetings. Mrs. Pomeroy, a most efficient superintendent, has an assistant appointed for each street in the village to gather in and interest the mothers.

East Smithfield is specially interested in Sabbath observance and so the good work goes on in various lines of work throughout the unions, all tending to one point, the education of a right sentiment as to God's law, man's duty and woman's responsibility to the purity of the home life and the salvation of our nation from the greatest curse of the age.

Butler county sends a most encouraging report of work done. The Butler unions held a meeting for Mrs. Mair, state superintendent of railroad work, and prepared outfits for all cabooses on the P. & W. R. R. The county paid expenses amounting to nearly fifty dollars.

A gold medal contest was held at the semi-annual convention at Petrolia, and silver medal contests have been held recently.

Dr. Anna Shaw was at the semi-annual convention and also lectured in Butler.

Colonel Bain was the speaker at the annual convention. On election day the Butler union held an all-day prayer-meeting, which was well attended. It was a most spiritualizing exercise, and terrorized some of the politicians more than an army with banners. At the dinner on Thanksgiving day there were reported "forty children and baskets of fragments taken up."

Butler union sends a delightful account of an "experience social" held at their last parlor meeting. Some of the "experiences" in earning a dollar were decidedly unique. We wish we could give them entire, but will say that over thirty-one dollars were secured by this, so we would advise all to go and do likewise. Butler union makes a specialty of parlor meetings.

Columbia county held their annual convention at Berwick; forty delegates, representing eight unions, were present. There are in the county seven L. T. L's, with a pledged membership of 211. Since convention a new union has been organized at Fair View. A new union and L. T. L. will be organized at North Mountain in the near future. Most of the unions are in good working order; have held four silver medal contests and one gold during the year. Benton union expects to hold a silver one, and we are arranging to hold a gold one at county convention in February.

Clearfield county convention was held at Du Bois, and it was a working convention. One new Y has been organized since by the county superintendent, Mrs. Wilson, and two unions visited and strengthened. They have solicited donations from several moneyed men with encouraging results, and shall be able to put help in the hands of all the teachers in the county, and have ordered the best that can be secured from our National superintendent, Mrs. Hunt. They have issued a circular letter to the Sunday-school superintendents and pastors of the county asking them to coöperate in the dissemination of temperance literature and the faithful presentation of the temperance Sunday-school lesson. To the above named helps they added others on Sunday-school instruction and scientific temperance instruction, and hope in this way to reach every home in the county.

The Y's are especially active and some of the W's are manifesting renewed activity.

At the county institute two leading white-ribboners were present and lectured,—Miss L. J. Newcomb, of Michigan, whose subject was "Physical Culture," and Miss Dornblazer, who spent three days in the interest of the teachers; subject, scientific temperance instruction. She was employed by the county W. C. T. U.

Bucks county held a large prohibition mass-meeting at Langhorne last fall under the auspices of the county W. C. T. U. which was addressed by Mrs. Gougar.

Cumberland county reports two new unions organized during the year.

The Dayton Y of Armstrong county held a Columbus social which was quite a success.

The Mansfield Y's of Alleghany county held a "Cocoa Theta" reception in their new temperance hall, a very pleasant affair at which eight dollars was realized.

Crawford county W. C. T. U. mourns the loss of one of its members, Mrs. F. W. Perkins, of Titusville W. C. T. U.

County superintendents of Sabbath observance in Pennsylvania are requested to drop a postal to their state superintendent, Mrs. R. J. George, Beaver Falls, Penn., giving name and post-office address, and also the number of local superintendents in their respective counties, as she wishes to mail them copies of "plan of work."

Pennsylvania can boast of perhaps the youngest editor in the United States, Master Lawrence, of Lawrence county, aged seven years, editor of Chips and Shavings, a monthly paper. He is assisted in his editorial work by his three brothers, the eldest of whom is only fourteen years of age.

From an excellent report of Y work in Pennsylvania, we learn that there are 219 Y unions in the state, that 400 public meetings have been held by them and 129,371 pages of gospel temperance literature distributed, besides 5,665 other papers. Scientific temperance, Demorest contests, railroad, parlor meetings and flower mission work have been made specialties during the past year. One hundred and fifty dollars were donated to Temperance Temple and twenty-nine dollars and fifty cents to the Y wing of the National Temperance Hospital, and over ten thousand dollars raised for all purposes. Very helpful and interesting conferences were held at the state convention at which thirty Y delegates were present.

The Clearfield county Y's captured the banner for making largest per cent of increase in paying membership, and Lawrence county, the banner for largest number of new unions organized. With our efficient state superintendent, Mrs. Rhoades, to marshal our forces in line, we feel safe in the prediction that the same zeal and enthusiasm which has characterized their work in the past shall mark it in the future.

Lackawanna county held their annual convention at Jermyn. Miss E. U. Yates gave an excellent address. The reports given by county superintendents were full of interest. The delegates received a very cordial welcome and all the exercises were most helpful and inspiring to good work for the coming year.

Clarion county has for its president, Mrs. F. H. Beck, who is also president of Jefferson county. Their annual convention was held at New Bethlehem, Clarion county. Dr. Anna H. Shaw gave one of her masterly lectures.

Two conventions were held during the year—all unions have done well, but New Bethlehem and Rimersburg are reported as having done especially good work.

Mrs. Susan Gwinn distributed a vast amount of literature,—kept filled eight paper racks in railroad depots.

New Bethlehem was awarded the prize offered by the county president for gaining the greatest number of new members, eighteen being added to the list during the year.

Rimersburg has held four contests. A Demorest contest was held the last evening of convention. The medal was won by Miss Lulu Duff, of New Bethlehem.

The county superintendents have all done good work in their several departments.

Crawford county convention was held at Rundell's, and this place won fresh laurels for their hospitality and good works. There has been a slight decrease in membership during the past year, but the indications are that the membership will be increased. Miss Henrietta Moore gave a very fine address at this convention.

The president of Crawford county is Mrs. J. D. Wyman, corresponding secretary, Mrs. C. Lang. The Christian Harbinger, published at Spartansburg, was made the official organ of the county W. C. T. U. It is ably edited by Rev. W. J. Barton.

Mercer county has just held her first county grand gold medal contest. Eight young ladies competed for the prize, which was awarded to Miss Blanche Thorpe, of Greenville. Another grand gold medal contest is now being arranged for by the county superintendent.

Mercer county is the banner county of the state for contests.

The third grand gold medal contest was held at Philadelphia in November. Eight contestants from Columbia, Bucks, Chester, Lancaster, Bradford and Philadelphia counties tried for the medal, which was won by Miss Mary Barr, of Lancaster county. The Silver Lake quartette furnished the music. The other members of the class were each presented with a handsome book.

The diamond medal at Denver was won by a Pennsylvania contestant, who is now a resident of Georgia, but her first three medals were won in the Keystone state.

Pennsylvania has held thus far 2,145 silver medal contests, 98 gold and 4 grand gold. A Pennsylvania contestant holds the diamond medal, and thus we go on from "contest to conquest."

Col. C. J. Holt, the successful evangelist and lecturer of Illinois, has been doing very effective work in Franklin county.

I thank those who have sent contributions to us this month, and would ask the good sisters not to be too modest in reporting their good deeds and work; hope to receive contributions before the 20th of each month. Let every county be represented through this column at least once during the year.

State Reporter, Greenville.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

Our president, corresponding secretary, and delegate returned from the National Convention much inspired and encouraged to press on with the work here in our "own little corner."

We want to thank that convention for so readily adopting resolution six, brought before the convention by Mrs. Fuller and which had previously been introduced before the resolutions committee by Mrs. Ross. We now feel more than ever that we are part and parcel of the great National union, and we hope the committee on legislation will give the United States Attorney General no rest till he does order the head marshals of our territory to change their instructions to deputies, as provided in this resolution. By the way, the last line of the resolution should read, "intoxicants in any quantity in the Indian Territory" instead of "any Indian territory," for there is but one Indian Territory.

The Tahlequah union has offered one hundred dollars reward for information that will lead to the conviction of any one for selling intoxicants, including "Jamaica Ginger" in their town. Is it too much to ask that each state send our territorial president two or three dollars to aid in prosecuting these cases, thereby helping to rid our country of this curse that comes to us along with the grand civilization of our white brother?

The W. C. T. U. of Tahlequah gave a fine supper a short time ago, which was well patronized and very amusing. It was called a "Mystical Supper," and here is the menu: An unruly member; All things to all men; An Eastern country; One of Noah's sons; Fruit of the vine; Tabby's party; Impertinence; Staff of life; Printer's choice; Tree cake—two varieties; A young man's sweetheart. Drinks; Boston overthrow; West Indian beverage, and Adam's Ale. At the fair in Muskogee the W. C. T. U. had space given them, where they served meals and sold fancy articles, also at Venita. They did better at Venita than they expected, as it was their first venture of the kind. They obtained quite a sum for the territorial work.

The saloons in the Territory are closed and the keeper of the worst one, because the most popular, is in jail.

The W. C. T. U. boys' school at Muskogee closed for the holidays with a Demorest contest, and the boys showed marked improvement, and for one hour, guests were compelled to hear the truth, forcibly put. The school will open after New Years with an assistant teacher. Prof. Crane is doing such good work that he has been importuned to allow girls to enter the W. C. T. U. school, and as he had over sixty boys, this necesitates an assistant.

State Reporter, Muskogee.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

MRS. MARY MCGEE SNELL has recently closed a two weeks' evangelistic meeting in Harriman, Tenn. during which there were one hundred conversions and over sixty additions to the church.

REV. C. H. ST. JOHN, whose post-office address is Drawer A, Topeka, Kansas, will have fulfilled his evangelistic engagements as now arranged, March 5. He then intends to take the field for temperance, and unions desiring his services can secure them by writing him at the above address.

THE cheering news comes from Colorado that their much loved president, Mrs. Eva Higgins, is convalescing from her severe illness, and, with unceasing care and perfect rest, she may be able to take up her life-work that has been laid aside for a brief season. Surely this is in answer to the many prayers of her devoted friends and faithful workers throughout the state.

"Hope, then, my soul, and let thy trust abound,
His mercies fail not."

MRS. SARAH L. TEETOR, of Denver, is again acting as THE UNION SIGNAL reporter for Colorado.

MRS. L. E. BAILEY and daughter have located their headquarters at 520 S. Main St., Los Angeles, California.

MISS ELIZABETH U. YATES, of Maine, upon completing an extensive lecture tour through the United States and Canada, enjoyed a short season of rest during the holidays at her home in Round Pond.

MRS. S. A. MCCLEES is at the head of the work among soldiers and sailors for the National W. C. T. U. During the ten years past she has accomplished a good work by addressing meetings on ship and shore and by interesting commanders and officers to use their influence among their men in regard to total abstinence from intoxicating drinks and tobacco. The amount of work she has thus accomplished is incalculable.

BY invitation of pastors of the churches at Golden, Georgetown and Idaho Springs, Colo., Mrs. R. J. Trego remained after the National Convention to hold evangelistic services. As a result of her work at these points between one and two hundred persons have been converted, some of whom were men long addicted to drink. Mrs. Trego now returns to fill engagements for January and February in Ohio. All persons wishing to correspond with her will please address No. 112 North Main St., Delaware, Ohio.

A CORRESPONDENT asks: "Would it be possible to obtain and print in THE UNION SIGNAL a list of persons in far away places who would like the papers or other temperance literature sent to them? I take several weekly papers and would be only too glad to send them to any who would like them. I think perhaps our organizers might know of such. It seems a shame that good temperance literature should not reach all who need it." THE UNION SIGNAL will be glad to publish the names of such persons.

THE National delegates to the Denver Convention will recall the pleasant episode of the presentation of a unique and beautiful quilt to Miss Willard. Just as the church bells were calling to worship, November 27, the dear, loving hands that fashioned the coverlet were laid to rest forever. Mrs. Eliza Frances Howe was the aged saint whose earthly home at Pueblo, Colorado, was vacated for the one she had longed for through many years of pain. She rests now in peace, and hearts are not filled with grief, but rejoice at the fulfillment of her hopes.

CAPTAIN FRANK BURT, of Mannington, West Virginia, the prohibition candidate for governor of that state during the recent campaign, is a self-sacrificing Christian gentleman who not only gives of his means, but leaves his home and business to work for the cause. Accompanied by Miss Vandelia Varnum and Mrs. Frances Graham, of New York, both experienced W. C. T. U. workers in their respective states, Mr. Burt made so active a canvass of his state for two months preceding election that the Prohibitionists polled double the votes of 1888.

MOTHER BENEDICT'S cheery face from beneath her Quaker bonnet beamed in on THE UNION SIGNAL force last week. She was on her way to New York from her home in Decorah, Iowa, to visit a beloved son at his earnest solicitation. "Tell them I'm not leaving my work to take this trip," said she, "for I carry the seed of social purity to scatter wherever I go." Her book, "Woman's Work for Women" has been very effective as an educator to other women to come forward in the work of rescuing and converting fallen women, and should be widely read. It is published at Decorah, Iowa.

PURITY IN THE ART EXHIBIT AT THE WORLD'S COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION.

Our Sisters and Friends of the W. C. T. U.:

Let me say to all who desire a pure art exhibit and are anxious to suppress vicious art at the Exposition, the time to act is at hand. The centennial exposition of 1876 was most vile in some of its paintings, sculptured figures and casts. Unless a united effort is made at once, the Columbian Exposition will greatly exceed that of 1876 in the impurity of its exhibits.

Vice has assumed a degree of baldness commensurate with the growth of the liquor traffic. The opposition of the church is less if possible than it was in 1876. The art exhibit will be viewed by hundreds and thousands of young men and women from pure homes. Are their innocent natures to be corrupted by vile and sensual displays of the so-called "high art"? Anthony Comstock says, "Art is not above morals. Morals stand first. The closer art keeps to pure morality, the higher is its grade. To appeal to the animal in man does not inspire the soul of man with the ecstacies of the beautiful."

President Merrill E. Gates of Amherst College has placed on record this thought: "The cry, 'Art for Art's sake' is repeated as Shiboleth by critics and so-called artists who have never seen the first principles of all art. There can be no true art which is not in harmony with the holiness of beauty and suggestive of the beauty of holiness." Lanier wrote: "The greatest work has always gone hand in hand with the most fervent moral purpose."

I would suggest to state presidents to urge upon their superintendents to write to Halsey C. Ives, chief of the department of fine arts for circular number three. This gives the names of the advisory committees and the jury of selection for all exhibits. Then write to the members of the committees, requesting that all works of art be pure and unobjectionable, also have letters and petitions sent to Board of Lady Managers, Columbian Exposition, care Mrs. Potter Palmer, President, Chicago, Ill,, urging them to stand guard for purity. Let there be no delay; the time for action is short.

MRS. EMILIE D. MARTIN,
National Superintendent Department Purity in Literature and Art, Room 85, Times Building, New York City.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

As the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also.—James 2: 26.

Eighteen hundred and ninety-two, with its successes and defeats, its joys and griefs, lies behind us. Let us not look backward and lose our strength in mourning over the inevitable, but having learned wisdom from the past and to trust where we cannot see, with faces turned to the rising sun of another new year, let us go forward in faith and hope, striving to make the accomplishments of the present year for the good of humanity far greater than any that has preceded it. We expect greater things for the Temple this year than ever before, and we want everybody to help with a will, whether the sum be a munificent one from the plethoric purse of the rich, or a widow's mite from those who have but little to give. William Carey's watch-cry was, "Expect great things of God, plan great things for God." In full belief of the truth of the above the Temple trustees have planned a great and aggressive campaign for 1893—nothing less than putting a financial agent in the field, with the avowed object of securing money with which to buy up all the outstanding stock and bonds of the Temple. The first undertaking is to secure $300,000 by June 1st, so that the entire stock shall be held and owned by the trustees for the National W. C. T. U. when the building is dedicated in June.

Rev. Watson Tranter, of Chicago, is the duly appointed financial agent for this great undertaking; he commences the work at once. He has arranged for a leave of absence from his congregation in order to embark in the enterprise. Although a preacher, he is a man of affairs and a most astute business man. It may be of interest to our readers to know just who our new financial agent is. Mr. Tranter received his early education at Cincinnati, Ohio, graduated at Wesleyan college, Middletown, Connecticut, and received his theological training at Evanston, Illinois. During the last twelve years he has served churches in and about Chicago. Besides this he has succeeded wonderfully in a business way, and seems to have a marked genius for finances. At present he is a stockholder and director in the Mitchell, Tranter Iron company at Cincinnati, Ohio. He is also a member of the Wm. P. Dunn Printing company, Chicago, and has succeeded in securing quite a large amount of real estate in and about Chicago. For two years he has felt called to take up the work of helping theW. C. T. U. women pay for the Temple, but the time was not ripe until the present. He undertakes the work with great enthusiasm and unbounded faith in its success. One plan which he is working to, is to secure

10	persons who will	contribute	$5,000	each, making	$ 50,000
40	"	"	2,500	"	100,000
100	"	"	1,000	"	100,000
500	"	"	100	"	50,000

Let not those who read this list, and on account of limited means feel they cannot have any part in such munificent giving, either feel disappointed or discouraged because such a privilege is not accorded them. Remember what our Master said about the widow's mite. Because you cannot give largely, my sister, do not allow it to rob you of the privilege of giving something. "It is according to what a man hath, and not according to what he hath not," that God will judge him. To those who are stewards of large means, we ask that they look over this list and give according as God has prospered them. We will not ask for the money until the list that the person has subscribed to has secured the desired number of pledges, although in all cases where the money could be sent at once it would be a great help. It would expedite matters wonderfully if all who are able to give any of the sums above mentioned would notify me or Mr. Tranter, The Temple, Chicago, at once. Mr. Tranter subscribed $1,000 many months ago which he hopes soon to redeem. Mr. H. C. Speer gave his name yesterday for $1,000, making the second name on the $1,000 list.

The great reverence and love in which Mary Allen West was held by the employés of the W. T. P. A., from the highest official to the smallest errand boy, has been demonstrated by a subscription list, started since her death in the composing room of the W. T. P. A., to which is now attached the names of all in the establishment. The sum aggregates about seventy dollars. This money is for the purpose of erecting a drinking fountain to Miss West's memory. The fountain will cost about five hundred dollars. I am requested to ask all friends who would like a part in this memorial of love to our "self-immolated martyr to the cause of Christian temperance in Japan," to send their subscriptions at once. It is evident that many desire to aid. Among those who have written in regard to erecting a memorial for her, is John T. Polar, Takoma, D. C.; he characterizes her as "one of the noblest women of our times." One dollar has been received from Miss M. J. Birdsall, Chicago, for a memorial for Miss West.

The Temple trust bonds will all be sold no doubt by February 1st. The latest large purchaser of bonds is C. L. Brown, Ravenswood, W. Va., E. C. Underhill, Boston, Mass.; (both have invested in them before) and Mrs. E. B. Murdock, Baltimore, Md.; each purchased $2,000 worth. Address Mr. H. C. Speer, 237 La Salle street, Chicago, in regard to Temple trust bonds.

A two-cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, the Temple, Chicago, will secure a mite box, descriptive card and bulletin; remember, all who fill a mite-box ($3.65) before next April will receive a photographic group consisting of Lady Henry Somerset, Miss Willard and the founder of the Temple. All drafts should be made out in the name of Miss Esther Pugh. All matters pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Carse.

ALASKANA: Alaska in Descriptive and Legendary Poems. This work on "Alaska Legends" is the first one of its style yet published which deals exclusively with the legends, ethnology, customs and scenery of Alaska. The rhythm is in conformity with that of "Hiawatha" and "The Kalevala." The descriptions of scenery are taken from the author's note-book, which was his constant companion while traveling in the territory, therefore their reality is assured. The writer, being a physician, has given considerable care and study to the "Medicine Men," or "Shamans," their peculiar education, strange practices, ostentatious manners, mode of collecting fees, their death and burial, all of which is interesting, and some parts are startling in their intense realism. The illustrations are few, but their beauty lends a great charm to the book, which is beautifully bound in cloth, with gilded edges. The illustrations are taken direct from photographs.

Porter & Coates, Publishers, Philadelphia.

IN THE LEVANT, by Charles Dudley Warner. This work, in two volumes, beautifully printed, in rare binding of crimson, green and gold, with a crimson cloth cover-slip, illustrated by nearly twenty-five exquisite full-page photogravures, is among the number of books to be greatly desired. Mr. Warner's name as the author is in itself a guarantee of good things, and coupled with his name, the subject—IN THE LEVANT—makes assurance doubly sure regarding the quality of the feast. The publishers compare this work, in some respects, with Hawthorne's "Marble Faun," but fair a creation as the latter undoubtedly is, Mr. Warner strides far ahead of it in his work. He is minute without being wordy, deep without becoming dreary, vivid and terse, and above all thoroughly natural. Many are familiar with the work, which is not new as to date of authorship, but is of that character which is said to "wear well" and will stand the test of a beautiful new dress and in the face of fresh criticism.

OUR LITTLE MEN AND WOMEN FOR 1892. Too much can hardly be said in favor of the bound volume of OUR LITTLE MEN AND WOMEN for 1892, for it is seldom that so many bright and well-known writers and artists have united to produce such worth and beauty as this book represents. "A Boy and a Girl," by Elizabeth Cumings, illustrated by Bridgman, is one of the most delightful stories this author has ever written; "Joker and His Relations," by Mary C. Crowley, with illustrations by Barnes, is fine. The "Talks by Queer Folks," who are insects, animals, fishes and birds, by Mary E. Bamford, will sustain the favor won by this writer's earlier natural history stories. "The Doings of the Studio Dolls," told by E. A. H., illustrated by Elizabeth S. Tucker, is one of the prettiest and oddest conceits imaginable; poems and verses by real verse-makers, stories by story-tellers in sympathy with child-life, bright bits of travel, history and biography, as well as fragments of music here and there to enliven, all embellished with choice illustrations, make up a charming volume to entertain and instruct the real little men and women who are just beginning to read for themselves, and learning how to use their eyes.

Rev. J. W. Lee, D. D., is the author of THE MAKING OF A MAN, a book which is attracting wide-spread attention, and is the object of much commendatory criticism.

"The meaning of creation," says the author in his introduction, "is not understood till dust stands erect in a living man. . . . . Not till the atoms throbbed in a human brain and beat in a human heart, did the purpose, which had through the ages run, stand out, defined and justified. Then it was that the intention underneath the drift of the ages spelled itself out in the unity of thought, the freedom of choice, and the capacity for love, potential in the intellect, will and heart of the first man. He was the realization of an ideal, which gave meaning to the long periods of preparation. As the final expression of the creative process, he was at once the interpreter and the interpretation of all that had gone before." Through the seven chapters Doctor Lee considers the Provision for the Physical Nature of Man—Bread; the Social Nature—Power; the Intellectual Nature—Truth; the Moral Nature—Righteousness; the Æsthetic Nature—Beauty; the Spiritual Nature—Love; the Permanence of the Completed Life of man—Immortality. The matter is at once profound and clear, touching upon high theological and spiritual truths with a simplicity of utterance that leaves no doubt as to the meaning. The reader associates the book in his thought with Drummond's "Natural Law in the Spiritual World," and not without reason, since they often touch upon kindred themes with a similarity of inspiration to the reader.

THE MEMORIAL NUMBER

Of THE UNION SIGNAL, devoted to its late editor-in-chief, Miss Mary Allen West, will soon be issued, and should be largely circulated, as well as utilized in securing new subscribers.

The probable date of this special number will be January 17, 1893. It cannot, however, be definitely stated, as it is desired to include an account of the funeral ceremonies at Galesburg, after the remains reach that city.

We will gladly send sample copies to any who will undertake to secure subscribers on application.

For promiscuous circulation the following special rates are made if received in advance: For single copy, 5 c; per dozen, 50 c; per 100, $3.

Send orders without delay as we cannot go to press a second time and the first edition should be made large enough to meet all demands.

A SUCCESSFUL ATTEMPT.

Hon. S. R. Winchell, Manager of the National Young Folks' Reading Circle, writes to this office under date December 31, 1892:

"I am placed under renewed obligations to you for the beautiful volume, 'COLUMBUS, AND WHAT HE FOUND.' This seems to me like a successful attempt to tell the story of Columbus so that a child will be attracted by it, and be interested in reading it. I hope it will be persistently 'pushed,' so that the parents of children will provide it for their sitting-room table. Where ten persons try to write a book, nine fail to produce a work of merit which will endure. Mrs. Hull is the tenth.

"Yours very cordially,
"S. R. WINCHELL."

An inquiry comes to us regarding "THE TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT," by Hon. H. W. Blair. This leads us to say that we still have a supply of these valuable books on hand. If our unions realized what a compendium of facts regarding the temperance cause it contains, they would not allow the opportunity to place a copy in the libraries of the towns and the homes to pass by unimproved. It is a book of 583 pages, and contains five maps and diagrams, four colored plates and fifty-six excellent full-page portraits of temperance workers of both sexes, while its pages discuss the temperance question from a scientific, physiological, medical, sanitary, economic, educational, governmental, historical, religious and reformatory standpoint, closing with a chapter on "What shall we do next?" a question pertinent to all.

It is needless to say more of the value of the book—now and always. To encourage any interested to secure it for their own use or the benefit of others, we have determined to make the following very liberal offer:

We will send this book, substantially bound in cloth, to any address, orders for which reach us before March 1st, 1893, for the very low price of $1.50, postpaid.

EXTENDED.

Realizing that it was not possible for the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL to do all that could be done under our new and unparalleled offer, it has been decided to extend it, and it will hold good until March 1st, 1893.

Fully believing that it would be one of the greatest aids to our cause, as has been said again and again in these columns, if THE UNION SIGNAL were more generally read, and being unable to personally canvass all the territory of all the local unions, nearly 10,000 of which are scattered over this country, and desiring your help in this direction, the proposition here outlined is made to all ages and sexes.

NOTE.—To any one, young or old, readers of "Aunt Jane's Cozy Corner" included, who will send us a club of eight new subscribers at one dollar each, we will forward promptly one of our beautiful W. C. T. U. solid silver after-dinner coffee souvenir spoons. These spoons have the die of the Crusade Church at Hillsboro, Ohio, imprinted in the bowl; Miss Willard's picture embowered in the National floral emblem, the trailing arbutus on the handle, while the top of the handle is surmounted by the world belted with the white ribbon. The back of the handle has the World's floral emblem, the water lily, and the initials of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association. These spoons are both beautiful and valuable, being of solid sterling silver.

REMEMBER, we will send an after dinner coffee spoon, polished or oxidized, for eight NEW subscribers at one dollar a year.

FOR TEN NEW subscribers at one dollar each, we will send a similar spoon with gilded bowl.

FOR TWELVE NEW subscribers we will send a tea spoon of the same design, or with the Temple in the bowl, instead of the Crusade Church.

FOR FIFTEEN NEW subscribers at one dollar each, we will send a teaspoon with gilded bowl.

FOR EIGHTEEN NEW subscribers at one dollar each we will send an orange spoon, polished or oxidized, with the Temple or the Crusade Church in the bowl.

FOR TWENTY NEW subscribers at one dollar each, we will send an orange spoon, gilded bowl.

This offer is open until March 1st, 1893.

Renewal of the Encyclopedia Offer for a Limited Period.

Among the many offers which have been made to our readers through these columns, few, if any, have resulted as satisfactorily as the one closed on December 31st, offering a full set of the new REVISED ENCYCLOPEDIA BRITANNICA in 20 volumes, delivered, for $10 on the instalment plan, the full set of books being sent as soon as the first dollar is forwarded with the coupon.

A very large number of sets of this work have been sold on this plan, and hundreds who have purchased have sent in additional orders, on getting the books, for friends and others. We have received a great many letters from purchasers, and nearly all tell the same story: "I am well pleased with my purchase. Some of the letters received lately from our subscribers have been from those who failed to avail themselves of the opportunity before January 1st, to get such a set of books so cheaply, and have inquired of us how they may now obtain them. In view of this condition of affairs, and believing that there are yet hundreds of our readers who ought to avail themselves of such an opportunity, we have made a new arrangement with the publishers of the REVISED ENCYCLOPEDIA BRITANNICA whereby we are enabled to resume the offer of last year for a limited period. This new offer will appear in the forthcoming issue of THE UNION SIGNAL, and in the meantime any who may desire to purchase this work may do so by cutting a coupon from one of our November or December issues.

STOP-OVER PRIVILEGES DISCONTINUED.

To avoid manipulation and illegitimate use of its tickets, the Wabash Railroad Company has found it necessary to discontinue the granting of stop-over privileges on all kinds and classes of tickets, and after January 1st, 1893, passengers will be obliged to purchase tickets from point to point. The new arrangement, however, which will be fully explained by any of the Company's Agents, will be found to be equally as convenient to the traveling public as the old, while the Company will be enabled to protect itself from imposition.

"THE FALLS OF NIAGARA"

is the title of a new book, beautifully printed and elegantly bound, containing some thirty different views of Niagara Falls reproduced from the finest instantaneous photographs, and accompanied by descriptive text from the pens of distinguished writers, extending from Father Hennepin down to Charles Dudley Warner and Sir Edwin Arnold. This sumptuous little volume will be sent to any address on receipt of the publishers' price of fifty cents. A similar volume, containing twenty large plates with descriptive text, forming an admirable practical guide to the Falls, under the appropriate title of "How to See Niagara," will be sent for the same price. TESTIMONIES FOR OUR DAY.

The name of Joseph Cook as the literary manager of any magazine is a sufficient guaranty of its excellence.

The bound volumes of OUR DAY on my library shelf form a valued collection. The reports of the Monday lectures alone are worth the price of the magazine. It is refreshing to have an independent platform, paying tribute to no sect, creed or party.

Cordially, SUSAN S. FESSENDEN.

In this day, when reforms have attention as never before, when they cover broader areas and are more practicable — when greater numbers of heroic men and women are eager to obey Duty's call in aggressive measures to befriend the weak and wronged, and remove social and commercial fountains of ruin, however strongly entrenched in vested interests and popular customs—it is of the greatest importance to have a journal alert to discern pending issues, in their various fields, and wise to unveil the enemy and champion righteousness.

From its first number, OUR DAY has been faithful in doing this work, and it deserves a vigorous and loyal support.

S. LEWIS B. SPEARE.

THE HOLIDAYS

Are over and every one will settle down to regular business. It is just the time to get up clubs for THE UNION SIGNAL and the other publications of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association. You read THE UNION SIGNAL and enjoy it—could not keep house without it. Why not say so to your neighbor and friend? In no other way could you so effectively spread the principles of the W. C. T. U. Christian people should be working with us heart and soul, but many of them do not understand our aims. Try to have the circulation of THE UNION SIGNAL extended in your church. By so doing you will secure new members in the W. C. T. U. Will not vice-presidents in local unions make this a prayerful duty now at the beginning of a new year? Report success to

THE WHITE RIBBON HYMNAL.

COMPILED BY
ANNA A. GORDON

OLD—NEW—TESTED—FRESH

OLD because it contains the favorites of White Ribboners everywhere, the songs which have become their watchwords.

NEW because rich treasures of word and song have been prepared for its pages.

TESTED because its hymns have borne the wear and tear of use.

FRESH because it rings clear and sweet for the home, the nation, and the truth of God.

It is divided into the following sections:

Devotional Meetings	Mass Meetings
Evangelistic Services	Prohibition Rallies
Gospel Temperance Meetings	Special Days
Memorial Services	Closing Hymns

Signal Notes.

As the second investigation into General Booth's schemes has clearly vindicated him and the Army, it were well for the critics to be silent and lend a hand.

TWICE a day beer rations are issued at Epsom College, England. No wonder that The Medical Pioneer and Christian papers protest against such a diet.

HIGH license works so well (!) in Chicago that within five years the saloons have increased eighty five per cent, while the population has advanced ten per cent.

THERE are three hundred and ninety-four Y. M. C. A's in England, with an active membership of thirty-one thousand and an honorary membership of over twenty-four thousand.

THE anti-tobacco crusade seems to have little effect, judging from statistics. Last year there were manufactured in this country almost five billion cigars, over three billion cigarettes, over two million pounds of tobacco and eleven million pounds of snuff.

WHEN one reads of a husband pouring kerosene over his wife and then setting her on fire, slashing her with a razor when trying to put out the flames, people do not wonder at the cause, for they know it is liquor, but some of them wonder how long this must last.

THE state mentthat for numerous offenses a man was fined twenty-three hundred dollars, and a jail sentence added for selling liquor in Portland, Maine, proves that liquor selling in Maine is not such an easy, every-day affair as anti-Prohibitionists would make the world believe.

So impressed is Mr. Moody with the need of trained workers in Christian work, that he proposes to enlarge his Ladies' Training School at Northfield, when he will admit twenty-five students at great reduction, who have been chosen by the Christian Endeavor Societies. Ten free scholarships have also been presented him.

FULLY two-thirds of the ten million inhabitants of Mexico are pure blooded Indians. Their ignorance is appalling. President Diaz has decided to inaugurate a campaign which will include compulsory free-school education for them, and will give them an opportunity to acquire title to such land as they keep in actual cultivation.

BY due observation I have found that if the murders and manslaughters, the burglaries and robberies, the riots and tumults and other enormities that have happened in that time (twenty years) were divided into five parts, four of them have been the issues and product of excessive drinking.—Sir Matthew Hale, Chief Justice of England, 1670.

READING of the "good old times" will sometimes cure pessimistic views of the temperance question of to-day. About 1838 a prominent Massachusetts divine gave as his reason for joining the temperance movement, that among his brethren in the ministry he knew forty-four who drank so much as to affect their brains, and he had assisted four of them to bed on occasions like ordinations.

SOME interesting facts were recently given by the agent of a New York steamship line in regard to the Italians. Fully fifty per cent of the laborers go home in the fall and live on their earnings until spring, more than seventeen thousand having gone home this fall. One of the great anti-Chinese arguments is that they do not spend their money here and do not become associated with our institutions. Is it not time for the same argument to be used for an anti-Italian crusade?

HON. ANDREW D. WHITE, in a Chautauqua address, made the startling statement that statistics prove that among all the nations of the Christian world, in the United States the highest crimes are most frequently committed and least punished. He gives as a cause the criminal education of children and others through sensational, illustrated papers and novels, and by posters, association of youths with old criminals in jails, etc. He believes that there should be a course of instruction in every university dealing with the problems suggested by iusanity, inebriety and crime.

Expiration of the Bell Telephone Patent.

The original patent for the electrical telephone was granted to A. G. Bell, of Salem, Mass. The seventeen years will expire March 7th, 1893. It is difficult to foretell what great advantages this will open to the public. Drs. Starkey & Palen's Compound Oxygen is not a patent medicine. It is a discovery of far more value than the telephone to thousands of people who are to-day rejoicing in better health and strength because of its use. An interesting account of its discovery, mode of action, and list of many wonderful cures of Consumption, Catarrh, Asthma, Dyspepsia, Neuralgia, Nervous Prostration, etc., will be sent to any one interested, by Drs. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch St., Philadelphia, or Chicago, San Francisco, New York, and Toronto, Ont.

Your barber will use Ivory Soap if you ask for it. And you had better ask for it. It is not a matter of small importance. Much of the soap used by barbers is made of vile materials and strongly chemicalled. It draws the natural oil from the hair, causing decay and premature baldness. Don't be afraid to ask for Ivory Soap. He has it on hand for those who prefer it.

THE PRICE OF LODGINGS DOUBLED FEBRUARY 15, 1893,

AT THE
WORLD'S FAIR
TEMPERANCE HEADQUARTERS
AT HARVEY, ILL.

We shall build the Hotel large enough to accommodate all comers who shall order lodgings PRIOR TO FEBRUARY 15. After that date our rates will be exactly doubled, and no guarantees for lodgings will be giveu to anybody. In our first announcement we proposed a hotel to accommodate 1,000 guests, and offered for sale $100,000 worth of lodgings. The plan of our building was such as would accommodate that number, but the demands for these lodgings were so great that we have found it necessary to MORE THAN DOUBLE ITS CAPACITY, and accordingly have been able to offer $200,000 in lodgings instead of $100,000. Only $50,000 worth of these lodgings remain untaken. They have sold at the rate of $1,000 a day almost from the start, and are still going very rapidly. On the larger plan we have found it possible to greatly improve our building. It now stands built around the entire block, with its exterior artificial stone finish all in place, the roof complete, deep drainage and artesian well finished, the windows all in. gas pipes and heating apparatus provided for, and a large share of the inside finish completed. Contracts for furnishing the rooms are now being placed; Mrs. Russell took control January 2, and nothing will prevent opening the Hotel for guests early in the spring.

CUT THIS OUT OR COPY IT,

Fill the blanks, sign it and pin a ONE DOLLAR BILL or a ONE DOLLAR postal note to it for each ten dollar contract desired and mail it to The Harvey World's Fair Hotel and Entertainment Co., 161 La Salle St., Chicago.

..... 1893.

The Harvey World's Fair Hotel and Entertainment Co., 161 La Salle St., Chicago, Ill.—

DEAR SIRS:—I hereby subscribe for and agree to take and pay for lodgings in your Hotel at Harvey, during the World's Fair, amounting to ..... Contracts of Ten Dollars each, total subscription, $..... These lodgings are to be furnished according to the rules of your Company, and at the following rates: One person in a room, $1.50 per day; two persons in a room, $1.00 each per day; three persons in a room, 66⅔ cents each per day; four persons in a room, 50 cents each per day.

Enclosed find $..... cash payment on this subscription, the balance to be paid as follows: One dollar on each $10 subscribed for each succeeding calendar month, until one-half the amount of this subscription shall be fully paid. The other half to be paid at the time of naming the date for visiting the World's Fair and using the lodgings hereby subscribed for. It is especially agreed, however, that in default of any of the payments hereby pledged, or in the event of grossly immoral or improper conduct on my part, all rights or claims hereunder shall be forfeited to and at the option of the Harvey World's Fair Hotel and Entertainment Company.

Signed, ...

Address.....

We publish herewith for the first time our new cut showing the building exactly as it will appear to our guests on their arrival at the Temperance Headquarters. Notice the larger number of towers, the numerous entrances from all sides, the verandas and the central dining hall, all of which are additions not promised in our earlier announcements.

The plan of sale remains the same until Feb. 15, 1893. Fill out the blank at the left, pin $1 to it for every $10 worth of lodgings desired, and send to us immediately. Remember, the rates hold good as quoted in the subscription blank at the left until Feb. 15, and that all subscribers between this date and that will have priority in choice of lodgings and dates, in the order in which the subscriptions are received. After Feb. 15 these rates will be exactly doubled, and no dates promised in advance.

The World's Fair Authorities recently published a list of rates at which Furnished Rooms (not in Hotels) could be obtained in Chicago. Their figures were published to guard the public against imposition. The average price in Chicago according to their figures for accommodations like ours were $5.66 for wha' we furnish for $2 now and will furnish for $4 after doubling our rates.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Mr. Blaine still lives, though perceptibly failing.

A beer war of independent brewers versus syndicates is reported from St. Louis.

Fierce snowstorms and gales have given a wintry aspect to the north, central and eastern states.

A resolution asking for an investigation of the Whisky Trust was introduced in the House, January 13.

A remarkable jam of ice, six miles in extent, blocked navigation in New York harbor for several days last week.

A row over campaign funds caused a secession in the Indiana State Liquor League which may result in its disbandment.

Dwight L. Moody, the evangelist, arrived in Chicago January 14, for a week's stay, preaching two sermons at his old church last Sunday.

The third annual reunion of converts, known as "The Feast of Tabernacles," takes place at the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, January 19.

The Michigan Federation of Labor closed its annual session, January 13, having submitted, among other requests to Congress, one favoring restriction of immigration.

A bill has been prepared by Representative Erickson, of Cook county, Ill., against the practice of docking horses, making it punishable by a year's imprisonment, or by a fine of from twenty-five to two hundred dollars.

Strong resolutions for Sunday closing of the World's Fair were passed during a mass-meeting of citizens at Springfield, Illinois, last Sunday, copies of which were sent to the members of the state legislature, now in session.

The initial steps toward forming an anti-gambling league in Chicago were taken last Sabbath by Rev. O. P. Gifford, of the Immanuel Baptist church, Chicago, who preached a stirring sermon and distributed membership cards among his congregation.

The Panama Canal cases on trial in France are proceeding and interesting all countries. Charles de Lesseps confesses to the bribery of the press and other fraudulent transactions, and M. Eiffel, of Eiffel tower fame, by his own testimony, received millions of francs above the contract stipulations.

What was commonly called the "temperance hotel," at Harvey, Ill., built for Columbian Exposition guests, burnt to the ground on the night of January 9. The company, of which Walter Thomas Mills is president, are undaunted, and will at once begin rebuilding, promising ample accommodations by the opening of the Exposition.

Gen. B. F. Butler, a noted statesman and an officer of the civil war, died suddenly in Washington, D. C., January 10, aged seventy-four years. His agitation of a ten hour day of labor for the mill-workers in Massachusetts, afterwards benefiting mill operatives throughout the nation, was a genuine philanthropic work alone entitling him to universal esteem.

The hearings of arguments for and against Sunday closing of the World's Fair before the World's Columbian committee closed Friday, January 13. A letter was sent President Harrison by Col. Elliott F. Shepard, chairman of a committee appointed for the purpose, requesting that the transfer of the souvenir coins to the World's Fair Directory cease, pending the action of Congress.

THE National Council of Women consists of thirteen national organizations of women pursuing thirteen different lines of work all for the betterment of the present conditions and the uplifting of humanity. Among these are missionary societies and associations for the furtherance of education, peace, social purity, suffrage, temperance and philanthropy.

OUR National president is glad to correct a statistical statement contained in her last annual address to the effect that women in Wyoming are one in three of the population, instead of one in five as was stated.

NOT only Illinois white-ribboners, but those in many other states, will regret to learn that the health of Mrs. L. S. Rounds requires that she take a long rest. Mrs. Rounds is so active when in the field that her strength will not hold out the year around. She left Chicago January 13 for Clifton Springs, N. Y.

IT is said that the Pope is moving toward throwing the influence of the Roman Catholic church in favor of peace among all Christian nations, and has offered to preside at a congress held for that purpose. This is one of the best tokens of progress toward human brotherhood that we have seen in many a day.

IN harmony with the constitution of the World's W. C. T. U., that notice of change in the constitution be given the previous year, Miss Willard requests publication for two changes as follows: First, That dues be raised from the present half-penny to the American cent; second, That all honorary members be included under the general head of the Somerset W. C. T. U. on the payment of fifty cents dues annually.

THE St. Louis Hygienic College of Physicians and Surgeons, which admits both men and women, teaches thoroughly and scientifically the fallacy of alcoholic medication. It explains to the students the dangers of wasting vitality with a stimulant, showing that the seeming increase of strength in such cases is due to the extra effort on the part of the vital organism to throw out the poison (be it alcohol or some other stimulant), and that a corresponding weakness or depression invariably follows this exaltation of the system. A catalogue of this college may be obtained of the dean, S. W. Dodds, M. D., 2826 Washington Ave., St. Louis.

REPRESENTATIVE citizens of New York City met in Chickering Hall on January 8, to consider the organization of a National Anti-Gambling League. Several stirring addresses were made, and ringing resolutions passed to the effect that the Christian church and secular and religious press join the proposed League in a "vigorous and persistent warfare against the gambling vice in whatever form, whether in the marts of trade, on race-courses, in pool rooms, or at church fairs and charity bazaars, and we earnestly urge all reputable men and women to free themselves from all complicity with this fearful and soul-destroying vice." The gambling associated with horse-racing was condemned as productive of more crime and misery than any other form of this sadly prevalent vice. THE UNION SIGNAL rejoices at the formation of this League and will do its part to destroy this great evil.

THE resolution introduced in the House last Friday afternoon by Congressman Burrows, of Michigan, asks for an investigation of the Whisky Trust, on the grounds that it is producing an adulterated beverage, violating the anti-trust law, and defrauding the revenue. If all these things are going on, certainly even a gigantic Whisky Trust should be looked into. Who knows but that in doing so, Congress may open its eyes to the fact that, adulterated or unadulterated, an alcoholic beverage is a product which must be injurious to the public health? That a beverage containing alcohol is quite as unfit to drink as that adulterated with drugs from an apothecary's poison-labeled vial? A dreadful thing it is to transgress the law and to cheat the government of its just dues. Will the minds of our national Solons awaken to cognizance of the more important facts that the untrustworthy traffic in rum is and has been constantly violating the sweet home ties and robbing the manhood of the nation? By all means let the investigation proceed!

WE have always contended that a little good sturdy effort would bring about the change so greatly to be desired by which our streets should be purified from the presence of gross theatrical and other pictured advertisements. This has been proved on many a field, the latest instance that comes to our notice being a movement headed by Dr. Julia Plummer, one of our gracious Boston white-ribboners. Complaint was made to the proper authorities, backed up by petitions; and legal action was taken by those authorities which will result in the banishment of the odious posters. Who will be the next to "build over against his own house" in this practical and earnest way?

ONE of the most notable actions of the last convention of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union was the order to issue a series of Temperance Truth tracts. These are edited and published by the Paulist, Father Doyle, of New York City, Fifty-ninth street. The Manifestoes sent out from St. Paul, Minn., by that roused and rousing Father Matin Mahony, are a Gatling gun bombardment of the drink strongholds, a fiery rain of prohibition shot and shell. Father George Zurcher, of Buffalo Plains, N. Y., author of "Handcuffs for Alcohol," is one of the radical Catholic Prohibitionists, and advocates strongly cordial coöperation between Catholics and non-Catholics against the drink. With Bishop Ireland to the fore, the leadership of such progressive men is gathering a mighty Prohibition following in the Catholic church, and the Catholic Woman's Temperance Union will be no small part of it.

THE Light of the World from the first has been manifested in Willard Hall. The noon prayer-meetings increase in members and interest and power. At least two-thirds of the attendants are men, many of them strangers, and very wonderful are their relations of how they "happened to come in." At the last meeting one man said: "I was passing and slipped upon the ice in the Temple doorway. In recovering myself I noticed the unusual character of the decorations of the arch (the state shields), and entered, following your beautiful corridor into this hall, where this prayer-meeting is going on. Here I have been converted to God—I, who have not been inside a church for twenty-eight years." The same day another man stated: "I am only a transient in your city, but I chanced to step into this beautiful building and found myself here with you where I have found Christ, and go out into the world a new man." Like testimonies multiply, and the hour is crowded with spontaneous expression from hearts too full for silence.

JAS. C. WEBER, commissioner of immigration of the port of New York, testifies thus concerning the valuable work of Mrs. S. F. Grubb's department: "Miss Lindahl has been under my observation for nearly three years, serving in missionary work. I am qualified to state, and I most cheerfully do state that she has been earnest, faithful and untiring in her work in the extensive field here at the immigration station. Latterly her work has been confined entirely to the objects near and dear to the hearts of the women of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, to which she has given close and earnest attention. I say this most cheerfully, because I believe her to be a credit to any work in which she is engaged. When the immigrant lands here exhausted by the voyage, bewildered by his new surroundings, he is in a peculiarly appreciative mood for any favors bestowed or kindnesses shown to him, and impressions are made at this place which will never be removed. For these reasons I believe that there is no field which promises such desirable and lasting results for any kind of missionary work as this, and I sincerely hope that the necessary encouragement be furnished to increase rather than to diminish the scope of such work."

THERE IS GOD.

BY KATE BROWNLEE SHERWOOD.

Above the sea of human needs,
Above the mounts of loftier deeds;
Above the summits capped with snow,
Where proud ambition dies to go—
There is God.

Below the purposes of men,
Below the search of curious ken;
Below the silver and the gold,
With hands to steady and uphold—
There is God.

Beyond the wide horizon's reach,
Beyond the utmost bounds of speech;
Beyond the broad circumferences
Of circling sound and kindling sense—
There is God.

Within the gales that whistle by,
Within the seasons as they fly;
Within the reach of infant hand,
Within the hearts that understand—
There is God.

Behold, He came to men of old
In dreams and visions manifold!
Behold, revealed in larger view
To those who seek His will to do—
There is God.

TRIUMVIRI.

Uncle Sam as a Partner.

BY O. B. BIRD, M. D.

[The Triumviri are three young men, former school and college mates, a doctor, a lawyer and a clergyman, who spent a vacation in the summer of 1891, without their wives and children, camping in the Adirondacks, after ten years of work in their several professions. Their situation will account for their freedom of speech. They called each other Doc, Judge and Dominie.]

JUDGE.—Doc, have you any strength left, after the trouncing Dominie gave you in Greek history?

DOCTOR.—Certainly; my regular supply, plus what I gained in that conflict.

JUDGE.—Good boy! Profit by your defeats. You said the other day that the United States government is a partner in the liquor business. I should like to hear a further elucidation of that subject—if I may go to sleep when you get to nineteenthly.

DOCTOR.—Very well; hang yourself up to dry, and then tell me what the Secretary of the Treasury has to do.

JUDGE.—Draw his eight thousand dollar salary, of course, like an honest public servant. What more can you expect from one so near the throne?

DOCTOR.—In his department is the collection of internal revenue, including the liquor taxes.

JUDGE.—No doubt he's good at collecting. What next?

DOCTOR.—One of the thirty or more subdivisions of the Treasury department is presided over by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who sweeps his eye over the country, taking in the various sources of gain which the laws have provided.

JUDGE.—Holds out his hat in perpetual supplication, as it were.

DOCTOR.—Anything but supplication. It is imperious demand; money or life. The country is divided into a number of districts, each district having a collector, and now we are ready for business.

JUDGE.—Liquor business?

DOCTOR.—Yes. Up comes a man who says he wants to go into the distilling business, and the partnership begins.

JUDGE.—By ordinary rules of business Uncle Sam should furnish half the capital, and take half the profits.

DOCTOR.—Yes, but here we have extraordinary rules of business, whereby Uncle Sam furnishes none of the capital, save a few salaries of collectors, and takes, not only half the profits, but all the profits, and far more, for he demands six times the cost of the entire product of the distillery, and forces the distiller to sell at seven or eight times the cost of production, in order to get anything for himself.

JUDGE.—Doc, you're a larger dealer in the incredible than any one I ever heard!

DOCTOR.—Guess you've heard yourself, and you weigh more than I do. Uncle Sam says to the prospective distiller, "All right, my son, put up your building at your own expense and give me exact plans, but don't make any liquor nor put any grain into the building until I look the place over." So he spends a hundred thousand or half a million, and then the Collector of Internal Revenue sends a man to the district collector, and the two examine the new buildings to see if they correspond with the plans, and report accordingly.

JUDGE.—And if favorable, a permit issues, with rights and titles, and all the privileges thereunto appertaining, with power to send for persons and papers, and—

DOCTOR.—Not yet. The distiller knows that his liquor will not be marketable until it has a certain age—three years, since the introduction of heat as a means of aging it, formerly more; and so he asks Uncle Sam not to collect the tax—for he knows there will be a tax—until he sells it. And Samuel very generously says: "Very well, my son, if you will build a solid warehouse on the same premises with the distillery, and put every drop you make, into it, I will give you time on the tax, but not more than three years."

JUDGE.—And then the permit?

DOCTOR.—No; for the distiller might cheat, and so Uncle Sam appoints a man to carry the key of the warehouse.

JUDGE.—When the distiller owns the building?

DOCTOR.—Yes, even the owner cannot go in without the consent of this watchman, or storekeeper, as he is called. And when he does go in, there is a lock with a registering stamp, so that the number of times is recorded by perforations.

JUDGE.—I'd have an underground railroad to my private cellar, and run half my liquor there.

DOCTOR.—Not quite. That same storekeeper is required to familiarize himself with all the machinery and processes, and to see that the capacity of the plant is the same as reported by the district collector and the government deputy. Then he is to measure or weigh all the grain that goes into the building, and to measure accurately all the liquor that comes out.

JUDGE.—Well, that is supervision with a vengeance!

DOCTOR.—Yes, but even that is not all. When the liquor is sold, an account must be kept of the amount, the price, the date of manufacture and the names of the purchasers. The amount is shown by a government gauger, which makes another overseer, besides the necessary book-keepers.

JUDGE.—All of which tends to make the proprietor appear like a very diminutive character.

DOCTOR.—Oh, yes, he is hedged about on every side, and "worked for all he is worth," as the boys say.

JUDGE.—Where does the tax come in?

DOCTOR.—At the sale, based on the gauger's report, and not a drop delivered until ninety cents a gallon is paid to the district collector.

JUDGE.—How much does it cost to make a gallon?

DOCTOR.—I do not know exactly, but we can make a fair guess by subtracting the tax, ninety cents, from the selling price, one, ten, leaving twenty cents for the distiller.

JUDGE.—Is that all he gets?

DOCTOR.—Yes, and from it he must pay all his expenses and get all his profits.

JUDGE.—Has a distiller ever been known to make a living?

DOCTOR.—Whoever touches the business in any other way than as a laborer gets rich.

JUDGE.—Well, bad as I am, I have no wish to make money in that way. Hello, Dominie, why don't you take part in this international debate?

DOMINIE.—Because I can endure a lawyer's questions when he is looking for facts. You have brought out the important points. There is, however, one phase I should like to have ventilated, the idea of abolishing the tax. I once saw a report of a crank's talk, in which he was said to have advocated the removal of this government tax.

JUDGE.—Must be he wanted to swim in liquor.

DOMINIE.—That is what I thought at the time; but I have no opinions here on temperance questions until I hear from Doc.

JUDGE.—It would certainly cheapen the process of getting drunk.

DOCTOR.—Yes, but how much? Ninety cents, sixty drinks, one and a half cents a drink easily neutralized by adulteration. Did you suppose the government tax prevented drinking?

DOMINIE.—I declare, Doc, I'm almost ashamed to say I did. I never analyzed the figures, but I had a general idea that the more we taxed the business the more we held it in check.

DOCTOR.—You need to reverse that idea. Liquor men themselves want the tax, or some tax; I do not know what amount they would choose. There is a proposed bill, said to come with their approval, making it one dollar, twenty-five.

JUDGE.—If that is so—and if you say it's so, it's so if it isn't so—then the said liquor men cannot think it checks the business. How is it, Doc?

DOCTOR.—Simply that the payment of a tax to the government secures the protection of that government, precisely as the receipt of rent for property obligates the owner to protect the tenant.

JUDGE.—Why, yes, that's in my line, of course it does. Must furnish something in return for money received.

DOCTOR.—The same as with other taxes. The government takes a man's house and land away from him if he fails to pay the tax, and I have never heard this tax urged as a restriction upon ownership.

JUDGE.—Doc, you're the top dog in that argument. I am surprised that Dominie has been so blind. Was that what his "crank" meant?

DOCTOR.—I suppose so, for that is the ground now held by advanced temperance people. Remove the government protection and the traffic becomes an outlaw, and can be fought on its merits, like theft and murder. And I suppose many people think that the tax of ninety cents prevents the manufacture of whisky, and that its removal would start a host of amateur distillers. This idea applies only to the handful of illicit distillers who make a few barrels a year in mountain fastnesses, and to their friends who are kept back by fear of discovery, or inability to pay the tax. I suppose the government has spent more money in hunting them than the amount of the tax, besides sacrificing many lives. As to legitimate manufacture, the tax cuts no figure at all, since the price is paid by the consumers. There would be the same margin for profit that there is now, no more and no less, hence no more inducements to manufacturers than there are now. There would be, of course, if the selling price remained at one, ten or twenty; but it would drop ninety cents at once, leaving the field of competition on twenty to thirty cents, as it is to-day. And this would probably suppress the moonshiners, as they could not compete with large distilleries on equal terms.

JUDGE.—Then your no-tax theory does not mean free whisky at all?

DOCTOR.—No, but the exact opposite. Imagine a band of thieves paying two hundred a year to the state for permission to steal. Their license, although nothing but permission, would have the practical force of authority, because no inferior court could take it away.

JUDGE.—True as Dominie's preaching!

DOCTOR.—And the first step toward suppressing the gang would be—

JUDGE.—Free whisky, sure enough! Take away the license, pass laws against them, then trial and jail. Good!

DOCTOR.—Exactly what must be done with the liquor business. And this is why we aim at national legislation, instead of confining ourselves to nursing drunkards and pitying their wives.

JUDGE.—Dominie, how blind you have been!

DOMINIE.—I own it! I was educated in partisan grooves, but I hope I can see and think for myself hereafter.

JUDGE.—I hope you can, indeed! Say, Doc, as we are not yet asleep, under your ministrations, just give us a word as to the magnitude of this tax and the effect on the government finances of abolishing it.

DOCTOR.—Well, the entire income from all sources is about three hundred and fifty millions, of which the liquor traffic furnishes about one hundred millions—two-sevenths over one-fourth.

JUDGE.—A big corner to knock off.

DOCTOR.—Yes, too big, unless there is some compensation. The congressional appropriations always include large amounts that are made necessary by liquor. It takes about five millions to pay the wages of the five thousand men who serve as collectors, storekeepers, gaugers, etc. Perhaps there would be a little deficiency at first, although I think it could easily be met by some special legislation. That, however, is but an incidental matter. In general, I believe that the removal of government protection would almost immediately be followed by prohibition in many places and that very soon the necessity for appropriations would diminish enough to more than overbalance the falling off of the income.

JUDGE.—Good, if true, but is it?

DOCTOR.—There are hundreds or thousands of places all through the country outside of cities, where a majority are opposed to the saloons, but cannot prevent their existence because of the legal support.

JUDGE.—But a majority vote is law, anywhere in this country.

DOCTOR.—Yes, in equity, of course; but look at New Jersey. They have lately passed a law creating a state board, with authority to grant licenses in prohibition towns when local councils refuse, as they of necessity would.

JUDGE.—What! grant licenses over the local vote?

DOCTOR.—Certainly, even when the vote is fifteen to one in favor of prohibition.

JUDGE.—Why, Doc, such a law would wither in court like a leaf in the fire!

DOCTOR.—I know, but such a law has actually been passed, and already in one town saloons have been forced upon the people, notwithstanding the heavy temperance vote; while others are in constant fear.

JUDGE.—I thought legislatures had more sense!

DOCTOR.—Whatever some of them have, there are some that do not have a sense of justice. You may assume, as a general working theory, that the laws will be shaped to favor the traffic, no matter what little restrictions occasionally appear on the surface.

JUDGE.—Yes, but laws must be laws, that is, something that can stand alone. Why pass unconstitutional laws?

DOCTOR.—Simply for the two or three years of time required to prove their unconstitutionality.

JUDGE.—I see. Great is legislation! Guess I'd better not accept the nomination offered me in that letter this morning.

DOCTOR.—On the contrary, I wish you would accept it. But I'll tell you one thing; you may be a big tail, but you cannot wag the dog. The party will cover you out of sight. But you can stand for right and justice; and in the near future, when all the best people are Prohibitionists, they will recognize your record and make you governor.

JUDGE.—You make me blush. And are you looking for such a millennium?

DOCTOR.—Yes; and as the traffic melts away, there will be restored to ways of productive usefulness an army of half a million now engaged as bar-tenders, drivers, etc., and a larger army of drunkards and moderate drinkers; so that the national income from ordinary taxes will be greater, while the expenses will be less, and the result will soon be a lowering of the tax rate, with increase of prosperity—not to mention the trifle of homes restored and hearts renewed.

JUDGE.—Doc, I think that is enough for Dominie to sleep on; we'd better turn in.

REFORM FORCES; HOW CAN THEY UNITE?

BY MARY T. LATHRAP.

When conditions exist which are epoch making, it is well to look backward from the tumult of the present to the settled past, and seek from history a premise for conclusions.

The gathering of reform forces in national life may have a variety of outside and material causes, but the moral principles which are the soul of true reform, obey one law. They abide in the realm of unchangeable right and declare the presence of God in government.

"There is a close relation between markets and morals, and when morals decline, markets suffer," I read in a morning paper within a week and it is true. Let it be settled, therefore, that reform forces cannot successfully unite on the basis of markets with morals left out and the "dominant issue" must get beyond commerce.

Just after the election of Mr. Cleveland in 1884, there appeared in the columns of the Inter Ocean a series of letters addressed to him and signed "Siva," that for brilliant audacity have not been equaled in recent political writing.

One letter, entitled, "What hammers rung, what anvils beat," has this to say of the method by which reform forces once gathered, made issue with the past and changed history. Speaking of the Republican party, "Siva" says:

"In its very inception it was a rebellion, not only against all other political creeds, but also against all accepted methods. It was the most amazing piece of political conglomerate which the history of parties reveals. It had at first no politicians in it. Its differential idea had been gathering strength in the popular mind for a score of years. Neither party would give it lodgment or countenance, though both had used it for their own advantage. . . It was anomalous also in the contrariety of its elements. The extremes of political faith were found in its ranks. Whigs and Democrats, Federalists and States-rights, theorists, protectionists and freetraders. . . These were banded together by the one common idea that whatever might be done must be done to restrain and eventually to eradicate American slavery. . . There was an instantaneous subordination of all other political purposes to the promotion of an "irrepressible conflict" which most of its members, no doubt, supposed it would require generations to decide."

Here, then, were the conditions: A great people in revolt "against political creeds and political methods;" a moral "idea which had grown in the public mind for a score of years;" the coming together of the extremes of political faith around that "common idea," "the subordination of all other political purposes" to one end if it took generations.

It will be seen that individual opinion was not counted. On the way to the place of union all principles were laid aside for the one on which they could agree. A moral idea, and a "dominant issue" gave the ground of union, and brought, alas, through what sorrow, the final consummation.

We have, as we ask the question with which we started, many conditions present in the old conflict—the revolt of the people, a moral idea in mind and conscience, but as yet, divided lines of battle. The Reform forces to be united have found political expression in the Prohibition and the People's parties. Can they unite, and how? is the question of many minds.

The Prohibition party is a revolt of conscience against the iniquity of the liquor traffic, and also against the system of legislation by which it is sustained. It is likewise the revolt of statesmanship and patriotism, against government complicity with an organized force which is un-American, disloyal, law-defying, debauching and dangerous.

The party has many sympathies and principles in common with other political organizations, but the reason for its being lies in the issue which sets it apart from all others. This surrendered, a traitor to its past, a nonentity for the future, it only encumbers the path of progress, and should be out of the way.

The People's party is a revolt against the present relations of production and capital, muscle and money, and a declaration of hostility to the parties that through years of legislation have fostered the wrongs which make such revolt necessary and logical.

Much that the People's party declares has been better said by the Prohibitionists before these belated reformers awoke to see the evils and rebuke them.

There seems but one serious barrier between these forces of reform, and that is the prohibition issue. This question, vital to the Prohibitionists, the Populists have repudiated, in platform and action, as fully as have the old parties. If for the sake of union the Prohibitionists pull down their uncompromising standard and cross over to the other camp they lose all, and consent to relegate this greatest question to the rear of others, long argued as less important.

Will the Prohibitionists cross over? We think not.

If the People's party go to the Prohibition camp what do they lose? Nothing in principle, and to their honor be it said, but a small percentage of their following. What do they gain? An organization, national and not sectional, principles vital to the whole people and not a fraction of them, and a mighty moral issue on which rests the prosperity of the markets they seek to improve.

Will the Populists cross over? We think not.

There can be no common ground for the two forces without an uncompromising stand for the prohibition of the liquor traffic. This the Prohibitionists have taken and held for heroic years; to it the other forces must move, since in morals there is no middle ground.

The million votes for Weaver will make the Populists hesitate in pride and assurance of the future. The less should come to the greater, they will argue, and not yet do we see "how they can unite." Will one leave the ground of principle? Will the other leave the ground of seeming success?

The answer appears to be No; meanwhile the nation's choice goes on between Barabbas and Christ, with the majority yet for the robber.

SOMETHING OF A WOMAN.

BY JAMES CLEMENT AMBROSE.

Many of the suggestions to women, if taken, should be added to, then passed on to men. And with a "woman" in the caption, of course the brotherhood will not miss this.

What should a woman be? The best she knows how, and a student of the how. Opportunities are not all accidents; but, like the fruit of the vine, hang beneath foliage—need looking for, feeling after. None so frail or poor she may not have chance for excellence unto others made to order—made to fit her hand; however small. And what a woman can do, the good man can try.

And what makes a woman good-looking? The cosmetics dashed upon the surface by a soul too large for self—too large to be caged. The hand of a kind act is an art-its in flesh tints; and the foreign memory of it sees no wrinkles. Recognized sympathy with human sorrow took off the mask of plainness from the roughest features of the century, disclosing there the beauty of nobility.

Senator "Thad" Stevens once conducted to the White House an old German woman seeking a reprieve for her soldier boy, court-martialed to be shot. Mr. Lincoln said: "Army officers complain that I am interfering with discipline." The senator said nothing, and Mr. Lincoln sat a moment looking at the old mother, then turned and wrote the reprieve. Passing out behind the senator, the woman muttered to herself, and he asked: "What's the matter, madam?"

"Oh, sor, folks did a big lie so 'bout Mr. Linakum; they tole me he were homely like old hedge fence, when he are the most handsomest man I ever seen."

Yes, kindness is the most flattering artist we can sit for a picture to. Our memory of mother's face is full of tender words, little pats of kindness, nightly vigils round our measled couch, great reprieves from punishment deserved; and we think not on her trembling hand in age, her feeble footstep and wrinkled brow at our last visit home—only remember the handsomest woman we ever saw. Perhaps the old rabbi was right, that "God could not be everywhere, and so made mothers." At any rate, not one that secondeth his motion weareth an ugly look.

Form, the soft outline in flesh, is not the measure of beauty to thinking eyes. Indeed, there is no finer physical moulding than the fatted calf, the well ewed lamb in green pastures, the blooded colt whose dam gives all summer to his toilet, we call them "beauties," but we mean they are fine animals. And the girl whose only ambition is to be faultlessly "groomed" will hardly come to be worth more.

Why, you never know whether a face is handsome till you've read the story written there; and you can soon tell whether it is out of the nickel library or the hand-book of the best home and the only heaven. Babes are "pretty"—when their habitat borders on the washbowl, with pink and pinafore their annex; but they do not belong to the flora of beauty. Charles Augustus, in the green stage, thinks—if he thinks at all—that Clara Bell is almost divine; but commonly it is "divine foolishness" which only the sun of experience will tan to common sense. Girls are morally nice, fair, attractive—many of them—especially if studying to cultivate all their gifts; their mothers should be beautiful.

Beauty takes time—time with a beautiful purpose attached. The fad of the press is to say things by courtesy called funny about "maidens of many summers," though less perhaps now that the maidens are eliminating from editorial inkstand so many masculine minds that have worked themselves empty; object lessons are the best school-master against prejudice. Why, I know lots of "old maids" history will fall in love with; a class increasing by choice, affectionately wedded to a good purpose, the honeymoon never setting, and their brains adding mental base and hope to the world, even coaching posterity better than some mothers. A symptom of higher social life it is, that some women help themselves, not let out the job to a wooden man or the leather punch-bowl.

To have companioned with man is not always the sign royal of woman's good luck or great wisdom. Man, however, is a good companion, when a good man—and the woman is good. But the spirit on guard at the portals to Happy Land will not ask the womanly soul whether she had a husband, though he may admit some because they had, reciting that "these are they which have come out of great tribulation." No man, and fewer women, will be saved by the grace of a wedding day.

There is a woman worth a second look; I sometimes politely turn and take it, and would circuit the square to get her "good-morning"—something to flavor all the day and live an aroma in memory. She is neither gay nor gloomy; never distant, never familiar, yet always approachable; never loud of speech nor afraid to speak, always a timely word; never dressy, never dowdy—you don't remember what she had on; not what fashion calls "a beauty," yet a beautiful face, an inspiration to purest respect for womankind; not young, not old, yet the morning light in her home, the evening star in her community; the proud are humble before her, and the humble proudly look up to her; she reigns by the divine right of helping others to reign, and her subjects never ask why they obey.

Now, hers is a beauty the brush cannot copy; it has ripened amid the vines of devotion to a redeeming purpose, touching home with heaven, bringing back the wandering, kindling the cold hearth, feeding the hungry, visiting the sick never visited well, coaxing the careless to do likewise, breathing gospel into government—in a word, following Christ. This is why the soul within halos the outer woman with the face of glad tidings and the adoration of good men.

My friend, go bow where none other but the fever bows; pass the cup of cold water where the evil cup hath pawned every home comfort, weed out the corrupting book with the Book of the New Testament, waft your fellowship unto hearts called heathen, lead wounded virtue under shelter of purity, and awaken good, easy souls to serve the bottom of society, yet keep your own home on the high tide of satisfaction to all there, and the light of a Christianity, payable on demand, shining through the mist of tears for your fellows, will arch over you, too, this rainbow of richest, sincerest affection.

CHRISTIAN ARBITRATION AND THE PEACE SOCIETY

BY JOHN B. WOOD, SECRETARY.

When Mr. Andrew Carnegie invited the delegation of English members of Parliament to America to present the request for an Arbitration Treaty between England and the United States there was no Peace Association south of Boston.

The evangelical churches had no society to which they could delegate the charge of such an important movement. Therefore a party of gentlemen in Philadelphia formed one, as the Pennsylvania Branch of the American Peace Society, with the extra conditions that the membership should only consist of those who acknowledged Jesus Christ as their Lord and Saviour; that all the offices should be filled by members of the board of directors; that there should be no salaries thereunto attached; and that members should not necessarily be always at work, but only always in harness, ready for any work that might present, ready to do it with alacrity; and if funds were required, there were men of wealth on the board who need not be stopped from good work for want of money.

The first work after providing for the proper entertainment of the members of Parliament, was to send William Jones, secretary of the London Peace Society, to the W. C. T. U. annual meeting at Nashville; and a very good work that was.

Again, very effective work was done in the South American States conference at Washington, generally called the Pan-American Congress; also in sending Benjamin F. Trueblood, president of Pennsylvania College, Iowa, to Europe, for a year, mostly working in France, preparing, it seems, to be the most effective successor of Rev. R. B. Howard, secretary of the American Peace Society, who died in Rome after the Rome Congress, and to whose place Dr. Trueblood has since been elected.

The American Peace Society has now extended its work to nearly all parts of the world, published many million pages of literature and one book, the "Haydock's Testimony," for the large distribution of which the aid of every well-wisher is asked.

It is the expectation of the society to enter very actively into the arena for educating Christians into the errors of the war system, and to carry out the second article of the constitution which says:

"The objects of this corporation are to promote peace and good will among men; to show the baleful influences of war on all the great interests of mankind; and to promote the final abandonment of wars and appeals to physical force by the amicable settlement of differences between nations, peoples, classes and individuals."

Offices are being arranged in Shanghai as well as in Japan, and are also established in cities as follows: Athens, 29 Stadium street; Berlin, 29 Behrens Strasse; London, 31 Paternoster Square; New York, 459 Lexington avenue; Paris, 4 Place du Theatre Francais; Rome, 107 Via Nazionale; Philadelphia, 310 Chestnut street.

The American Peace Society particularly desires to work in unison with all other peace associations, but it does believe that the great and only true foundation for peace is in the conversion of the masses to Jesus Christ and in the conversion of the general Christian world to a full belief in Him and His doctrines, which are certainly contrary to the belligerent drift of human nature at present, and from which teachings many most active and noted Christians are very far off.

The society is now much interested in making the Columbian Peace Congress a great success, and shall count largely on W. C. T. U. aid to do it. A meeting of all the American peace societies was held December 15 in our Philadelphia office. Eight associations were represented, and an executive committee appointed: Benjamin F. Trueblood, Alfred H. Love, B. A. Lockwood, Dr. R. H. Thomas and Mrs. H. J. Bailey, your most efficient world-known superintendent of the department of peace and arbitration.

Christian peace societies are building up on the continent, notably in Italy, and my constant prayer is that God will give me health and strength to fall into line and work. He is doing it, and considerable good work has been done amongst foreign missionaries which probably would not have been but for the secretary being detained at Clifton Springs by lack of strength.

SHALL THE DRUNKARD VOTE?

BY HENRY A. KIDDER.

Prof. J. J. McCook, in a recent number of the Forum, prints an important article upon venal voting, which incidentally contains interesting testimony regarding the drink question.

The effect of intemperance upon the welfare of the community, through the exercise of the right of suffrage, has not been considered of much importance, but Professor McCook points out the fact that the venality of the intemperate or drunken voter is already a grave menace to the state, and a danger which is constantly increasing. He announces himself as "not a total abstainer either theoretically or practically," and as having always voted in favor of license, and this fact gives his words additional weight when he says:

"Anybody who can see must know that, considered merely as a question of social economy, of dollars and cents, of tax bills and public convenience generally, the 'drink question' is the question of the day. The tariff wrangle is a mere baby to it. If intelligent, steady-going people could be induced to spend upon the drink question a fraction of the time and money they employ upon the other we might hope for some real improvement in its treatment. Prominence is given therefore to the temperance and intemperance in venality, simply because the subject cannot be tested at all without giving that prominence."

As the tables in Prof. McCook's article were not prepared with especial reference to the development of this question, it is somewhat difficult to get at facts which can be stated briefly and without laborious explanation, but it is plain that they strongly and completely support the opinion quoted above. One of these tables, however, in which the venal voters are tabulated according to their drinking habits, is instructive. This shows that forty-four and four tenths per cent of the venal voters in a certain city ward are "drunkards and hard drinkers"; forty-six per cent are "every-day drinkers but not drunkards," while only nine and six tenths per cent are "not drinkers and not shiftless."

Again, Prof. McCook finds that in the towns and city wards covered by his inquiry, one hundred and thirteen out of every thousand voters were venal; and further, that out of every (assumed) thousand of intemperate voters, five hundred and forty were venal; in every thousand drunkards, seven hundred and ninety were venal; and out of every thousand voters known to have been arrested or imprisoned, chiefly for drunkenness and its attendant crimes, seven hundred and seventy-eight were venal.

The points given above by no means exhaust the arguments against the drink evil contained in Prof. McCook's article, but illustrate in the strongest manner the political dangers attending intemperance, from the fact that the drunkard is also a voter. Experience teaches that a man who has a consuming thirst for strong drink is peculiarly open to bribery and corruption. Once thoroughly under control of such an appetite he is no longer responsible, but seems to have passed into a state of physical and mental disintegration—a sort of moral dry-rot.

In considering remedies for this evil the first thought is that it is the duty of the state to suppress the active agent in this debasement—the grog-shop—as a measure of self-protection. Not only should this be done on account of the facts indicated above, but also from that other well-known fact, that the saloons are skillfully used for the corruption of voters and in the control of elections. It thus becomes a duty incumbent upon all citizens to unite, regardless of party affiliations, and to work together for the stamping out of the evil. The question is above party, and should be kept free from the taint of partisanship. This has been done in the local option campaigns in the Massachusetts towns, with the best results. The question concerns the life and well being of the state, and as all citizens unite to ward off a visitation of the cholera or to resist invasion by a foreign foe, so this question, which Prof. McCook justly pronounces "the question of the day," should be met by an uprising of all patriotic citizens.

What measure of restriction will best relieve the community of this venal, drunken vote? Many students of political economy advocate that the right of suffrage be taken away from those who persistently neglect to vote; but here is a pressing and more dangerous evil, for men debased and debauched are bribed into voting for candidates without a thought of their fitness for office, or the slightest consideration for the principles involved in the canvass.

Would temporary deprivation of the right to vote be too severe a punishment for the crime of drunkenness? It would not be so great a punishment as arrest and imprisonment are in many cases, and would at the same time lessen the danger arising from a mass of venal drunkards whose purchasable votes often carry close elections. At least, this punishment might be applied to those arrested and imprisoned for drunkenness or its attendant crimes, without hardship. Some such remedy seems to be needed, and, in fact, Professor McCook in a later article in the same magazine suggests something of this nature among other possible remedies for venal voting.

Paupers are not allowed to vote in some states, but many worse than paupers—vicious and even criminal—are given that privilege. Habitual drunkards should be treated as irresponsible, and should be deprived of their political power until reformed. This idea, it is true, has not generally obtained in temperance work, but thoughtful citizens are coming slowly to realize the fact that the drunkard is a criminal, and should be treated as such. It is well that public thought is being awakened to the danger from this direction. Discussion of the subject will undoubtedly result in strengthening the belief that more rigid measures of restriction must be applied to the drunkard as well as to the drunkard-maker.

THE BRITISH NATIONAL TEMPERANCE LEAGUE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—A special honor was recently granted to this vigorous organization by the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress of London, allowing its representative members to assemble in the Egyptian Hall of the mansion house in the English metropolis.

Another pleasant incident of the gathering was the presence of the Bishop of London, who occupied the chair and delivered an impressive speech. His Lordship has no equal on the bench of bishops, as a stalwart and uncompromising advocate of entire abstinence.

The National Temperance League has rendered for many years splendid service to the temperance movement in Great Britain. Its able lecturers and trenchant literature make it in some respects second to none of kindred societies in pressing forward the cause of sobriety. Thoroughly national in its principles, it welcomes men and women of every shade of political opinion and religious faith in combating the evils of intemperance. By means of Band of Hope unions it enlists the warm enthusiasm of the young and affords them opportunities of doing what lies in their power to promote the grand work. Growingly is it recognized that the hope of England is the children, with regard to a temperate nation. It was observed that there were three sides to the drink question—the pathetic, the apathetic and the sympathetic, and, most probably, young England would be won on the sympathetic side to become life-long crusaders.

The excellent work of the League received eloquent compliments from the Bishop of London. He eulogized its broad platform and its staunch fidelity to the total abstinence flag. His Lordship emphasized the need of striking yet more powerfully the public mind in order to sweep away many mischievous opinions respecting the nature of drink, to make more evident the amount of evil it was producing, and to show in what way they might ultimately hope to achieve success. The whole matter was now looked upon, happily, very differently from the way it was forty or fifty years ago, a change which was unquestionably due to the perpetual and persistent exertions of temperance associations. There was some cause, however, for disappointment that the question was treated more lightly than it should be, and, too frequently it was overlooked in what an incisive manner St. Paul denounced drunkenness. Christians especially had the duty laid upon them to discountenance in the strongest way anything like levity in regard to drink. In very solemn tones His Lordship called upon his audience "to see to that in all their ordinary conversation; to treat the subject as they should treat it in the sight of God; to make it distinctly understood that they looked upon drunkenness as a most grievous sin; to show that, in their opinion, those who considered it lightly were forgetting their duty to God and to the Saviour, and to make it generally known that, cost what it might, the evil must and should be put down by the determined resolution of those who cared for God's service, and meant to lead Christian lives." This was the question which every man and woman in the land was required to lay to heart.

With earnestness of entreaty Bishop Temple alluded to the need of temperance effort for the reclamation of Englishwomen from the allurements of drink. Among the women there was distinct want of progress. As a part of the nation they were, even more than men, bound to care about this thing, inasmuch as they suffered from it more than the other sex. It was a lamentable fact that for a few years past, and to-day, there was a growing increase of intemperance in female circles which was fearful to contemplate. This alone made it obligatory upon every true man to make people in every sphere of life to look upon such a thing as horrible. Terrible as it was that a man should give way to drinking there was something quite revolting to humanity in the thought that women did so, that the purity, the natural refinement and modesty which distinguished women should be degraded by so fearful a fall as that the woman created to be the help-meet for man, and in many ways the very representative of the heavenly life to us—that the woman, with her gentleness, her tenderness and the wonderful charm with which God had endowed her, should be degraded by such an animal indulgence.

On this ground and in the light of appalling disclosures bearing upon the drinking habits of women in Great Britain the bishop urged temperance workers to be earnest, resolute and unwavering in their advocacy. There was no time to slacken their exertions in response to God's call to sound in people's ears the evils of the curse of drunkenness, and woe to those who refused to listen to it. If enlightened men did not recognize their duty to esist the traffic they would assuredly be called to account at the last for not having used their energies to advance a cause in which physical, social, moral and spiritual interests were inextricably entwined.

In view of the ripening public sentiment on the temperance question and its recognition by institutions, scholastic and philanthropic, in England, the National Temperance League and similar organizations are making arrangements for a strong campaign this winter, more particularly in demanding legislative enactments, by which drinking facilities will be materially reduced.

WYOMING HELPERS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Your ready response to my call in THE UNION SIGNAL of November 3 has filled me with gratitude to you and to the dear Father who endowed mankind with such generous impulses. From the north and the south and the east and the west letters have already come to me from sisters who are anxious to advance the white ribbon in Wyoming. One asks for nine names to whom THE UNION SIGNAL may be sent, another for three, another for "a few"; (how many is that?). And so on till they add up thirty-one in a week. I am hopeful they will soon amount to hundreds.

One writes: "I think our strong unions all over the land would each give an order for two or three copies if the subject were presented to them. Will not every white-ribboner who reads this see that the matter is presented to her union, and give it a chance to enter the list of Wyoming helpers?"

Several offer to send their UNION SIGNALS as soon as read. At first I thought with one bright sister, how easy in this way to flood Wyoming with just the literature needed; and then, I thought again, this would cost each helper a cent a week, aggregating fifty-two cents in the course of the year, which amount would send the paper directly from THE UNION SIGNAL office for six months. Our National organ would be strengthened, the Wyoming readers would receive their copies fresh from the press, and the already read numbers, if handed to neighbors who cannot, or who do not, take this advanced journal, but who would gladly read it, would still do the double service planned and the two talents would be put out to the highest usury. I know it is easier for many of us to give a cent a week for fifty-two weeks in succession, than to give fifty cents all at once. If any can do the one and not the other, by all means work out your first generous thought. Whoever sends THE UNION SIGNAL into our homes sends a blessing there. It is a winged messenger of truth, May it come to us more and more.

I am daily in receipt of packages of back numbers, and other temperance and religious papers for distribution, for which I give warm thanks. If they could be sent directly to the towns where they are to be distributed, it would save expense. I will gladly give addresses to those who have such packages to send out.

TO SUFFRAGISTS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—In reply to many letters of inquiry kindly allow me space in your paper for the following account of my attempt at registration in Seymour, Conn.

On October 18, 1892, within the dates prescribed by law, I made application in writing, to the Board of Registrars of Voters, that my name be placed upon the list of "electors to be made" prior to the national election of November, 1892, declaring my intention to vote for the member of Congress representing the district in which I live, under the protection of Sec. 2, Art. I, United States Constitution, which says: "The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several states."

The said Board of Registrars duly considered the application, and notified me that my name had been refused place on the list of "electors to be made" on the ground that I was "a woman."

My first step was to formulate a petition which I sent up, through my congressman, into the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, asking that "honorable body to declare by a legal enactment my right (in spite of the fact that I am 'a woman'), to vote for members of Congress in the Congressional district where I reside, if possessed of all other qualifications required by law."

Following this, in order to show that other women beside myself would have availed themselves of the same privilege, had I been properly registered and allowed to exercise my political rights, this second petition was formulated:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress Assembled:

WHEREAS, An opinion prevails that women would not avail themselves of the right to vote were they permitted to exercise it.

Therefore, The ——— Woman Suffrage Association sends to you the accompanying names and post-office addresses of women in this State who would avail themselves of the privilege, were they adequately protected therein. And we pray your honorable body to enact a law which shall assist and protect them in the exercise of the right to vote.

(Signatures of officers of the State Woman Suffrage Association to be appended here.)

The work of collecting names to accompany this last petition should begin as soon as the following form can be printed and distributed over the several states:

To the Women of the State of ———

"If woman-citizens were permitted to exercise the right of suffrage, would you avail yourselves of the privilege?"

All women who would answer this question affirmatively, are asked to sign their names and to give their addresses upon this paper.*

NAMES.	RESIDENCES.

*All lists, as soon as filled, to be sent to —— ——, State Corresponding Sec'y —— Woman Suffrage Association.

The utmost effort of all suffragists should be put forth to attain the desired end, i. e., the securing of so many names upon these papers that Congress could not afford to ignore them. Women have achieved so much within the past twenty years, that a great hope lies ahead of us if these petitions can go up into Congress in sufficient numbers. I believe profoundly that the work itself must so stir up our organizations and our individual helpers as to start the uprising of a public sentiment which shall demand favorable action upon our question. This matter will be brought before our National Convention, and, in case we are able to secure a hearing before the committee of Congress to whom my petition has been referred, a delegation may be sent from the National American Woman Suffrage Association to speak for the bill.

I appeal for the aid of all suffragists. Let us not allow a single opportunity to pass without impressing upon it all it will hold. A campaign of education must surely hasten the day when the womanhood of our beloved country shall be citizens with citizens' privileges.

THE SITUATION IN GERMANY.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—I have received No. 45 of your excellent paper and was very much astonished to find on page 5 an article headed, "The Working Classes in Germany." Although knowing my inability to write a readable letter in the English language, yet I felt it my duty to send you some lines as a reply. I have no doubt that the writer of the above mentioned paper had the intention to do some good by it, and that she witnessed, perhaps, in her early years, such scenes as described in her paper.

But evidently she had no opportunity to study German life at large. I have spent my whole life in Germany, and as a Methodist minister I am living for about twenty years in daily contact with the working classes; but I am obliged to say that not one sentence of Anna Swenson's article can be sustained in its general meaning. It is not true, that (with the working classes) the family lives in a back chamber "of only one room." Here in Bremen most working people have two or three rooms besides a kitchen. Many own a small house for themselves. Many are sober people, good husbands and fathers. Perhaps they are accustomed to drink beer, but they are by no means generally drunkards, and many do not go to saloons.

Among the women you can find many good house-keepers, only a small percentage being obliged to go out to earn money. I never met an instance that a child of nine years was sent out into the world to earn his "own living," and yet Anna Swenson states that this is the common rule. In Germany parents are not free to send their children to school at will. Our compulsory system of public schools does not allow them to keep their children away; all children must attend school from their sixth until their fourteenth year; only in some sections the time is from the sixth to the end of the thirteenth. I never saw a child of four years "dead drunk," never saw a a boy of fourteen "mentally and physically a wreck" from intemperance.

Of course I will not deny that the curse of intemperance rages in Germany—as in many other lands, the United States not excepted; that it is ruining thousands of men, and women also, and that thousands of children by inheritance and the bad example they have before their eyes daily, are growing up drunkards. I will not deny that there are such bad cases as described by A. Swenson, but by her unexampled generalizations she exaggerates the truth in such a measure that the only effect of her words with a German reader will be to fill his heart with disgust against the temperance movement, and anxious that this good cause shall not be spoiled by a well-meant, but unwise article, I write this letter. It is not my purpose to draw a picture in bright colors as a contrast; I will only ask: Why such exaggerations, when the simple truth is sad enough?

You Americans have given us a splendid example in the battle against intemperance. We thank God for your victories, that have inspired a good number of men and women in Germany to begin a similar work. The Lord is with us. Many a man has been saved from drunkenness, misery and sin; many a home, once a desolate one by strong drink, has been reformed and changed into a Christian home, where parents and children are serving the living God. Not all the workers in this field are standing on the same platform as you and I, but total abstinence is better understood in Germany every year. In all classes of society there are friends and advocates of teetotalism, and we are resolved to go on, and beg you for your sympathy and prayers.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.—Heb. 9: 1.

The Woman's Business Journal, of Chicago, had a nice article on the Temple some time ago, and as it is interesting sometimes to know in what estimate we are held by our neighbors we give a few extracts from this able woman's paper. After speaking in the most laudatory terms of the origin and beauty of the Temple the editor says: "As a scheme in finance it is without parallel, . . . the grandest of monuments to consecrated energy and womanly aspiration; of what this building, as the source of high and holy inspiration among women is to be in the years to come, no mind can conceive. Already is its power known and felt; already the two hundred thousand women constituting the rank and file of the W. C. T. U. are turning their thoughts toward this Temple, much as did the Israelites of old turn their thoughts toward their own holy place in Jerusalem; and already many times this number of children, boys as well as girls, the men and women of the future, are being taught a loving reverence for this place, knowing that from thence come the help and teachings which shall most surely establish them in ways of pleasantness and peace. . . On the eleventh floor is Mrs. Carse's room where her secretary is kept busy attending to correspondence concerning the Temple. On the twelfth floor is one large corner room which has been set apart as a reception room for the use of ladies in the building, and for a convenient place of meeting the constant stream of W. C. T. U. callers, all the time wending their way hither from a distance. This room is furnished handsomely in Moorish style. In close proximity to it is an elegant suite of toilet rooms in charge of a maid whose whole time is devoted to the care of the rooms and serving the wants of the lady callers. Women visiting the World's Fair will find this cozy nook, among the turrets of this unique building, one of the most convenient and charming of rest spots in the city."

Let not our friends from abroad who are visiting this city forget that the altar fire in Willard Hall has been lighted never to be quenched while the building stands, and we cordially invite all temperance and Christian people, as well as those who are not Christians, to attend the daily noon gospel temperance meeting from 12 to 1 o'clock. The first noon meeting was held Monday, January 9, and was most fittingly conducted by Mrs. Louise S. Rounds, who in years past was in charge of the three o'clock meetings in Farwell Hall, Chicago, where such a wonderful work was accomplished in saving drinking men, until the W. C. T. U. was shut out of it by the Y. M. C. A. The same work is again inaugurated in a hall of our own which we trust will prove a very Bethel to souls. Already a great many have signed the pledge and some seem to be hopefully converted.

Lincoln, Ill., W. C. T. U. sends $20, which is the last installment on its $100 pledge. The Lady Henry Somerset union, St. Paul, Minn., sends $75 which completes its $100. The first district W. C. T. U. of Michigan sends check for $100 for tablet. The following unions have all lately paid installments on hundred dollar pledges (the amount each has sent will be found in our treasurer's, Miss Pugh's report): Angola, Ind., Macedon Centre, N. Y., Hutchinson, Minn., Hannibal, Mo., Garden City, Kan., Brookfield, Mo., Kirtland, O., Wellsville, N. Y., Sparta, Ill., Brainerd, Minn., Morrison, Ill,. Wichita, Kan., Waterville, Kan., Newark, O., Boulder, Col., Greenwich, Conn., Payson, Ill., Bisselle, O., on Grange county pledge; Forksville, Pa., on Sullivan county pledge; Oketo, Kan., W. and Oketa Y's on Marshall county pledge. Mrs. E. Thomas of Humboldt Park, Ill., sends $5 for herself and grandchildren, Gertrude Stannard, Harold, Marjorie and Irene Warr.

Little Florence Wickham, Spencer, Ia., a little girl aged eleven years, sends for twenty-five mite-boxes for free distribution. She pertinently asks: "Do you think I can raise the whole $91.25 by the 1st of August next? I do." Yes, little Florence, I do, too, and I believe you will raise the round hundred dollars. A faith like this which goes with works never fails. Would that all our white-ribboners had the faith of this little child. Another example of this beautiful faith comes to me from a young woman twenty years old—Miss Myra L. Miller, Mahoney City, Pa. She is the daughter of an Evangelical minister, who has to change his pastorate every three years. This young lady is the secretary of the union. She writes that at each meeting herself and mother urged upon the union the duty of raising $100 for the Temple. She says: "We accomplished our object at the last meeting, and now the ladies seem enthusiastic over the matter. At first they thought it too much to undertake, but I said: 'No pains no gains; if we attempt nothing we gain nothing.' I have been appointed Temple superintendent. The Lord will help, I know, so please reserve a tablet for us. The money will be raised before April, for in March my father's pastorate expires here. Please find 45 cents for thirty mite boxes. 'Without faith it is impossible to please God.'"

Mr. Marshall Field has been paid another $10,000 on his stock besides interest up to date. Less than ten thousand of our issue of $300,000 Temple trust bonds are left unsold. One of the late large purchasers of Temple bonds is a noble white-ribboner of Philadelphia, Pa., Mrs. Cornelia E. Moorehead. Address Mr. H. C. Spear, 237 LaSalle street in regard to Temple bonds. Remember they pay a six per cent dividend which matures semi-annually.

THE WHITE RIBBON ARMY.

BY H. LAVINIA BAILY.

(Adapted to the music of "King Bibbler's Army.")

In the years, years ago, when the true-hearted women
Started forth on their errand of prayer,
Many said, "'Tis the cry of the home for protection,"
Others said, "'Tis a delusion and snare."
Some said softly, "God bless you,"—some murmured "Mistaken—"
Some the swift shafts of calumny hurled;
But they went bravely forward, a praying procession,
Marching out, out, out in the world.

(Chorus.)

Hark! hark! a pageant passes, tread, tread, tread, tread,
I hear the tramp of moving masses, tread, tread, tread, tread,
And now to save our young men the white ribbon army
Marches on, on, on round the world.

At the head of the host come the silver-haired mothers,
Arm in arm with the daughters so fair;
While the wives for their husbands, the girls for their brothers
Raise their voices to heaven in prayer.
As their pleadings prevail, and "the worst foe" surrenders,
The white banner of peace is unfurled;
And we now may behold them, a joyful procession,
Marching on, on, on round the world.

They have entered the gates of the "Empire Celestial,"
They have compassed the "Isles of the sea";
And they carry glad tidings of good to all people,
From the land of the brave and the free.
On the peeress of England, on Afric's dark daughter,
Is the white ribbon emblem now twirled,
And the army moves onward, a dauntless procession,
Marching on, on, on round the world.

WHICH LOVED BEST?

A True Temperance Story.

BY CLARA SMITH COLTON.

About two years ago, while waiting for a train in an Eastern city, I unexpectedly met a friend whom I had known as a schoolmate in the Southwest. My friend insisted upon my remaining a day to talk over old times. I had many questions to ask and she had much to tell of the changes that had come to different ones whose faces I remembered as I looked through her album.

"Who are these beautiful girls in this picture of a tableau representing the 'Three Graces'?"

"One is my niece, Ruth; the second is Effie Cunningham and the other is Louise LeMar. They were little children when you moved away from Cedar City. They developed into three most lovable and attractive girls. They differed greatly in look and in character, but were closely united in the unusual bond of friendship. Dear, sunny-hearted girls! Little did they then dream of the future before them!"

"Tell me the whole story," I said. "I remember their parents very well and can think just how the three little six-year-old girls used to look going to school arm in arm."

"Yes, they were always together, and they graduated from the high school in the same class when they were seventeen. At that time this picture was taken. Ruth was the strongest character of the three. She was a fine student, was thoughtful and earnest in disposition and very conscientious in any matter of duty. Her heavy braids of brown hair, her tall, graceful form and serious gray eyes made her appear much older than she was.

"After graduating from the high school Louise remained at home with her widowed mother; Ruth and Effie went East to a young ladies' seminary, Ruth to fit herself for teaching special branches, and Effie (as her mother said) to acquire 'society accomplishments and general culture.'

"Effie's mother was very ambitious for her, and planned from her childhood that she should 'marry well,' and that meant in Mrs. Cunningham's mind to marry a rich man, who could place Effie in a prominent social position.

"At the end of the year when the two girls were to return from school Mrs. Cunningham arranged through some friends in Washington that Senator Chadwick's son, who was going out West to look after his father's land, should accompany the girls on their homeward trip. And it happened that Stanley Thornton was on the same train, going out to Cedar City to enter his uncle's law office. You can easily imagine that an intimate friendship resulted from this long journey together of four congenial young people. Weeks of summer gaieties followed, and Stanley Thornton and Ruth and Gerald Chadwick and Effie were always seen together.

"Louise, instead of showing any loneliness or jealousy at the loss of the constant companions, was delighted at what seemed the prospect of two happy marriages. She would say to me: 'How perfectly they are suited! Mr. Chadwick is the type of a Southern gentleman, rich, handsome and aristocratic. You know Effie's mother fairly worships 'blue blood,' and Stanley Thornton has a cultivated literary taste and admires Ruth's fine scholarship.'

"The following winter there came to Cedar City a temperance lecturer who was holding meetings in the different towns with the hope of helping the vote for no-license. Popular sentiment in Cedar City at once bestowed on him the then newly-coined name of 'crank'; but his eloquent earnestness, logical reasoning and quick wit attracted and held large audiences. There began to be a reasonable hope of winning the day at the polls if the influence of some of the prominent business and professional men could be secured for the no-license movement.

"One evening, after Ruth had come home from the temperance lecture, the young people were talking on the subject of no-license and I could not help overhearing their conversation.

"'You see, Ruth,' Stanley was saying, 'we must consider policy as well as duty. We need the money paid by the saloons to use for public improvements. Besides the times are not yet ready for this reform. Public sentiment would not sustain it. Of course I do not mean that we actually uphold the business of the saloon-keepers, but we must remember that they are only following out the principle that a demand for a thing creates the supply. So it is the drunkards who make the dram-shops to begin with. I think the most definite temperance work now is to educate people up to the standard of manhood that will lead to a general letting alone of saloons. Then they will go fast enough. Instead of pitching into the saloon-keepers we ought to do more to cultivate strength in men to resist temptation. The man who is honest is not tempted to steal by seeing fruits set out in front of shop windows. If a man steals deliberately he suffers the penalty. If a man is so foolish as not to resist the temptation to drink and goes so far as to get drunk, he, too, should suffer the penalty. Have we the right to ask the aid of the law against an evil which is an evil only because some men will not restrain themselves properly? What harm do the saloons do to me or to any man who is a man?'

"'But all men are not like you, Stanley,' said Ruth's soft voice. 'I know that men are weak to yield to the temptation of the saloons. So are they weak to yield to the temptation of the lottery. But you and other good men do not say, 'They should avoid the lottery or suffer the penalty.' You say, 'Shame on a state or a nation to license such a thing!' although some of the people of Louisiana plead that they needed the revenue from the lottery for public improvements just as men say the license money from saloons is needed. Our nation will not license the making of counterfeit money; but it does license saloons which make counterfeit men! You say we should educate people up to the standard of resisting excess in the use of liquor. Suppose that flies were of value like honey-bees and we wished to keep them from getting caught and killed in the spider webs, should we try to teach the flies to be careful and not get too near the spiders hiding in the webs? I should seize woman's weapon, a big broom, and brush away every spider's web. You men hold the weapon of the law; why not use it against liquor, as some states do against lotteries?'

"Stanley laughed rather uneasily as he said: 'You are a sympathetic woman, Ruth, and your feelings overbalance your judgment. We are growing too serious. Let us practice that new song.'

"'No, Stanley, I must talk. We want to think alike on every subject; to respect and trust each other's motives and opinions. Dear Stanley, I am going to tell you how I lost my father, and then you will not wonder that I feel so strongly on this matter.'

"I did not think it right to hear more of Ruth's talk so I went upstairs. I knew only too well the pitiful story of her father's gradual growth in the drink habit and his final fall. After Stanley had gone that evening Ruth came up to my room with wet, shining eyes. 'Oh, auntie,' she said, 'I do think Stanley will come out for the no-license movement. He is going to talk with his uncle about it, and if Stanley does work for the temperance side in this campaign, he will carry with him the votes of a number of young men who are now undecided.'

"Stanley did talk with his uncle about it and found that he was utterly opposed to his taking any decided stand in the matter. He said that it would seriously injure their law practice, and Stanley must either give up all thought of working for no-license at the coming election and take prudent, neutral ground or he should dissolve their law partnership.

"Then Gerald Chadwick assailed Stanley with his battery of sarcasm: 'A reform that treats men, as mammas do in hiding the sugar bowl from their little boys! A drunkard brings the penalty on his own head. No gentleman will go to excess in the use of stimulants. Is Miss Ruth afraid to trust you? She is a lovely girl, but she has imbibed some Quixotic notions. From what I hear, Stanley, I believe you are the next state legislative member from this district; but if you go in with this fanatical no-license movement, it will kill your chances.'

"With such influences brought to bear upon him, what wonder that Stanley began to feel that Ruth was over exacting? Ruth had gone away for a visit directly after her earnest talk with Stanley. When she left she said to me:

"'I am sure I can make it plain in my letters that it is only because I love him so dearly that I insist upon this. It is a duty higher than my love for him. It is for conscience's sake.'

"Stanley did not work for no-license. It failed. Then saloon men laughed and drunkard's wives wept, but Stanley secured the nomination for member of the legislature. I soon had a letter from Ruth. She wrote:

"'Dear Auntie, I am not coming back to Cedar City. It is all over between Stanley and me. You know why, and you know how I suffer. You know I am right; dear Aunt Mary, pray for me.'

"When Louise LeMar heard what had happened, she came to me, her passionate French nature all aflame. 'How can Ruth be so cruel?' she said; 'she will break Stanley's heart and her own by holding to those overstrained ideas of duty.'

"'I am sure Louise was sincere at the time in her efforts to bring about a reconciliation between Stanley and Ruth. But the result of the sympathetic companionship was a brilliant double wedding the following Christmas: 'The talented young State Representative, S. F. Thornton, to the charming Miss Louise LeMar; and Senator Chadwick's son, Gerald, to the beautiful Southern belle, Miss Effie Cunningham.'

THE WINSOME TOKEN.

BY E. M. HECKER.

One bright afternoon some time ago I was out in the far eastern part of the city of S——, cailing on a white-ribbon sister. Starting home I walked several blocks to reach the horse cars, which brought me into a part of the city by no means the most reputable.

As I passed slowly along East Street, waiting for the car to return from the terminus of the route, I recalled a painful occurrence I had seen the last time I had been in that neighborhood—a little lad going with a bucket into the corner saloon and coming out before me to run home with what I knew must be beer. I pondered in my heart the way to prevent such contempt of our state law, which prohibits minors entering saloons, and how the people might be reached with "the everlasting gospel."

I noticed a group of children just before me—two little girls, each trundling a baby in a carriage, while a toddler, two or three years old, came bringing up the rear. The girls were so much interested in some plaything they were examining that, with their cortege, they were occupying almost the width of the sidewalk, and as I made my way as best I could, I smiled down at them and they shyly responded in kind.

I had gone about half a block farther when I heard them shouting something that sounded like "Temprunce!" As I was the only person in sight and had on a white ribbon I decided it must be meant for me. On the alert for new experiences and desirous of seeing what the spirit of the children might be I went back to them. Slowly repassing, smilingly regarding them, again I heard from one's lips "Temprunce," this time in a scarcely audible whisper.

Accepting this immediately as an invitation to open a conversation, I began to question the child as to what she meant. After some hesitation she explained:

"She," pointing to her playmate, "told me to say you was temprunce."

"I am," I responded, "and are you not?"

She bashfully hung her head, not seeming to understand the meaning of the term, and as she would make no reply I turned to the other little maid who had been silently watching. Before I could speak to her, she stepped toward me and bravely stretching forth her little hand, said:

"I want to shake hands with you."

Very few of my experiences as a white-ribboner have brought me keener pleasure than the tribute of this unknown child to "the winsome token" of our order. As I boarded the car and rode homeward through the lengthening shadows, my heart went out in grateful praise to Him who had prepared this sweet surprise for me in this unlikely place. I may never see that child again, but I pray and trust that her brave little spirit may grow purer and braver as time goes on, and that she too, some day, shall wear the white ribbon and be one of "the glorious company" of the W. C. T. U.

"W. C. T. U.!" Magic letters, full of all holy inspiration! No earthly tie is stronger than that expressed by our little, silken, snowy bow; no people are dearer than those who wear the dainty token; no work is happier than that done for its sake; no motive more appealing than the desire to be worthy to wear it. And for us all, the wide world over—beloved leaders and humblest followers—we pray the prayer of Tiny Tim, "God bless us, every one."

Mansfield, O.

THE ELDEST.

When the minister came to see us,
He sat in the easy chair,
And dear little Bess came shyly,
And stood by his elbow there.

His face it was solemn and wrinkled,
His voice very grave and low;
He wore wonderful gold-bowed glasses,
And his hair was white as snow.

He lifted the little maid gently,
And perched her upon his knee,
And said to her, "Are you the eldest
Of all the family?"

She looked rather timid and awe-struck,
And scarcely could speak at all;
But she answered honestly, "No, sir;
Papa is the oldest of all."

"What a child!" cried mamma and aunties,
While Bess sat still in affright;
But knew she had said something funny,
When the minister laughed outright.

If anything unkind you hear
About some one you know, my dear,
Do not, I pray you, it repeat
When you that some one chance to meet;
For such news has a leaden way
Of clouding o'er a sunny day.

But if you something pleasant hear
About some one you know, my dear,
Make haste—to make great haste 'twere well—
To her or him the same to tell;
For such news has a golden way
Of lighting up a cloudy day.

DICK WARNER'S WAY.

BY LAURA J. RITTENHOUSE.

(Concluded.)

"I called, madam, to see—to see—if I could get you to make me some—some—well, a shirt," said the gentleman who had knocked and who proved to be our friend, Dick Warner.

There was an air of embarrassment about him, quite unusual for so blunt a man, for, to tell the truth, he had not known what excuse to make for having called at all, until he happened to see the modest card on the door announcing the fact that plain sewing was solicited.

"Certainly, sir. I'll be glad to make you one or a dozen," the lady said, smiling faintly, glad that a prospect of more work was before her.

The little boy had tried to stop crying when the stranger entered, but another sight of the spoiled melon was too much for him and his tears began to flow again.

"There, dear, never mind; sometime maybe mother can buy another one," his mamma said, and then, half ashamed of the child's tears, she explained their cause to Mr. Warner.

"Don't cry, little man; I saw a lot of nice melons come in on a train a little while ago, and you shall have one as soon as I can send it up to you," said Mr. Warner, who had happened to be passing just as the negro sold the melon.

He had felt indignant enough as he saw the little woman carry the melon into the house, knowing it to be one of Mr. Downing's spoiled ones, but should have gone on his way had he not caught a glimpse of the sick child on the cot, and guessed the cruel disappointment awaiting him.

He paused then, undecided what to do, thus unintentionally overhearing the conversation between the child and its mother, and with his usual warm-hearted impulsiveness had determined to make amends for his friend's dishonesty.

Fortunately the sign on the door assisted him on his kindly errand, and so his measure was taken for half a dozen shirts which he did not need at all, the price was agreed upon and Dick hurried away to send the melon to the sick boy, leaving hope and gladness behind him.

Scarcely had he gone before the same old gentleman who had rested beneath his awning that morning, came walking slowly along the street, his steps heavy and uncertain.

"I was an old fool not to drive away out here, instead of walking this hot day. I'll have to get into the shade, or tumble over on the sidewalk. It's good enough for me for trying to do everything myself, instead of employing a young man to do it for me," he said to himself, as he came opposite the widow's cottage. "It looks clean in here, I guess I'll ask if I can't sit down a minute till I cool off a little."

Forthwith he asked and obtained permission to enter the room where the sick boy was lying, and where the spoiled melon on the table reminded him of the conversation he had overheard that morning.

And it was not many minutes before the child had confided in the kind old gentleman who always won the hearts of the little ones, the story of his bitter disappointment, and of the good gentleman who was going to send him "a really, truly delicious melon."

"What's the fellow's name, madam?" the old man asked abruptly, turning to the seamstress.

She glanced at a card on her sewing machine before she answered.

"Richard Warner, family groceries, 85 Clark street."

"I thought so—it's just like him; he hasn't a grain of business sense, and he'll die in the poor-house, just as that fellow, Downing, said he would, the rascal!" blurted out the old gentleman excitedly, but whether he meant that her new friend, or the Downing mentioned was the rascal, the little woman had no means of knowing.

And all the way back to the city the old gentleman kept saying under his breath, "So that's Dick's way, is it—not only honest himself, but trying to atone for his friend's dishonesty? Well, well, I never knew such a fellow, such a very queer fellow, without one bit of practical sense or business knack, as such things are reckoned now-a-days."

A week later Alfred Downing went over for another chat with his friend.

He found the store closed, and Dick taking an account of stock.

"What under the sun are you doing, Dick? Has the sheriff closed you out already?" he asked in astonishment.

Dick laughed. "Well, not exactly; I've sold out, and am going to change my business. It's all the oddest thing you ever heard of. You remember the old gentleman who waited for the cars the last time you were over? Well, he turns out to be an immensely wealthy real estate dealer, and he wants a young man to look after his business, and, for some mysterious reason has taken a fancy to me. He has offered me a salary so large that it fairly dazed me, and found a purchaser for my grocery, to whom I have sold out at a fair profit."

"I never heard of such a thing before, outside of a story-book! Why, you've struck it rich for once, old fellow, haven't you? Whatever possessed the old gentleman to do it, I wonder? If he knew what a crank you are, he'd never have employed you, that's certain," Downing said decidedly.

"No, that's the queer part of it; he says he wants me because he can trust me, though I don't know what he knows about me, I'm sure. He is very eccentric, evidently, for he kept saying, 'You're a queer fellow, a very queer fellow, indeed, but then that is only Dick Warner's way.'"

ALPHABETICAL STAGES OF ALCOHOLISM.

[Dr. Cyrus Edson contributes a paper to the September number of the North American Review on the question, "Is Drunkenness Curable?" and ends the article by reciting an alphabetical rhyme, describing all the stages of alcoholism from the first nip to a drunkard's grave, which he learned from a patient, a young man of great ability and fine moral perceptions, who was an incurable inebriate. The doctor says that the young man's eyes would stream with tears as he recited the following verses, describing his own case and career. It is the most truthful and graphic picture of the kind that has been printed.]

A stands for Alcohol; deathlike its grip;
B for Beginner, who takes just a sip;
C for Companion who urges him on;
D for the Demon of drink that was born;
E for Endeavor he makes to resist.
F stands for Friends who so loudly insist;
G for the Guilt that he afterwards feels;
H for the Horrors that hang at his heels;
I his Intention to drink not at all.
J stands for Jeering that follows his fall;
K for his Knowledge that he is a slave.
L stands for the Liquor his appetites crave;
M for convivial Meetings so gay.
N stands for No that he tries hard to say;
O for the Orgies that then come to pass.
P stands for Pride that he drowns in his glass;
Q for the Quarrels that nightly abound.
R stands for Ruin that hovers around.
S stands for Sights which his vision bedims.
T stands for Trembling that seizes his limbs;
U for his Usefulness sunk in the slums.
V stands for Vagrant he quickly becomes;
W for Waning of life that's soon done;
X for the eXit regretted by none.
Youth of this nation, such weakness is crime;
Zealously turn from the tempter in time.

Dear Boys and Girls:—All of you, I rejoice to think, are temperance boys and girls, but I am happier still when I read a letter from those who say, "I am a member of the Loyal Temperance Legion," or of a Band of Hope. Then I know that you are learning to work, shoulder to shoulder, to do away with what is the greatest evil in the world, because it is connected with and includes all other evils—the drink traffic.

Below are a number of brief bits from recent letters of our L. T. L. members. I wish space would permit more of them in this number but we will have others later.

Yours for the Loyal Temperance Legion,

Aunt Jane

OUR PROMOTED EDITOR.

For seven years two names have been almost synonymous to white-ribboners. These are Mary Allen West and THE UNION SIGNAL.

Although not the first nor only editor, Miss West has long been rightly recognized as the "strong tower" of the National organ. So identical were her own and the paper's interests that no wonder its best friends feared a decline in standard when she left it even for a brief period. They had learned to know her vigorous, terse style on the editorial pages and to depend upon her pointed argument and logical conclusions to thwart the enemy's subtle reasoning. Miss West's fearless but supportable utterance gave the paper at once a reputation for courage and for accuracy. A cautious policy is always a safe policy, but it is not often an aggressive one. Miss West failed not to advocate in cogent language the more progressive principles of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. She was loyal to the core, and no inducement could have prevented her from speaking when silence was cowardly or from keeping silent when speaking was premature. She always kept before her the fact that THE UNION SIGNAL was the mouthpiece of the W. C. T. U. and she its instrument only.

No other name has ever stood so long on the editorial staff of this paper, and none could be more widely missed. The first time it appeared was August 6, 1885, and the last time is January 19, 1893, seven years and five months. We have allowed it to remain this long, out of loving respect to her long years of faithful service, and because it seemed appropriate that it should retain its official position until the memorial number was issued, that all new readers might know Miss West's relation to the paper. Very tenderly and regretfully will it be removed after this number, and only the assurance of our comrade's glorious promotion reconciles us to the mysterious Providence.

It is not our intention to dwell in this article on the many virtues of our promoted editor and her wonderful work in Japan. That is all told most graphically and eloquently in the memorial supplement which accompanies every copy of next week's UNION SIGNAL. We bespeak for this memorial number a wide circulation and a sympathetic audience, the world around. Thousands of copies will go to Japan, and be treasured as sacred household relics are.

This common bereavement has bound the United States and Japan as they have never been bound before. It is not only the temperance workers and the missionaries who have been mindful of Miss West's labors and sudden taking off in the Sunrise Land. Expressions of sympathy have been universal, and have come from the highest social and official quarters. The issue of a special passport to Sho Nemoto by the governor of the Kanazawa prefecture, in order that he might accompany the remains to Tokio was phenomenal. The presentation of a Red Cross medal by the Empress was without a parallel. The kindness of the United States Legation, with Minister Coombs at its head, is more than we can ever repay.

Verily, it need never be said that Mary Allen West died in a land of strangers. She died in a land of friends, and for this the American white ribbon army can never be too profoundly grateful.

SOWING AND REAPING.

The police and the newspapers inform us that the saloons of Chicago are hatching places for the organized bands of thieves, robbers, pickpockets and thugs which are now terrorizing its citizens, and which, under existing conditions, may be expected to terrorize with increasing power. They tell us that the saloons are the dens of desperadoes and outlaws, and, aided by a certain class of "criminal" lawyers, are responsible for the farces daily enacted in our "courts of justice."

Now if the municipal government knows—absolutely knows without a peradventure—what the influence is which produces such lawlessness as daily jeopardizes the lives and property of citizens, why, in the name of all that is right and sensible, does it not remove that influence? There can be but one opinion as to its duty in the matter. Every one, from the mayor down to the masked highwayman himself, must confess that the only efficient way to check this organized crime is to destroy its breeding places. We know that the best way to check the growth of any organism is to render its surroundings as antagonistic as possible to its development. We guard against the ravages of cholera microbes by making conditions, so far as we know how, disadvantageous to that particular form of life, and in seasons of epidemic enforce stringent measures to stay the progress of the disease.

If our physicians knew of a remedy which, if it did not always cure, yet rendered the cholera less dangerous and terrible to the people, what would we think if they refused to apply that remedy? What would we think if the doctors and the undertakers combined to nourish and foster a deadly disease because it put money into their pockets?

Recognizing the saloon as the aider and abettor of every description of vice and crime, why does the city not only protect it, but enter into partnership with it? Why do the police support it by patronage and vote? Why do the newspapers in one breath stigmatize it as the "breeder of crooks and thugs" and in the next pronounce it a "necessity"?

We hear dark suggestions of "vigilante committees." Vigilante committees may aid in checking lawlessness when there is no other remedy at hand and when they are sure of hanging the true offender. Now we venture to say that ninety per cent of those who would favor lynch law in Chicago are themselves responsible for the saloon system. They help make the criminals; why should they seek to destroy their own handiwork?

How many of the victims of recent burglaries have ever lifted a finger against the saloon? As we sow, so we reap. Down among the whisky dens of Clark, State or West Madison streest these robberies were doubtless originated. There the ex-convict and his confreres, inspired by potations of the devil's own concocting, hatch their daring schemes; there they plot and plan and daily grow more reckless as they realize the "pull" they have on the dispensers of law through their friends and backers, the saloon-keepers.

We know of heads of families, protectors of homes, who complacently walk into the polling places on election day and by their votes say, "Let there be saloons." They tell us we must have these places where the midnight marauder organizes his forces and lays his plans for chloroforming us in our beds and appropriating our money and valuables.

These voters believe in indirect taxation. They would have the licensed saloon pay the city's bills, while they replenish the saloon-keeper's coffers at the point of the pistol. They hand over their boys and girls to the liquor power, and send them to jails, reformatories and institutes, rather than remove the saloon. This they fondly imagine is wise political economy.

While to organized crime the saloon is related as cause to effect, to the pigheadedness of voters it is related as effect to cause. The saloon-keeper, as such, is a law-abiding person. His calling, so far as the civil law is concerned, is a legitimate one. That his moral nature is not sufficiently developed to recognize the iniquity of his business is to be deplored. But this lack of development enlists our sympathy and aid, not our indignation.

Clearly the duty of those men who lay claim to a higher moral standard, to a clearer judgment, to a more righteous conception of the golden rule, is to remedy this defect of character, to make it possible, as far as in them lies, for the minds darkened by sin and ignorance to come into the light. What shall we say, then, of the professed Christian, who, year after year, aids in perpetuating a system, which not only stunts the moral growth of his neighbor, but most unmistakably saps whatever moral vitality may be latent in his nature, until the chances are that he will altogether perish.

The police complain that no sooner do they get a crook or a pickpocket to the station than some saloon-keeper comes along and bails him out. Now this is laudable in the extreme, and every lover of consistency will commend him for it. The saloon-keeper develops the crook, and it is eminently right and proper that he should stand by him. The crook puts money into the pockets of the saloon-keeper, and it would be most unbusiness-like to allow him to be shut up in jail if he could prevent it. Like all other merchants, the whisky seller resorts to those methods which he believes to be the best for retaining old customers and gaining new ones.

Behold the consistency of the municipality of Chicago—that brightest city in brightest America—that city toward which the eyes of all nations are now turned! For a money consideration it provides some seven thousand hot-beds for the nourishment of vice and crime, and then when harvest time comes, it puts on a special police force and attempts to destroy the fruits of that which it so assiduously cultivated. It encourages and protects the drunkard and thief industry, and then denounces the product of that industry as a disgrace to civilization! Protection for the manufacturer, confiscation for the goods manufactured! Where among all the vagaries of political science—and it has had many—can there be found such a paradox as is the policy of this government, national and municipal, toward the liquor traffic?

We do not believe that the Christian people of Chicago, or of any other city, wilfully sin by their support of this policy. We believe that as a general thing they do not look deep enough for the causes of the present rampant condition of crime. Ruskin says that "very few people really mean to do wrong—in a deep sense, none—they only don't know what they are about."

If this be true, then our friends of "good intentions" but bad judgment must be made to know what they are about. The temperance agitators must keep on ringing the changes on prohibition lines with prohibition bugles, until their importunity is rewarded, and the legal protection of every citizen from the saloon is secured.

A GOSPEL CURE FOR INEBRIETY.

There are experiences which impress the realities of the unseen, the powers of the realm of faith, with peculiar force. When such a day gems the lifeway, we say, "I have lived;" the outlook of the days before us becomes an uplook; and for a time, at least, our highways and byways are mounts of transfiguration.

Such an experience can scarcely fail to be the portion of one who spends a week at Rest Island, the home which John G. Woolley has fitted up for the gospel cure of inebriates. Leaving Chicago by the C. M. & St. P. one of three competing lines, on the 10:30 p. m. train—in the middle of the most luxurious railway appointments—the novitiate looks out the next morning with a surprised sense of uplands, great levels that stretch out measurelessly at an altitude far above the railroad bed, which threads along beside the great Mississippi for many an hour. "What is the name of that range of hills which skirts the river?" "Them's not hills," said the brakeman; "that's the country; it's the railroad, and the river, that runs low;" and the tourist is as oddly astonished as when he first saw the Mississippi moving majestically twenty feet above his head in Louisiana.

From Lake City a two miles drive, by-private conveyance, completes the journey to Rest Island. Won by the vision of the Christ from the depths of a drunkard's woes, John G. Woolley determined that other life-wrecked brothers should have a chance, and in 1890 purchased this island in Lake Pepin. Here are 389 acres of good land, well-wooded, about ninety now in cultivation, three being in small fruits. A good farm-house, with a Swede farmer and his picturesque Gretchen and baby, occupy this tilled area.

On the west side of the island, a few rods from the lake's brink, stands the home, Somerset House, a beautiful, broad-balconied, two-and-a-half-story dwelling. This house was built by Miss Etta Thompson, of Minneapolis, a gifted and zealous friend, who aided Mr. Woolley auspiciously in his first efforts and from whom he has since purchased the building. It is admirably heated by steam, and guarded by storm windows, is complete in comfortable and tasteful furnishings, with hot and cold water conveniences. Each man has a room alone, cozy, carpeted and cheerful. The main entrance is into a large, delightfully home-like reception-room, lined on two sides with Mr. Woolley's private library—for this is his home, too—and the temperance library of John B. Gough, donated by his heirs. This is the gathering place of the whole household, and it would be difficult to find a more alluring picture than groups itself every evening about the great library table under the lamps.

A "tent" with a thousand chairs is the only other completed building, dedicated two years ago by Rev. Dr. Chas. F. Deems, and already twice occupied by the Annual Convocation of Christian Workers which assembles for a week in the middle of July. Willard Cottage is not yet ready for use, but is much needed for the accommodation of men who cannot now be received. Miss Etta Thompson and Mrs. E. A. Russell are collecting funds for its completion.

Mr. H. N. Timolat is in charge of Rest Island, Mr. Woolley being most of the time in the lecture field for the support of the home. Mr. Timolat was a successful real estate and insurance agent, but the moan of human need was a stronger drawing power than the American dollar; and so he and his charming wife are here, helping in the manifestation of the Son of man for these buffeted brethren, in whom other hope had died. The influences are of the most refined, spiritual and upbuilding character in which proper foods play a considerable part. The religion of the body will more and more be an imperative in gospel cures. As in His days on earth the power of the Holy Ghost may to-day work the instant cure of a diseased man, and the devil of drink be cast out; but less and less will those who learn of Christ dare to neglect the regeneration of the body in trying to save a degenerate soul. Here, surrounded by nature's gems of scenery, in healthful and natural investment, a man may tone up body and spirit to the wonderful and ever new song of redemption.

On the shore, just outside its sheltering door, every night, in starlight or storm, a lantern swings high. Across the gleaming waters it speeds its saving beam. Its glittering rays are life-lines for the brother whom the tumultuous waves of temptation threaten to wash out beyond human aid. "And so it came to pass that they all escaped safe to land," is the message of hope borne over the wild waste.

TWO NOTABLE BOOKS.

THE UNION SIGNAL published two serials during the latter half of 1892, which are destined to more than an ephemeral influence as epoch-making literature. These stories are "David Douglas and His Wife," by Mrs. O. W. Scott, and "Some Passages in the Life of Dr. Martha Scarborough," by Helen Campbell.

The former is the history of the conversion in his politics of an orthodox Republican Methodist preacher, just before a national election, at which he voted the Prohibition ticket, because of the shameless courting of the saloon vote by the church-going element of the party of his long and loyal trust.

After this "bolting of the party" his bishop transferred him to a backwoods charge, where his political disloyalty might not be so keenly felt as in the sensitive city church in which he had been a power, or until the ecclesiastical rulers were fully decided whether Christ shall reign over the preacher's politics or the wealthy ex-brewers and moneyed party-worshipers in the pews.

The plot is simple and natural, and incident has the homely, heart-moving realism of the family and the church; every fiber of one's spirit vibrates with indignation as on foot the minister's household and household goods "move on" to the railway station while the ex-brewer's carriage rolls by spattering them with mud.

But the tale thrills most deeply because it is a mirror of the unspoken martyrdom that is being endured in and from the church in countless communities of this nation, where individual members dare to live out the promulgated creeds of ecclesiastical parliaments. Many a man and many a woman is too proud before men and too humble before God to say, "I die daily"—nevertheless they die. The opposition of an enemy nerves for battle; but the cool neglect, the quiet ostracism in church circles is a mild form of fiery ordeal borne by thousands in America to-day, because they practically believe in God in government as in God at family prayers.

Mrs. Scott's story needs no adjectives; it is a home-thrust, and, like death, to be felt not described. An artist's touch lays bare the festering ulcers of the church, no less deadly because so common. It is the best of Mrs. Scott's good books and destined, like Uncle Tom's Cabin, to be a factor in human emancipation.

In these days of "cures" Helen Campbell has struck a popular chord, but has done it with an original and scientific touch. "Dr Martha," as those who have learned to love her will call the story, treats the temperance question from an untried side. It deals with the physical conditions of inebriety and starts out with the ultimatum that it is tissues which are howling for drink. The building up of degenerate tissue is a first necessity; at the same time the victim's prostrate will must be braced up by removal into an upbuilding environment, away from temptation. The testimony from the dissecting table is, that from one to two ounces of pure alcohol are sometimes removed from the brain of an habitual drinker. Brain tissue is altered, "broken down" by this presence of alcohol; degeneration of brain tissue means degradation of will, as is more or less evident in every case of wasting illness. A depraved will must ultimate in moral degradation. On this principle Mrs. Campbell places her inebriates in a rural atmosphere and, under skilled medical care, subjects them to the healing influences of fresh air and sun and tissue-building, non-stimulating foods. By healthful substitution, alcohol and narcotics are eliminated from the system; just as diseased lung-tissue may be restored, degenerate mucous membrane and brain tissue are brought to a normal state and the man is restored to himself.

The miracle of common sense and of harmonious coöperation with the laws of our being "works"—for our faith. "The law of the Lord is perfecting, converting the soul," is as true in application to body as to spirit, notwithstanding the trodden-down plight, the "poor-dog" subserviency to which mediæval religion, still surviving, doomed the physical.

The day will come when the ethics of the body will be recognized as pertaining to a "state of grace," and "Dr. Martha" vividly illustrates the inter-dependence of the wicked body and the wicked soul, of one's graceless nerves and one's graceless temper, of one's despairing stomach and one's despairing will.

In a private letter Lady Henry Somerset says: "Helen Campbell's story is worthy of her fame. She is a genius in the way of charity, and the drink is at the bottom of the need. So she has written this unique and charming story to illustrate the way out for the victims of alcohol. I hope this story will have the widest circulation possible."

"David Douglas and His Wife" will be published in book form by the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, Chicago, and "Some Passages in the Practice of Dr. Martha Scarborough," by Roberts Bros., of New York.

THE Australasian W. C. T. U. has issued a little manual of the franchise department, Mrs. C. P. Wallace, of Melbourne, superintendent. Valuable suggestions are given as to the best method of studying this great subject; these are so excellent that we give them to our readers:

However much the idea of giving full political rights to woman may have been ridiculed and pushed aside in the past, the question has come now to be recognized as one of grave and serious import that can no longer be ignored. In the daily press, from the pulpit, on the street, in social gatherings and in legislative halls, it is being discussed. Whether we favor the movement or oppose it, we should know the reasons therefor, and what the conditions and circumstances that have brought it forward so prominently in this and other countries.

The members of the W. C. T. U., after years of prayerful effort, have learned that moral suasion, alone, will never put down the drink traffic; that woman cannot protect herself, her children, nor her property while she is not regarded as a person, but ranked, in the law, with idiots and lunatics. Hence the franchise department is now acknowledged the most important branch of W. C. T. U. work. As well throw the pinioned sailor overboard to rescue the drowning man, or march the soldier into battle without armor or musket and expect success, as to look for a reign of truth and righteousness under laws which make the birthmark of sex a brand of degradation. Equally amenable to the law with man, fully bound to the extreme of its exactions, restrictions and penalties, no just reason can be adduced why women should be disfranchised. Eminent thinkers and prominent leaders advocate her enfranchisement, recognizing the need, in the near future, for the help of women, "the great reserve forces of Providence," in solving the social and industrial problems of the age. That this question may be understood, it must be carefully studied. Its importance demands as much. The work will be principally educational, for which the following suggestions are made:

That each union appoint for superintendent of the franchise department some member who feels and realizes the weight and moment of the W. C. T. U. work, who shall communicate with the Colonial and the Colonial with the superintendent for Australasia. That each superintendent subscribe for the Alliance Record (Temperance and General Life Buildings, Swanston street, Melbourne.) At the meetings of the union have some word to say or passage to read bearing on the subject; lead the members to ask questions and enter into free discussion. In addition to leaflets have printed slips, which give the views of distinguished persons on woman suffrage. These are conveniently inserted in letters. Secure column or portion of column in your local paper for suffrage news. Place literature in club rooms, hotels, Y. M. C. A. and all reading rooms possible. Solicit clergymen to preach on woman's condition, past and present. Endeavor to have the subject discussed in debating societies and made the theme of essays and orations in colleges and seminaries. Memorialize conventions, secular and religious. Secure attention and consideration of the subject at political meetings. Circulate the enrollment papers, securing the signatures of all persons over twenty-one years of age who believe that women should vote on equal terms with men. Learn what are the electoral privileges of women and how many avail themselves of these privileges. Know the laws concerning assessment and registration of voters, the times, places and conditions therefor, the conduct of municipal affairs. Study carefully what is the legal status of married women, spinsters and widows and what the protection to person and property.

To this end, form societies for the study of law and politics—the science of government—as it well behooves those who are under the law to have a thorough knowledge of its conditions and provisions. The discussion of the following subjects will be interesting and instructive: Courts, Lawyers, the Beginning of a Lawsuit, Evidence, Both Sides of the Jury Question, Marriage, Divorce, Parent and Child, Teacher and Pupil, Employer and Employé, Public Corporations, Insurance, Land, Wills, Offences against Person and against Property, Rates, Public Institutions, Public Health, the Liquor Laws, etc. These and kindred subjects are worthy of study. Awaken interest in all questions of the day, state and local. Watch parliamentary proceedings, for all legislation bears directly or indirectly upon each member of the human family, regardless of sex, and upon every home. It is said that you may judge of any nation or age by the condition of the women. Frequent mention is made of woman's influence in an indirect and often evil way in important and far-reaching matters, through motives of vanity and selfishness. A right knowledge coupled with her quick intuitions would make her a safer exponent of the influence she wields, and, made equally responsible, her power would prove a safeguard. The effort of the W. C. T. U. should be to rouse women to the duties and responsibilities of citizenship.

It is an old and well-worn proverb that familiarity breeds contempt. Nothing could be more untrue. Does familiarity breed contempt in the husband toward his wife, in the wife toward her husband, in the child toward its mother? The truth is that familiarity is the crowning and fulfillment of the most tender and enduring affection. Where it is absent the home tie gives no true ring.

An earnest woman has recently given it as her belief "that the basis for ethics rests in the fact that the universe is an illustration of the right way," and the words are worthy our careful study: "Does not all the precious thought stored up in the Bible rest on a basis, and is not the entire universe, including man, that basis? We can go back in imagination to a time when the Bible was not, we can go back to a time when man was not, still we cannot doubt that the preparation for man, and all thought ever expressed through, and by man, was from eternity in process of development. What I am trying to say, in a very imperfect manner, is that the basis for ethics rests in the fact that the universe is an illustration of the right way."

A cup of water timely brought,
  An offered easy chair,
A turning of the window blind,
  That all may feel the air;
An early flower bestowed unasked,
  A light and cautious tread,
A voice to softest whispers hushed
  To spare an aching head—
Oh, things like these, though little things,
  The purest love disclose,
As fragrant atoms in the air
  Reveal the hidden rose. —Selected.

Some time ago there appeared in a daily paper the story of the death of six men in a very strange way. They had purchased a quarter barrel of beer, drank freely, dying soon after with every evidence of poisoning. Upon investigation a dead copperhead snake was discovered in the keg. How it came there remained a mystery. No one reading the sad incident can fail to be impressed with the vivid object lesson, since in every keg of intoxicants lurks a serpent more deadly than the copperhead, and the venom is potent to destroy bodies and souls. Beware of the "serpents of the still!"

A prominent clergyman in London says that in his congregation is a socialist who, for years, was one of a secret society appointed for the purpose of assassinating the Prince of Wales. The only reason that they did not carry out their plan was that no opportunity occurred, although they dogged his steps with a persistency worthy of a better cause. One Sunday afternoon this ringleader of the gang came to church and heard the clergyman, the singing, the prayers, and somehow they formed the turning point in his life. He became a devoted Christian, and is now one of the most exemplary workers in the church guild to which he then became attached. Perhaps the change in his outlook could not be better expressed than in the testimony that he often gives in the social meetings of the church, after the following fashion: "My brothers, once my creed was this, 'Down with everything that is up,' but it has changed, and now I say, 'Up with everything that is down.' One means destruction, the other building."

On Duty is glad to know that Miss Jeanette L. Olmstead, or as we ought now to call her, Rev. Jeanette, has been ordained and settled as the Congregational pastor in Gustavus, Ohio. Miss Olmstead was superintendent of the social purity work in the Buckeye state, and made an excellent impression in her years of faithful labor. The Rev. Anna Shaw came from a distance to preach the sermon, and a Congregational pastor present remarked that if we sent our young minister up to the National Council of the Congregational church she would be received. This will, we believe, be the case in all Protestant churches within the next quarter of a century, perhaps much earlier. An eye-witness describes the ordination in these touching words: "The exercises which followed, of a more personal character, hushed the crowded audience with an almost painful tension. And as the young pastor, simply dressed in pure white, quiet and self-possessed, knelt for the laying on of hands, and as she received from her own brother the charge, solemnly tender and touching, and the right hand of fellowship from an aged minister, one of her own parishioners, more than one or two pair of eyes were dimmed, and they were not all women's tears, either."

ON DUTY.

BEAUTY OF SIMPLICITY.

BY HESTER M. POOLE.

All the world knows that the greatest and sweetest characters are the simplest.

Then why this striving after luxury, this love of show, this complexity of living? Is it because we expect to impose upon others, and hope to be regarded for what we seem to be, not what we are?

Generally this is not the case. The mistake of a complex, showy, luxurious habit of life comes rather from a false conception of beauty than from anything else. The gaudy, the glittering, the gilded appeals to an uncultivated taste, to a childish love of display, to a rawness of development. "There is no more common error among superficial people," said the lamented George William Curtis, "than that of confounding luxury with civilization."

He, himself, was a notable example of the beauty of simplicity. The master of an exquisite literary style, which was always used in the interest of the higher life, a gentleman through and through, cultured in every department of his nature, honored, trusted, beloved by high and low, Mr. Curtis lived a simple, beautiful, pastoral life, in a plain cottage in no way distinguished from his less fortunate neighbors.

It was not because this inimitable teacher of goodness and refinement loved loneliness less but more, that he so lived. To him the beauty of the Spirit, of the inner life, as well as the beauty of moderation and the beauties of nature, served to make any meretricious display absurd and unpleasing. Poverty of mind and of spirit may wish to clothe itself in gew-gaws. Royal natures seek only the tasteful and the appropriate.

The poet, Whittier, too, that strong, sound nature, spicy and firm of texture and satisfying as the winter russets clinging to the boughs of his picturesque New England farm—Whittier possessed that inner wealth which expresses itself in quaint and simple manliness. In those lines written upon the death of his old friend, Lydia Maria Child, who dwelt upon the acme of simplicity, he spoke as follows:

"Did we not witness in the life of thee
Immortal prophecy?
And feel, when with thee in thy daily path,
The power that goodness hath?
. . . . . .
"For, loving beauty, thou could'st pass it by
And for the poor, deny
Thyself, and see thy fresh, sweet flower of fame
Wither in blight and shame?"

It is not necessary now "to wither in blight and shame." That sentence refers to Mrs. Child's fervid devotion to the slave. To help the anti-slavery cause she reduced her expenses of livelihood to the lowest sum and wore cotton frocks even into wintry weather. Such acts are only possible when the martyr spirit awakens in the breast of an enthusiast. It is not of such we write. It is of the best way to live among common people in a common work-a-day world, and yet to live an aspiring life, a life of sympathy with the progress of the age. In what manner shall we establish the home and how carry it on so as to nourish the highest character and help others both by example and by practical aid?

We may rest assured, first of all, that whatever is used for display alone is wasted. Intrinsic value adorns itself. "Tell me what you like," says Ruskin, "and I will tell you what you are."

In an adjoining town resides a worthy family who possess an abundance of this world's goods. The house-mother is kind, generous and helpful to all with whom she comes in contact. So is the father.

Yet the house is loud, showy, vulgar, with no incitement to rest within its walls. In the guest chamber the visitor tries vainly to sleep beneath a canopy of staring red brocade. The carpet is noisy with brilliant dyes which are repeated from the walls and the hangings. The daughters wear heavy jewelry, silks and velvet in the streets and when traveling. The table groans beneath rich food served in dishes of massive silver. There is no reserve, no modesty, no withholding of excessive ornamentation. In fact, the want of true culture, of a delicate taste, destroys the beauty of what should be used rarely, in suggestions and in glimpses.

Beauty is a coy mistress. She reveals herself only to the genuine searcher. From lavish extravagance she flees. A single rose in a finely shaped vase, outlined against a self-colored wall, may give more rapture than a tumbled mass of color thrust against a gorgeous background. The eye needs rest. It must have few objects at a time, but these must be as perfect as possible.

As in decorations so in dress and in all the habits of life. So have said the wise and good of all ages, and they have spoken from mankind's deepest experiences.

Says Seneca, "Happy is that man that eats only for hunger and drinks only for thirst; that provides for use and necessity, not for ostentation and pomp!" "The music of the spheres," said Pythagoras, "can be heard by abstaining from the food of animals, by bodily purity and by meditation." Another wrote: "It is not splendor that we need or that one should covet. It is homes full of sweetness and simple beauty."

Let us listen to our own Emerson, the greatest philosopher of them all, when he says, "If thou fill thy brain with Boston and New York, with fashion and covetousness, and wilt stimulate thy jaded senses with wine and French coffee, thou shalt find no radiance of wisdom in the lonely waste of the pine woods. . . . He who knows the most, who knows what sweets and virtues are in the ground, the waters, the plants, the heavens, is the rich and royal man. . . Art and luxury have early learned that they must work as enchantment and sequel to this original beauty."

Says Channing: "Life is a journey, and he who has least of a load to carry travels the fastest and the most happily."

That artificiality which is the reverse of simplicity is the certain presage of the downfall of a nation. Mothers, who clothe your little ones in diamonds and velvets, do you realize that you defraud them of that sweet innocence which is the charm of childhood?

As the excessive use of condiments destroys the taste for natural food, so does luxury destroy the sense of the beautiful in simple things. Not long ago, at a child's party, I saw a little one, six years of age, clad in finery of white satin, lace and swan's-down, a demure, pinched copy of her elaborately dressed mother. She was like an artificial rose, stiff and scentless, and I wondered what after life could offer to the premature little manikin whose self-consciousness fed upon the admiration of her companions. What is before that child, and such as she, except that worship of material things, that deadening of the spiritual faculties, that worldliness which is death to all that is generous and ennobling in the life of the soul?

While simplicity dwells at the root of all true beauty, it is also true that to one with a due sense of responsibility, it is a crime to spend in useless show that which might help our fellow beings.

Money is a trust placed in the hands of fortunate women for use, not for selfishness. Certainly is this the case where one has not earned the money she spends.

The simple, sane, genuine life, the life which diffuses an influence of gentle sweetness and helpfulness, is the life of beauty and of goodness.

On the contrary there is moral ugliness and deformity in that nature which strains every nerve in order to make a show and saves nothing in order to help others. Such know nothing of the joy of self-sacrifice. There may be outward beauty, it is only "skin deep." In old age or in reverses and trials, there are no "treasures laid up in heaven," no holy happiness in forgetting self while thinking and working for the good of others. That proves to be dross which was looked upon as gold.

A PERSONAL MESSAGE FROM THE WELL-KNOWN REPORTER.

My last message to THE UNION SIGNAL was sent many months ago, from within hospital walls, where, amid hopes and fears I kept vigils over my dear, patient sufferer, whose feet were slowly but surely approaching that "city that hath foundations." I will not write you of those sad experiences, those weeks and months of heartaches, as the consciousness came that the Father was calling, "Come up higher."

With a strong desire to do more for loved ones and the world, my dear husband prayed, "Lord, call me not, but let me longer work;" but when it seemed to him that he knew the Master's will, his petition was, "Lord, open Thou the pearly gates, and let me go to-day."

"Let me go! I feel that it is ending,
This long weariness, and mortal strife;
Earthly gloom and heavenly glory blending,
Death is being swallowed up of life.
Let me go, O clinging hands that hold me so."

And so he, whose presence brought always joy and gladness to the homelife, went out from us just as the day was breaking—another soldier was "promoted" from W. C. T. U. ranks, and the white rose pin holds the little knot of ribbon white that rests upon his breast. You will not wonder that I, who walked with him so long, close to the "border land," have desired to linger in the radiance that swept backward upon us.

"For when my guide went up,
He left the pearly gates ajar."

Thanksgiving and Christmas and New Year's days have come and gone, and I have thanked God for the blessed memories that are mine, while I have tried to say: "Not my will but Thine be done;" but this stanza has come to me again and again:

"An easy thing, O Power Divine,
To thank Thee for these gifts of Thine—
For summer's heat and winter's snow,
For hearts that kindle, thoughts that glow;
But when shall I attain to this—
To thank Thee for the things I miss?"

Only great faith can comprehend God's love in His withholdings, and we of the Illinois W. C. T. U. sisterhood may well ponder along these lines of thought, as the body of our dear Mary Allen West is nearing her native land—she who was so much to the W. C. T. U. work and every good work. Mary Allen West—our very own!

"Oh, when can we attain to this—
To thank Him for the things we miss?"

Possibly the great sense of loss may help us to realize the magnitude of His gifts, and hence increase our thanksgiving. Miss West was ever an honored guest in our home, and to-day I recall a scene, when overworked and on the point of breaking down physically, she came to us in her perplexity, distressed because unable to reach the place where she was advertised to speak that evening, because of failure of connection in railroad trains. My husband, by means of telephone, explained her unavoidable absence, and we assured her that "probably the Lord had providentially interfered to prevent her from killing herself by overwork." She was then, as at the last, trying to respond to all the calls upon her.

And just in this connection I note the public work of our state president, dear Mrs. Rounds, the summary of which is—attendance at thirty-six conventions, addresses in Illinois, one hundred and fifty, and thirty more in Indiana, Michigan, Massachusetts, Missouri and South Dakota, the past year. No one will marvel that her face is now turned toward the health resort at Clifton Springs.

The Illinois Woman's Christian Temperance Union has kept steadily on its way, although the pen of the state reporter has been laid aside for a time. The new annual report contains two hundred and eighty-one pages. With grateful heart I turn its leaves and say: "What hath God wrought?" From its Genesis, to its last "index" page, it is all a veritable "Book of Revelations." Our president's annual address is as breezy as if wafted from the mountain top of faith and a great conviction.

It seems strange to see any name but that of our own Helen L. Hood attached to the corresponding secretary's report, but it gives a bird's-eye view of the great Illinois harvest field, filled with busy gleaners, as of old.

The Treasurer's report is a model and deserves careful study.

A delightful view meets the eye twice every month from the Watch-Tower heights, where its able editor and publisher, Mrs. A. E. Sanford of Bloomington, stands sponsor, and answers back to our call—"Watchman, what of the night?" with the response,—"The morning cometh." Those who read our bright, helpful state paper, brimming over with good things, I am sure have a pity in their hearts for those of our number who do not even know what they have missed in missing it.

But let me barely hint at some of the good things which the new state report reveals, besides those already referred to.

Twenty district presidents had five minutes time allotted them at the state convention in which to report their districts, while the twenty-six superintendents of departments were generously granted ten minutes! "No skimmed milk" would be served on that "bill of fare," but the pure cream, and Jersey cream at that. I wish this announcement to whet the appetites of W. C. T. U. women for these appetizing morsels, annually dished up and called á la "state reports." I will here whisper an "open secret," to you, dear old UNION SIGNAL—it is the cream of our workers that study state reports the most, and study, too, to show themselves "approved unto God"—workmen that need not be ashamed.

But pardon this digression while I let you look at a few notes from the evangelistic department, that of course stands in the forefront of all work, remembering while we scan the record that the department of reporting has never yet been made a success in Illinois W. C. T. U. circles, but here are a few figures:

Gospel meetings	1,896
Cottage prayer-meetings	232
Gospel Institutes	9
Personal requests for prayer	270
Pages of evangelistic literature	89,810
Testaments and Bibles distributed	200
Families to whom aid has been given	58
Number of sick and destitute prayed with	232

One answer to question sent out by the superintendent is, "Found thirty children in a small town that were not in Sabbath school." Another writes: "Not one-fifth attend Sunday-schools with any regularity," in a town of 800 inhabitants. And here is good cheer in the message from another: "Nearly all the children are in Sunday-school through the efforts of the W. C. T. U." Another says: "Mothers' meetings have proved a blessed ministry." The superintendent in the sixteenth district reported 237 conversions in her meetings; a number of the converts were drinking men, and one a saloon-keeper. It is useless to attempt to mention the work in Chicago, where Bethesda, Hope and Anchorage Missions are steady light-houses that have helped to anchor many a stranded wreck of humanity to Christ, the living anchor.

It seems almost invidious to single out any department or district. The distribution of temperance literature throughout the state looks as if the "knee-deep" standard has been the goal to be reached.

Mrs. Rankin, superintendent of narcotic work, has troubled many a camp in Israel as well as various Gentile tribes. Miss Gaston, of the Loyal Temperance Legion, has been a valued helper for this department also, being in such close contact with the children.

The Y work has flourished, especially in the fifteenth district, which has twenty-seven Y. W. C. T. U's, with four hundred and fifty-eight members, more than twice as many as any other district.

The prison and jail department has been the burden on dear Mrs. Mason's heart, who has cared so earnestly for it for so long time. If she could lift the curtain during this week of prayer, so that easy-going license voting "professors" could see all the crime and misery resulting from the drink traffic in Illinois, possibly sleeping consciences might be aroused.

Police matron work is growing in appreciation. Twenty-four regular matrons and four assistants in Chicago wear a star when on duty and are paid by the city. The number of arrests of women in Chicago for the year 1892 was 12,046.

Gospel services have been held in jails and much literature has been distributed in them. Rockford has started a library of one hundred and fifty volumes in the jail. The fifth district is emphasizing the importance of urging separation of young offenders from hardened criminals. Greenville, Bond county, reports thirty-two meetings in the jail, most of them having taken the form of Sunday-schools at the prisoners' request. Much has been done all over the state.

The franchise topic interests many and Illinois women voted for the first time last year for the election of school officers, and be it recorded, they seem just as sweet, gentle and home-loving as before. Mrs. Orr, superintendent of this department, has been very helpful. Mrs. S. B. Wilkins' "finger-board" points unerringly to the Temperance Hospital and Mrs. Carse's angle of vision comes to a focus when it embraces the great Temple-Beautiful, where our new vice-president. Mrs. Daisy H. Carlock, has charge of the daily gospel meetings in Willard Hall. Mrs. Kepley and Mrs. Metzgar (like enforced laws) have been a terror to some evil-doers.

And thus I might enumerate the names of officers and those in the rank and file who have reached such enthusiasm in their work that they regard their special department as being the all-important one. I love to sing the praises of them that do well, and tell how they did it, not to glorify the individual, but as stimulating and encouraging, as well as helpful to others.

This letter has been of necessity very general; the field is so large and the gleaning time so extended. Details might have narrowed the area compassed to a single union, and found the space allotted to the Illinois letter all filled.

The record of the old year is sealed up. Two hundred and twenty white-ribboners were "promoted" from the Illinois ranks last year. Many hearts may be tempted to strike the minor chords on the key-board too often; but we do well to remember that life, at best, is short, and "the King's business requireth haste."

ELEVEN COUNTY CONVENTIONS.

The fifteenth annual convention of Oneida county was held in Association Hall at Rome, and was presided over by the able county president, Mrs. Foster (Faye Huntington). Mrs. Alden (Pansy) was present, and added to the inspiration of the occasion. During the session she read a charming original story, and we who have loved her for years through her writings can readily believe that it was a rare treat. The president's annual address was full of good practical thoughts, beautifully expressed.

In the evening the hall was crowded to hear Mrs. Ella A. Boole, our state vice-president, who gave a fine address on "Temperance and Labor." Reports were given by the superintendents, and an excellent paper read by Mrs. Bingham, of Rome, on "The Sin of Using Intoxicants." Mrs. Graves, of Booneville, gave a short address on "The Effect of the Liquor Traffic upon Missions." A pleasant feature was the redeeming of pledges for "dollars and rhymes," by which thirty-nine dollars were added to the treasury and thirty-nine rhymes to literature.

Washington county W. C. T. U. met at Fort Ann, and a good meeting was reported. Forty-seven delegates were present. The membership of the county is 450, with fifty-one honoraries. Four Loyal Temperance Legions, with a membership of 200, are marching on. Much to the regret of white-ribboners, their faithful county president, Mrs. M. W. Tefft, was compelled through ill health to resign. Mrs. Hannah R. T. Warren, of Granville, was elected to fill her place.

Dutchess county held her forty-fifth quarterly convention at Rhinebeck, Mrs. Homer A. Nelson, county president, in the chair. Reports and encouraging words concerning the work filled up the time to good advantage. Mrs. Farrington, of Poughkeepsie, read a paper on "Health," which was enjoyed by all present.

In the evening Rev. W. Bancroft Hill, of Poughkeepsie, delivered a scholarly address on "Woman in the Temperance Work." Dr. Barnum, of Poughkeepsie, addressed the Loyal Temperance Legion, enforcing his remarks with object lessons. A pleasing episode occurred upon the convention learning that it was the birthday of the corresponding secretary. A purse was speedily made up and presented to her, and, in a bright little speech, she was told to "buy herself a stylographic pen, and long wield it in the interests of the W. C. T. U." The convention as a whole was most helpful and instructive, as well as entertaining.

Orange county reports a fine meeting at Cornwall, with a good representation present. The devotional exercises were especially helpful, including Bible readings by Mrs. Mary J. Weaver, our state superintendent of evangelistic work. The hearty welcome and bright response made everybody happy. This is the second time within a year that Cornwall has entertained the convention.

Mrs. Weaver gave the address of the evening to an appreciative audience. Mrs. E. U. Burgess, of Ulster county, was present and brought kind words of sisterly greeting from her county. The departments of "Systematic Giving" and "Work among the Colored People" were added to those already taken up. Resolutions deploring the canteen system as carried on at West Point, were adopted. Also a strong recommendation toward increased interest in the line of physical culture. The local unions of the county responded grandly to an appeal for funds to assist in the entertainment of the state convention. The old officers were all reëlected.

Tioga county held its sixth annual convention at Waverly. It was a largely attended, profitable and enthusiastic meeting, ably presided over by the county president, Mrs. E. T. Howland. Ten unions were represented and the reports showed that the majority had done excellent work. The annual address of the president was most encouraging and helpful, and the suggestions and recommendations which it contained were heartily adopted by the convention.

A new Y in Candor is doing much to create temperance sentiment and help on the great work. The W. C. T. U. had never yet been planted at Candor, so great results are looked for from this Y, which was organized by Miss Lizzie Margetts, who had recently moved there. She is one of our stirring young woman, and a Y seems to be an absolute necessity to her wherever she is.

The department work of the county is in good hands and the results prove it. An hour was well spent in discussing a paper on "Franchise," and the women are awakening to increased interest in the subject. Financially, the county was never before in so good a condition, the reason being that four unions have adopted the plan of systematic giving, and the county has taken up the department. Suggestive papers on juvenile and press work were read. The best of the feast was reserved for the evening, at which time the Opera House was filled to listen to Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap, on "Gospel Politics." Many a truth was impressed on the hearts and consciences of Christian voters by her convincing and converting arguments.

Sidney Center was the place of meeting for Delaware county convention, and a most interesting and instructive gathering it proved to be. Miss E. U. Yates, of Maine, was with them, and in addition to giving a parliamentary drill and conducting a school of methods, gave a fine address in the evening. The various lines of work are being ably conducted, and excellent reports of the same were given. The literature department received fresh impetus during the Delhi fair when a W. C. T. U. Herald was printed and two thousand copies distributed. This work was in the hands of the president, Mrs. Lockwood, assisted by a few of the sisters. Wall pockets are kept filled in the depots, and Mrs. Lockwood provided a table well stocked with literature for the convention.

A touching incident occurred in which an old man, his hair whitened with the frosts of many winters, came forward and placing ten cents on the table, said, "This goes for temperance work, instead of the rum-seller for a drink this morning." A special prayer service was held in his behalf and for other victims of the saloon power. Excellent papers were read and resolutions adopted. The Good Templars and Prohibition Club aided the W. C. T. U. in making the delegates feel at home. A Demorest medal contest occupied one evening and a collection was taken, which was forwarded to the Prohibition National committee to aid in their work. The choir and a male quartette furnished good music, and an original poem by Miss Aggie Bristol was well received.

The sixth annual meeting of Sullivan county was held with Cochecton W. C. T. U., and as this union is made up of members from both sides of the river, for greater convenience of entertainment, the convention was held on the Pennsylvania side, in the village of Damascus. The weather was delightful, and the church was prettily decorated with plants, flags and chains of autograph pledge cards. All of the county officers were present, and nearly every local union represented by president and delegates. Encouraging reports were given of the department work, and the gain in membership for the past year has been thirty-eight per cent.

The annual address of the president was among the good things of the first evening. She reviewed the work of the past five years, showing that during the first three the number of members in the county had decreased from over 200 to 150. This she called a sifting time. Many had at first joined the ranks, thinking that the enemy could be speedily put to rout. Not seeing immediate results, they had become discouraged and dropped out. Since then the growth has been marked, and the unions are now building on a surer foundation. The members, having enlisted for life, are determined "to fight it out on this line." Nearly two years ago a union was organized at Narrowsburg, which developed into a power for good. In 1891 the county reported 209 members, and at the state convention in New York received the beautiful prize banner for greatest increase per cent in membership. This year the county reports 290 members, but Tompkins took the banner, for it has made a gain of 900 per cent on a base of sixteen members last year. Mrs. Mary J. Weaver delivered an address the second evening, founded on the story of Nehemiah rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, exhorting them to say with Nehemiah, "The Lord of heaven, He will prosper us; therefore we, His servants, will arise and build."

Kings county annual meeting was held in James M. E. church, Brooklyn, and in the words of the reporter, "was a thorough success." The president, secretaries, treasurer and superintendents of twenty-six departments reported greater activity than in former years, while the work of the county in legislation revealed the hearty co-operation of nearly all the clergy and congregations of the city. More ministers were in attendance at this convention than at any previous one, and forty-two names—mostly pastors—were proposed and accepted as honorary members. The address of welcome was given by Rev. James Montgomery and was responded to in an original manner by Mrs. Josephine Bramen. In the absence of Miss Greenwood, a Bible talk was given by Mrs. Brundage. Mrs. Baldwin, a returned missionary from China, gave a Bible exposition which was so excellent that requests were made for its publication in our state paper.

Mrs. McClees, National superintendent of soldiers' and sailors' work, was present and spoke upon the needs of this department. A table well stocked with literature occupied a prominent place during the meeting.

The election resulted in the reëlection of all except the recording secretary, who declined to fill the office this time. It was decided to hold the annual meeting in March hereafter, so these officers were elected for a short term. The luncheon, of which three hundred partook, was prepared by the Y's assisted by the Watchful Circle of King's Daughters.

The Y's, in connection with the L. T. L., furnished the evening entertainment which was well attended and greatly enjoyed. The decorations were very fine.

A pleasant little scene occurred when Mrs. Heath, in behalf of the convention, presented a bouquet of sixty exquisite rosebuds (the Y emblem) to Mrs. Vanderhoef, the county president, in remembrance of her birthday; Mrs. Vanderhoef very tenderly responded to the graceful tribute.

Some business being left over, an adjourned meeting was held later on, at which time all unfinished business was attended to.

A largely attended meeting of Onondaga county was held at Onondaga Valley. Nothing was left undone by the local union, and everything—even the weather—was harmonious. The new county president, Mrs. Wiseman, conducted business in a most business-like way. A touching memorial service was held in honor of the departed president, Miss Wilkinson, who for years has faithfully led the hosts in this county. Several of the clergy spoke words of greeting but one good brother struck the wrong key when he said, "In my opinion the women do not want to vote." He soon learned his mistake as several ladies informed him that "the ballot is just what we want." One woman asked, "Who gave men the authority to say women shall not vote?" and the Rev. brother replied, "Dr. Buckley," which created some merriment.

Splendid work has been done in this county during the year, that of state and county fairs being especially interesting. At a previous convention plans were discussed for a building on the fair ground, and against great odds with many discouragements the fair committee went at it. The result was success of course, and a fine building, 70x30 feet, was ready for use when fair time came, and a gospel service was held in it on the Sabbath, consecrating it to Christ's service. "When a woman will she will, you may depend on't." It has an upper hall with rooms for convenience of workers and friends. The dining hall was a great success and put about four hundred and fifty dollars in the treasury. This with money sent by local unions makes $650 raised since last June.

Resolutions were adopted, reports and papers listened to with pleasure, and a senior Demorest class added greatly to the enjoyment of this convention. The women are now thinking of a county paper on the coöperative plan, so local work can be better reported.

Steuben county has not been reported for some time but is coming to the front very rapidly. This county now holds the banner which is given for the greatest number of subscriptions to our state paper. Their last convention held at Prattsburg was of such interest that several requests have come to them for reports for different papers.

The convention opened promptly, and, after devotional exercises, the regular routine work was taken up. About seventy delegates were present, which was considered a goodly number, in view of the fact that Prattsburg is rather difficult of access. One good sister drove thirty-eight miles to attend. Twenty-three local unions reported in two-minute speeches, and it was discovered that a great deal could be said in two minutes. A Bible reading by Mrs. Moulton, of Atlanta, on "Exclusion of Self," proved excellent, indeed. Good music and several interesting papers helped to interest all present. The question box, over which Mrs. Marion B. Baxter presided, was, as it always is, one of the best things on the program. Mrs. Baxter delivered an address in the evening on "The Relation of Government to the Liquor Traffic." A large audience gave close attention from beginning to end. The second day was given largely to business, two new departments being added, non-alcoholics and systematic giving. When the hour for adjournment came, all felt this to be one of the best conventions ever held in the county.

The semi-annual convention of Wayne county was held at Marion, a "half a century temperance town." From the opening to the close of the meeting the utmost interest was manifested. Reports, papers, recitations and music all came in their places on the program, but the treat of the convention was the address in the evening by Miss Vandelia Varnum, whose theme was "Legal Prohibition." She was greeted with generous applause. The local unions were never in a more prosperous condition. Miss Sarah Downing, of Macedon Center, was elected president in place of Mrs. Hortense D. Smith, who resigned. This county also held a conference at Sodus in which four of the local unions participated. A fine program had been prepared and was carried out. Several new members were added and an arrangement made to organize the young people of Williamson and Sodus into a Young People's Temperance Union. These conferences are becoming quite numerous and are always helpful and profitable.

Richmond county has something new to offer in the shape of a recipe for temperance mince pies. At a meeting held not long ago in West New Brighton, which was addressed by Mrs. Ella A. Boole, the county president, this recipe was given as a souvenir to every one present. Richmond county will be glad to supply these souvenir recipes to unions desiring them.

MISS RILLA M. NORTON, recently returned from France after years of study, has become known to THE UNION SIGNAL readers through her clear-cut sketches of distinguished persons in that country. Miss Norton, who is a young lady of remarkable promise, thoroughly skilled in the subjects she presents, has prepared five lectures on contemporary French fiction, under the following heads: (1) A review of French fiction in relation to life, thought and æsthetics. (2) Sensitivity as an element of modern fiction. (3) The analytical novel. (4) Realism in fiction. (5) Impressionism in fiction. Miss Norton has that rare combination, the head of a philosopher and the heart of a reformer. She looks upon fiction as a great power in molding the thoughts of the people to new and better modes of action toward the better world of brotherhood. Any who would like to confer with Miss Norton in regard to these lectures, which are given in drawing-rooms, before colleges, etc., should address her care of Professor [illegible], Jacksonville, Ill.

A NEW YEAR LETTER.

BELOVED SISTERS:—The text which came to me with the new year, and which I find of ever-widening application, is that wonderful word of Paul, "None of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself." It might have been written specially for the W. C. T. U. women. A feeble folk, we find our strength in banding together, in unity of labor and in "agreement" in prayer.

In the world the system of inter-dependence is such that we touch in the supply of our daily needs every nation, every people, every clime. In the church we find all humanity must be bound together in one bundle if we would hasten His coming and His reign whose right it is to rule. In the W. C. T. U. we find the smallest, the most remote, the feeblest, is needed, and no effort, no service is so small that we can dispense with it.

We see this in every line which we attempt to follow but it is emphatically true in the department of finance. It is very true with us that "not many rich" have been called, and our work has all been accomplished by an aggregation of pennies. Therefore as we plan for the year opening before us let us conserve most carefully the smallest forces.

Experience and observation have taught me that the unions which always have money, which are ready to meet pecuniary needs and to occupy new fields and to enter open doors, are not those which have a wealthy membership but those which do business in a business-like way, who plan to have money and to have it without some great spasmodic strain. The wise housewife lays out her work beforehand, giving time and opportunity for the duties which must come in the household routine. There are no better housekeepers anywhere than the W. C. T. U. women, can they not carry their housekeeping wisdom into union work?

No more self-denying, self-sacrificing women exist than our fraternity. Every dollar almost, expended in our work, has a history: a pathetic story represents not luxuries foregone, but comforts, even necessities given up for this precious, divinely appointed cause. Sometimes the stories are told me, sometimes they are read between the lines, but the temperance money is consecrated, it is hallowed. And yet it might be obtained more freely, more easily and in larger sums with wise planning. I trust that this year there may be preparation for "self-denial week."

In our constituency every week is self-denial week, every day is marked with sacrifice. But when we set apart a week to "do without" some special thing, the union should take timely and concerted action and make the days as effective and profitable as possible. It should be so advertised, so impressed upon every individual that no one can consider herself excused, that every one shall help. Fifty cents per member would aggregate eighty thousand dollars to the temperance treasury, it would make a grand addition divided between local, state and National, it would send the car of progress forward with a tremendous impetus and every one could have a part, every one could consider she was represented. So let this week have its ample and careful preparation this year.

The proceeds of one self-denial week of the Salvation Army of Canada was $12,920, and we have a more wealthy constituency than they. Let us not fail at the point of giving the littles. Let us not allow those poorer than we to give more than we do. The same preparation and care is needed for Crusade day, for thankoffering meetings, for all occasions on which we expect to make a united effort for money. Our plans of themselves are usually good; we are apt to fail at the point of execution. Let us use our housekeeping faculties and wisdom here; we now perform our every-day duties in haphazard style. This year we are in the condition of the children left to care for the home in the mother's absence. How proud we used to be to carry on this work successfully. Let no jot or tittle fail because our chieftain is away; let us show that we are more than faithful to and competent for the trust imposed in us. Let this be a year of unexampled prosperity, because we have looked carefully for every penny; let it be a year of the largest membership. Let the World's Fair Convention be an exhibit of such an army of new recruits and old-tried soldiers as we have never known.

Yours for a list of two hundred thousand members,

ESTHER PUGH,
Treasurer N. W. C. T. U.

NEW MAGAZINES.

Among a few of the ever noteworthy features of THE CENTURY MAGAZINE, the January volume contains: "La Grande Demoiselle," a bright original story by Grace King; "The £1,000,000 Bank Note," one of Mark Twain's impossibilities written in his best vein; an admirable paper on Whittier by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps; a fine discussion of "The Kindergarten movement," by Talcott Williams.

The Century Co., Union Square, New York City.

GOODFORM greets the New Year with a bright face that augurs well for the eleven on-coming issues. "M. D. K." contributes a unique fable entitled, "The King's Gift." The first part of "An American Citizen," by M. Sears Brooks, is a prize story, unusually "taking"; Stanley Waterloo's "Odd Situation" is concluded in this number. Many will be glad to know it is to appear in book form. The "Annexation Question" is well discussed in two papers by Flavius J. Brobst and Chas. W. Cooper. Readers will be pleased to see Amber's "String of Beads" still unbroken. The "Children's Contest," sayings wise and otherwise, is full of sparkling gems.

"The Editor's Reflections" hardly need words of commendation. The various "departments" which pertain more directly to home and social life are full of good, strong suggestions.

The Goodform Company, Chicago.

THE LITERARY NORTHWEST presents a good table of contents this month, among the most prominent features of which are "Archbishop Satolli; a sketch," by Rev. John Conway, A. M., touching principally upon "The various charges of courtesies between Pope Leo the Thirteenth and the United States." Of timely interest are four papers discussing the question of open or closed World's Fair gates on Sundays, by Edwin H. Jaggard, H. H. Hart, Mrs. Harriet G. Walker and W. S. Pattee.

D. D. Merrill Co., publishers, St. Paul, Minneapolis and New York.

In a recent number of CHRISTIAN THOUGHT, edited by Charles F. Deems, Prof. J. H. Hyslop has a lengthy article entitled somewhat gruffly: "Shop and Girls." The topic is an old one—so is the burden of misery detailed in its consideration. There is need that every magazine in the country take up this refrain of cruelty to women, that press and pulpit echo and reëcho the story, until the Christian thought of the country crystallizes into Christian action and man's inhumanity to man shall cease to make countless thousands mourn.

Wilbur B. Ketcham, publisher, 2 Cooper Union, New York.

In the Woman's Council Table of the January CHAUTAUQUAN Fannie C. W. Barbour introduces the reader to Mrs. Kate Douglas Wiggen and her far-famed kindergarten in San Francisco, with just a glimpse at the kind of work done there. Olive Thorne Miller's brief paper on "The Worship of 'Things'" ought to be read and inwardly digested by hosts of so-called "model" housekeepers. Mrs. M. A. Waddell Rodger takes one for "A Day in the British Museum"—a day well spent. Ella Rodman Church contributes a sensible paper on "Habitable Rooms," that companions well with the one previously named by Olive Thorne Miller. Fanny Palmer Tinker talks entertainingly and instructively of "The Ladies' Art Association of New York." Kate Tannant Woods contributes from her fruitful pen a readable article, with the suggestive title, "Post-mortem Praise."

Dr. Theodore L. Flood, editor, Meadville, Pa.

THE CONQUEROR, the organ containing the monthly record of the work of the Salvation Army, has come out for '93 in a dress more startling than heretofore; its legend of "Blood and Fire" is confirmed by the brilliant red of the cover, out of which shines the white cross as a startling background for the fiery colored soldier with his shield and flag. The frontispiece is the portrait of the grand commander-in-chief of the army, General William Booth. Among the nearly fifty pages of matter of living interest, space can only be afforded to mention an article by Mrs. Major Brewer, "Our Boston 'House Beautiful,'" a New England Rescue Home, one of forty-four which the Salvation Army have founded here and there through the world. The pictured face of Captain Stirling, the matron, commends itself to one's heartiest respect and admiration.

Published by Ballington Booth, 111 Reade St., New York City.

THE NEW ENGLAND MAGAZINE for January contains some articles that emulate those of past issues in interest and value. Rev. Julius H. Ward contributes a most delightful paper on "James Parton and His Work," calling the subject of his sketch "the prince among biographers of this country." Lucia True Ames considers "The Home in the Tenement House," with an intelligent grasp of the subject which puts beside the direful pictures of the misery of tenement life suggested remedies and improvements that have a ring of reasonableness and practicability. "Harvard's Youngest Three," by Eliot Lord, introduces the reader to scenes in the college life of three notable students: "I recollect only two alumni of Harvard University who were younger when they graduated than Cotton Mather: Paul Dudley, born 3 September, 1675, was fourteen when he took his first degree, 2 July, 1690; and Andrew Preston Peabody, D. D., LL.D., born 19 March, 1811, was fifteen when he graduated, 31 August, 1826." The above, the author quotes from the old Harvard librarian, John Langdon Sibley.

New England Magazine Corporation. Stanhope and Morgan streets, Boston.

In this month's REVIEW OF REVIEWS is a most interesting paper upon "Vaccination Against Cholera" written by "The First Woman who Submitted to the Experiment." The article opens with a brief but comprehensive review of Pasteur's scientific war against hydrophobia, and a sketch of the Institute Pasteur in the Rue Dutot, with an outline of its workings. This institute is completing the fifth year since its inauguration, and the past month of December witnessed a grand celebration of Pasteur's seventieth year. The writer of the article in question relates in a bright vein how she came to put herself in the hands of M. Haffkine, a "brilliant disciple" of M. Pasteur, who has "succeeded in transforming and inoculating the cholera microbe." Her offer was gladly accepted as it was desired to test the effect of the inoculation upon women and children, former experiments having been made only upon men. The lady—an American—having inspected many of the curiosities of the laboratories describes the dreaded cholera germs as "innocent looking microbes resembling little lines or commas made by a sharp pen." Her record of the vaccinations—for she subjected herself to three—is exceedingly interesting and the article, which must attract wide attention concludes with these words: "No one can do more than his or her best for the sake of the general good. The memory of the quarantined ships, the crowded hospitals and the crowded graveyards of last summer, should be a sufficient inducement to urge us to do everything in our power to avoid a repetition of these horrors. If the public will help M. Haffkine in his efforts to master the disease, there is no reasonable doubt but that cholera may be stamped out within the next few years."

NEW BOOKS.

IOLA LEROY, or SHADOWS UPLIFTED, is written by Frances E. W. Harper, on some features of the Anglo-African race. Mrs. Harper writes from an intimate knowledge of her subject, having worked for and among the colored people for a long time. The temperance cause has had in her an active ally. Colored Sunday-schools will welcome the above named volume as coming from the brain of one of their own race, and it will make its own way because of the merit and interest of the matter it contains.

LITTLE ARTHUR'S HISTORY OF ROME, from the Golden Age to Constantine. By Hezekiah Butterworth.

No one knows better than Mr. Hezekiah Butterworth what appeals to the young. Probably a million readers have taken delight in his Zig-zag journeys, but this immense circle of boys and girls always find in Mr. Butterworth's writings a true and lofty tone, helps to right living and thinking and wise instruction, as well as bright entertainment.

With this well-deserved reputation as a leader of the young Mr. Butterworth offers "Little Arthur's History of Rome." For him the ancient folk-tales of Rome live again. He takes his little friend Arthur by the hand, and as he leads him under the purple skies of the Campagna he relates the quaint and beautiful legends which did duty as history for the Romans themselves, and even now contain helpful lessons of honor and character. It is Mr. Butterworth's aim to entice his young reader into these pleasant paths that lead to classical Rome, that he may feel a hunger for those noble works of antiquity which have been models in style through the ages.

Mr. Butterworth is a poet, and he looks with a poetic spirit rather than a critical eye on the evolution of history. He follows Duruy rather than Mommsen, for which the young reader will be duly grateful, since it causes him to dwell more particularly on the stirring episodes of the old heroic days than on the gloomy period of decay.

The work is illustrated with over 100 full-page cuts and vignettes, and will undoubtedly appeal to a wide circle of young readers, to whom it may be warmly commended.

The WELL DRESSED WOMAN is an object that most rarely addresses our eyes, but she lives in a delightful book of Mrs. Helen Gilbert Ecob bearing the above name, and is delineated in pictures that are figures from real women attired in dress at once healthful, artistic and reasonable. Mrs. Ecob has wisely chosen to illustrate her subject from real life. She has also called in the best testimony, and has put in her bright and pointed style the ideas to which she is devoted. It is, perhaps, the most discouraging feature of woman's upward progress that she is so slow to move along this line of reform, probably because it is the line of greatest resistance. Nothing is so senseless as fashion, and yet nothing so controlling. Probably this may be because one human being pitted against the universe dreads to make himself in any wise singular: each shields his personality behind that of others, hence the dull uniformity that fashion infuses seems to be a sort of shelter to which everybody flies in proportion to everybody's lack of brains and fiber. Very wisely does Mrs. Ecob say, "A body so healthy begets a sweet temper; not subject to headaches and nervous prostration; not exhausted by slight exertion; a nervous system not rasped by the petty frictions of everyday life; a physical vigor which shall bequeath to coming generations a heritage of acquired health and character." The corset question has rarely been better handled than in this book: temperately, wisely, "more in sorrow than in anger," the argument well reasoned and enforced by such illustrations as must take effect upon the mind of every woman really worth saving.

Gerrit Smith, that gracious friend of all slaves, whether white or black, male or female, wrote this pitiful sentence, which Mrs. Ecob has placed on the title page of her book: "Strive as you will to elevate woman, nevertheless the disabilities and degradation of her dress, together with that large group of false views of the uses of her being and of her relations to man, symbolized and perpetuated by her dress, will make your striving vain." Happily, we do not believe that any effort for the betterment of any class can by any manner of means ever be vain, but we agree with Gerrit Smith that every true and well created reform has a physical basis. Man lifts his forehead towards the stars, but his feet are firmly planted on the earth, and whoever wishes to help him forward must recognize that fact. Hence, the successful effort of the white-ribboners to secure scientific temperance instruction in the public schools, physical culture by means of the best forms of gymnastics in the public schools, the study of hygiene in the home. We firmly believe such a remodeling of the dress of woman as shall give a better fitting up to her as wife and mother and to her little ones is the very basis of the whole pyramid of physical development. We believe this has more to do with temperance than has prohibition or total abstinence, because these are methods that run on a single line, whereas physical sanity and equipoise will, within a century or two, lift human beings above the desire for artificial stimulants.

There is a big call of late years for Stereopticons. Sunday-Schools, Temperance Societies, Lodges and private homes are beginning to consider their surroundings not complete without a good lantern, and an ample supply of slides to illustrate History, Sunday-School Lessons, travels, and many scientific studies. Write to the McIntosh Battery and Optical Co., 141-143 Wabash Avenue, Chicago, whose advertisement appears elsewhere in these columns for the World's Fair Edition of their Lantern Catalogue, this year's specialty being Lantern Slides of the World's Columbian Exposition. Be assured that they stand at the very head of all makers and dealers in this line, and their prices are reasonable. Mention THE UNION SIGNAL.

It is now apparent to the Directors of the World's Columbian Exposition that millions of people will be denied the pleasure of becoming the possessors of

World's Fair Souvenir Coins

The Official Souvenir of the Great Exposition—

The extraordinary and growing demand for these Coins, and the desire on the part of the Directors that equal opportunities may be afforded for their purchase, have made it necessary to enlarge the channels of distribution. To relieve themselves of some responsibility, the Directors have invited

THE MERCHANTS

Throughout the Nation to unite with the Banks in placing Columbian Half-Dollars on sale. This is done that the masses of the people, and those living at remote points, mav be afforded the best possible opportunitv to obtain the Coins.

THE FORTUNATE POSSESSORS

of SOUVENIR COINS will be those who are earliest in seizing upon these new advantages.

THE JANUARY CRUSADER

Is more than usually interesting, and the demand for this winsome paper is growing right along. Indeed, it had more than 9,000 added to its lists during last year. If you will send for a sample copy of the January number, you will learn something of what it has in store for its readers during the year now opening. We cannot take space to repeat it all here, but send us a postal card asking for a sample. Read the supplement and see what is provided for—just 15c a year.

WOMAN'S TEMP. PUB. ASS'N,

An inquiry comes to us regarding "THE TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT," by Hon. H. W. Blair. This leads us to say that we still have a supply of these valuable books on hand. If our unions realized what a compendium of facts regarding the temperance cause it contains, they would not allow the opportunity to place a copy in the libraries of the towns and the homes to pass by unimproved. It is a book of 583 pages, and contains five maps and diagrams, four colored plates and fifty-six excellent full-page portraits of temperance workers of both sexes, while its pages discuss the temperance question from a scientific, physiological, medical, sanitary, economic, educational, governmental, historical, religious and reformatory standpoint, closing with a chapter on "What shall we do next?" a question pertinent to all.

It is needless to say more of the value of the book—now and always. To encourage any interested to secure it for their own use or the benefit of others, we have determined to make the following very liberal offer:

We will send this book, substantially bound in cloth, to any address, orders for which reach us before March 1st, 1893, for the very low price of $1.50, postpaid.

Send without delay.

EXTENDED.

Realizing that it was not possible for the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL to do all that could be done under our new and unparalleled offer, it has been decided to extend it, and it will hold good until March 1st, 1893.

Fully believing that it would be one of the greatest aids to our cause, as has been said again and again in these columns, if THE UNION SIGNAL were more generally read, and being unable to personally canvass all the territory of all the local unions, nearly 10,000 of which are scattered over this country, and desiring your help in this direction, the proposition here outlined is made to all ages and sexes.

NOTE.—To any one, young or old, readers of "Aunt Jane's Cozy Corner" included, who will send us a club of eight new subscribers at one dollar each, we will forward promptly one of our beautiful W. C. T. U. solid silver after-dinner coffee souvenir spoons. These spoons have the die of the Crusade Church at Hillsboro, Ohio, imprinted in the bowl; Miss Willard's picture embowered in the National floral emblem, the trailing arbutus on the handle, while the top of the handle is surmounted by the world belted with the white ribbon. The back of the handle has the World's floral emblem, the water lily, and the initials of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association. These spoons are both beautiful and valuable, being of solid sterling silver.

REMEMBER, we will send an after dinner coffee spoon, polished or oxidized, for eight NEW subscribers at one dollar a year.

FOR TEN NEW subscribers at one dollar each, we will send a similar spoon with gilded bowl.

FOR TWELVE NEW subscribers we will send a tea spoon of the same design, or with the Temple in the bowl, instead of the Crusade Church.

FOR FIFTEEN NEW subscribers at one dollar each, we will send a teaspoon with gilded bowl.

FOR EIGHTEEN NEW subscribers at one dollar each we will send an orange spoon, polished or oxidized, with the Temple or the Crusade Church in the bowl.

FOR TWENTY NEW subscribers at one dollar each, we will send an orange spoon, gilded bowl.

This offer is open until March 1st, 1893.

COULD the drink bill of the world be used for six months, each inhabitant of the world might receive a Bible. At the present rate it would take six hundred years.

THE Blue Cross Temperance Society of the continent has one hundred and eighty sections Swiss, with three thousand members; twenty-one sections German, fifteen sections French and three sections Belgian.

THE Episcopal brotherhood of St. Andrew receives its name from Andrew, the apostle, who, when he had found Jesus, went at once to seek his brother Simon—the name thus suggesting the purpose of the brotherhood.

THE school children of St. Paul, Minn., were solicited to bring contributions for the city poor. The result was one hundred and seventy-two great wagon loads of provisions and clothing, more than the city all told has given in three years.

WHEN the government in the Central and Northwest provinces, India, forbade the sale of opium on the premises, a missionary found out that one opium den alone in Cawnpore employed sixty-three servants to carry pipes filled with opium to any part of the city.

JACOB A. RIIS, who has devoted so much time to the "other half" of society believes that heredity is somewhat of a bugbear when the problem of the criminal classes is discussed, and that it is rather a question of getting hold of the child early enough before evil influences have got a firm grip on him.

THOSE who have worked among both classes say that a white barbarian is more hopeless than a black one. As regards morals, some African tribes, like the Zulus and Maoris, are ahead of certain classes in European countries; at least they do not get drunk until taught or forced by so-called civilized nations.

HUGH PRICE HUGHES, recently made a prayer that could be made consistently in many a rich church. "Forgive us, Lord, if at any time we have given pence when we should have given silver, if we have given silver when we ought to have given gold, and if we have given gold when we might have given bank-notes."

WESLEYAN Methodist Conference Committee for 1892 in England reports an increase of nearly 24,000 members in the Bands of Hope this year. It has 836 societies, with over 50,000 members. It publishes the Methodist Temperance Magazine, organ of the committee, of which Rev. G. Armstrong Bennetts, B. A., is secretary.

The Pinkerton Men.

The employment of private police, or "Pinkerton Men," as the whole class have come to be called since the Homestead tragedy, has called forth a great deal of discussion. The contention on the one hand is that an individual has the right to defend himself and his property by any means he can command; on the other, it is declared that this method is only a species of private justice (like lynching) and should not be allowed to take the place of dependence on law and its enforcement by legal authority.

The same difference of opinion exists as to certain modes of treatment for disease; but this does not apply to Drs. Starkey & Palen's Compound Oxygen, which is a natural remedy—that is, it is a natural means—the air we breathe, administered by a natural method—inhalation. This simple treatment has, for twenty-three years, worked miraculously in the restoration of thousands from divers diseases. To be sure, it excites great wonder that something that you cannot taste and which creates no sensation, should accomplish such mighty results; but this is no greater miracle than our being constantly kept alive by breathing air.

After all, results are what wise people are after. If Compound Oxygen cures, then they ought to want it; and the fact that it is simple, natural and pleasant, is an additional reason.

We invite any person needing better health or strength, to write us for particulars and proof. Address DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch St., Philadelphia, or Chicago, San Francisco, New York, and Toronto, Ont.

Desiring to give the admirers of Ivory Soap an opportunity to contribute to its literature, the manufacturers offered prizes for the best twelve verses suitable for use as advertisements. 27,388 contributions were received. To the following was awarded the

FIRST PRIZE.

OUR grandmothers, dressed in their linsey,
Would kindle a fire in a hole,
And over it swing a big kettle
On two forked sticks and a pole.
With lye they had strained through the ashes,
And scraps that were lying around,
They made for our fathers and mothers,
A soft saponaceous compound.
But now in great buildings that cover
More ground than a fortress of old,
In caldrons of brass and of copper,
That glisten like silver and gold;
With oils from the far-away tropics,
And alkali made from the dew,
Are mingled the essence of roses
And lilies and jassamine too.
The result of this rare combination,
Is the IVORY SOAP of to-day,
To-morrow, next week, and thereafter,
Forever and ever and aye.

THE WORLD'S FAIR TEMPERANCE HEADQUARTERS

WE ARE UP AND AT IT.

On the evening of January 9th our great Hotel was reduced to ashes. On January 10th lumber commenced to be placed on the ground for a new building. We are rebuilding complete, but upon enlarged plans and the plans approved by insurance authorities as the safest possible method of construction. All our contracts for lodgings will be kept to the letter. This is what we are doing, and the following are samples of what our friends are saying:

We are sorry for your misfortune, but we know your energy and your purpose, and understand that the loss is a hindrance only. We have been authoritatively informed that stockholders will lose nothing. We wish to congratulate you on your promptness in meeting the emergency, and also congratulate the stockholders on having such a custodian of their interests.

CAROLINE B. BUELL AND ESTHER PUGH.

I cannot tell you how sorry I was to hear of the destruction by fire of the World's Fair Temperance Hotel, to which so many have looked for quiet and restful shelter during the coming summer.

I believe that in a few weeks all trace of the fire will be gone, and not a shadow of disappointment will fall on your patrons. This is due to my belief in your persistent determination, energy and perseverance, which will not be satisfied with less than complete success. Am so glad you were amply insured. Yours truly, FANNY H. RASTALL.

Was delighted to get your telegram. Can only say "God bless you," and we will stand by you in the rebuilding and to the end. MRS. E. A. RUSSELL.

I had just received the picture of the completed building, eliciting my delighted admiration, and its destruction fills me with sorrow. Your prompt and energetic action is very gratifying to me. I am sure every patron will rally to your support. ALICE H. SHULTES, State Normal School.

River Falls, Wis.

My stock is full paid, but because of the fire I double my subscription, and shall place more lodgings among my friends. J. W. DURHAM.

Oshkosh, Wis.

My stock was full paid in September. I inclose $10 for another contract.
Yours for success, JOSHUA L. MILLS.

All subscriptions for additional lodgings should reach us before February 15th.

The World's Fair Authorities recently published a list of rates at which Furnished Rooms (not in Hotels) could be obtained in Chicago. Their figures were published to guard the public against imposition. The average price in Chicago according to their figures for accommodations like ours were $5.66 for what we furnish for $2 now and will furnish for $4 after doubling our rates.

The Harvey World's Fair Hotel and Entertainment Co., 161 La Salle St., Chicago, Ill.—

DEAR SIRS:—I hereby subscribe for and agree to take and pay for lodgings in your Hotel at Harvey, during the World's Fair, amounting to ..... Contracts of Ten Dollars each, total subscription, $..... These lodgings are to be furnished according to the rules of your Company, and at the following rates: One person in a room, $1.50 per day; two persons in a room, $1.00 each per day; three persons in a room, 66⅔ cents each per day: four persons in a room, 50 cents each per day.

Enclosed find $..... cash payment on this subscription, the balance to be paid as follows: One dollar on each $10 subscribed for each succeeding calendar month, until one-half the amount of this subscription shall be fully paid. The other half to be paid at the time of naming the date for visiting the World's Fair and using the lodgings hereby subscribed for. It is especially agreed, however, that in default of any of the payments hereby pledged, or in the event of grossly immoral or improper conduct on my part, all rights or claims hereunder shall be forfeited to and at the option of the Harvey World's Fair Hotel and Entertainment Company.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

A conference of Christian Prohibitionists met in Philadelphia, January 24.

The sudden death of Phillips Brooks, D. D., Bishop of Massachusetts, occurred January 23, at Boston.

The Chicago Bible Society, organized fifty-three years ago, held its annual meeting last Thursday, having distributed during the year 19,084 Bibles.

Rutherford B. Hayes, President of the United States 1877–81, died at his home in Fremont, Ohio, January 17, and his funeral took place January 20.

The National Board of Trade met in annual session at Washington last week and made important recommendations to Congress regarding foreign and domestic commerce.

Justice L. Q. C. Lamar, of the United States Supreme bench, died at Macon, Georgia, on the evening of January 23. Mr. Lamar was for many years a resident of Oxford, Mississippi; served twice in Congress as a representative of that state, and was appointed from the United States Senate in 1885 by Mr. Cleveland to the Supreme bench.

The report of the subcommittee appointed to inquire into the "sweating system" was adopted by the House Committee on Manufactures, January 20, including the recommendation "that such legislation be had by Congress as, with least interference with the business of the citizen, and least exercise of Federal jurisdiction, will effectually prevent interstate commerce in articles of clothing or personal wear made under unhealthy conditions."

IT having been stated by the press that the Woman's Club of Chicago voted unanimously to send a delegation to Washington for the purpose of influencing the Sunday opening bill, THE UNION SIGNAL is glad to state that the white-ribbon members present voted heartily against it, as they will at every opportunity.

THE UNION SIGNAL congratulates Henry W. Blair on his election to Congress from the congressional district of New Hampshire that has usually "gone Democratic." We are glad to have this heroic veteran again in the big house with the gold dome, and we feel sure he will not lower his flag one iota. The best phase of Washington society will be enriched by the return to that city of Mrs. Blair, one of the truest women of our times.

THE twenty-fifth annual convention of the National Woman's Suffrage Association was held in Washington, D. C., last week. Miss Susan B. Anthony presided and delivered a powerful address. The report of the secretary, Mrs. Rachel Foster Avery, showed that thirty-five states now have active suffrage organizations comprising a membership of thirteen thousand, one hundred and fifty. Our readers may look for a fuller report of this important meeting next week.

IN many unexpected ways does our beautiful Temperance Temple receive its due meed of praise. One of the newest situations in which it finds itself is as a prominent character of William T. Stead's latest story, "From the Old World to the New," which constitutes the Christmas number of the Review of Reviews. In this unique story, which is a rare and remarkably successful combination of a love tale and reliable guide-book information of the coming Chicago Exposition, the "Woman's Temple" is truthfully described as "one of the handsomest buildings in Chicago, which has been put up by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the greatest women's association in the world. It is a much more handsome edifice than any other of the same kind, and it is a standing monument of the energy, zeal and business capacity of the women who built it." Thanks to Mr. Stead.

THERE passed to his reward from Chicago last week, January 19, a man whom everybody called the "children's friend,"—Dr. Henry Shipman. He it was who founded, twenty-two years ago, the Foundlings' Home, which has been a veritable haven to thousands of mothers and babies. This Home has been supported on a purely faith basis, Dr. Shipman never having asked for a penny's contribution. Gifts both large and small have reached the Home, some through channels entirely unknown, but all have been accepted as direct from the Heavenly Father who prompted the loving heart to give.

A PERTINENT question in connection with the South Carolina Dispensary Bill might be, what is its army of saloon-keepers going to do after July 1? Will they emigrate to the World's Fair city? Now that the state has taken away the occupation of the saloon-keeper, what is its duty toward him? It is a unique situation, and one which as Prohibitionists we should be only too glad to welcome. Imagine, if you can, the city of Chicago entirely rid of her seven thousand saloons! Imagine her completely cleaned of the seven thousand eyesores which infest her streets! Imagine her suddenly confronted with the question, what shall we do with our saloon-keepers? If ever that good time comes, may she be equal to the emergency.

THE permanent address of Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew and Dr. Kate Bushnell, until further notice, is 816 Sherman Ave., Evanston, Ill., and not 28 Russel St., Melbourne, Australia, as given in the last directory. All mail is carefully forwarded from Evanston. It is with joy that we are now able to announce that these "Third and Fourth Round-the-World Missionaries" are to be in their homeland the coming summer, taking the long journey from England for the express purpose of attending the World's W. C. T. U. Convention in June. The last letter received from them at headquarters was written on the Arabian Sea, near the Gulf of Aden. They expected to visit a few points in Syria and Egypt and reach England about the first of March. May safety and peace attend them.

NEXT Friday afternoon, January 27, will be held in Central Music Hall, Chicago, a mass-meeting in the interests of a home for destitute and crippled children, the most outcast and hopeless class of humanity. A well-formed destitute child stands a chance of adoption into a good home, but a crippled child is seldom an object of love's adoption. There is already in the city a small Home of this kind, presided over by Dr. I. Prince, for years associated with the late Dr. Shipman in the Foundlings' Home, and the object of this mass-meeting Friday night is to raise funds to build upon the land already donated, a Home of such magnificent size that its doors need never be closed in the face of a needy crippled child. We can unqualifiedly indorse Dr. Prince and urge our generous readers to remember this needed charity.

IT IS wonderful what can be done by the steady, systematic pushing of an interest. For instance, Commander Booth was recently in Canada at the anniversary of the establishment of the Canadian branch of the Salvation Army in Toronto. Special services were held throughout the day and a check for nearly ten thousand dollars was handed to the commander as the proceeds of the week of self-denial of the Canadian members of the army. If the Canadian members of the Salvation Army can in a week raise ten thousand dollars, what ought the White Ribbon Army to do in the great Republic? This is a question sent most earnestly by our own commander from London on the nineteenth day of December. It will be remembered that the self-denial week of the white-ribboners is April 17–23, and if we so resolve we may make it the grandest and most helpful week for our finances that society has ever known. Will not state presidents, state treasurers, local presidents and treasurers put their heads together to see how this may best be done?

THE English interviewer is the most complete specimen of that comparatively new species. Having dealt with him in a variety of forms, we are prepared to say that as Americans we might learn much from illustrations of this ilk. For instance, the victim is told to speak his mind with the utmost freedom on any and all subjects in which he is interested, and to quicken his apprehension the interviewer often brings a list of questions. But within a day or two a type-written manuscript, or a nice, clean proof sheet comes back, which the victim is permitted to correct, eliminate, add to or subtract from, at his own will and pleasure, being absolutely certain that in the last analysis the article will appear precisely as he left it. What "surcease of sorrow" would come to men and women in public life were this the universal rule in the land of lakes and prairies.

THE hearing of the friends and foes of Sunday opening took place January 10-13 before the World's Falr Committee of the House. The two hours of the first day were wholly given to the friends of opening, on the other days the time was equally divided. Both sides were very ably and strongly represented, and at its close the Washington Post, which strongly favors opening, said: "It is extremely doubtful that the Durborrow joint resolution calling for a repeal of the Sunday closure clause will ever be reported. Its author believes the committee will report it to the House, but intimations by his associates seem to show that it will be quietly shelved." This is the more likely, as a careful poll of the House just taken shows a majority against the repeal. Nearly all labor organizations were represented on the side of opening. This is an ominous fact for the future of our country. We believe it should be counted the special mission of the W. C. T. U. to reach and educate this class along the lines of Sabbath observance and prohibition.

"EMINENT in war, but preëminent in peace," would be a fitting inscription on the tomb of Rutherford B. Hayes, whose body was laid to rest at Fremont, Ohio, last Friday. No eulogy was said above his bier, because none was necessary. The funeral service was simplicity itself, consisting only of prayer and song, being almost identical with that of his wife's, Lucy Webb Hayes, whom all white-ribboners loved, because of her brave stand for temperance in the White House. And now we rejoice to remember that her noble husband shared her heroic views and seconded the social innovation of state as well as private, wineless banquets. The "white light of history" often reveals strong characteristics that were unnoticed in the heat of criticism. President Hayes' administration has frequently been declared a weak one, but even his political opponents cannot fail to credit him now with the finest civil service reform of the century, and no one can dispute that his sense of justice to friend and foe alike has scarcely been equaled by any administration since Washington's. "He was a good citizen, a good President, and, above all, a good man," testified not only his associates in Congress, but also his public and private life. Since his retirement from the Presidency in 1881, he has resided at his beautiful home in Fremont, enjoying his library of 12,000 choice volumes and giving unstintingly of wealth, time and talents to philanthropic and educational interests. He was trustee of a half dozen Western colleges and president of the National Prison Reform Association. His championship of unpopular reforms and graceful acceptance of the dignity and importance of individual citizenship will shine brighter on the historian's page than his years of public service in the army, the governorship, Congress and the presidency. He was a hero and a President, but more than all, he was a Christian and a gentleman. The world needs more Rutherford B. and Lucy Webb Hayes, who can carry into public places the virtues of the domestic hearth and return to private life to resume with contentment and dignity the duties of home and citizenship.

CONTRIBUTED

ECHO OF "BETWEEN THE YEARS."

BY MRS. B. P. SEARS.

Ah, me! and is there now a place
"Between the years," where we may hide,
And count the wrinkles on our face,
In the new mirror by our side?
For on its bracket there I see
The figures 1, 8, 9 and 3.

I've sought these many years to find
A spot "between the years" to rest—
Full half a century—but my eyes of mind
Have never yet found such bequest;
For e'er the old year says "good-bye,"
I hear the new say, "Here am I."

I've looked at faithful hands of time,
As midnight's hour was just to strike,
And thought, if now they halt a chime
Will greet my ear and eyes alike—
But, ah! I could not catch the view
Between the old year and the new.

I could not hear the empty sound
Of depths of deep, where last year crept
Beyond the edge, and all around
The new year slid where now he slept.
And time rolled on, while joys and tears
Sang out, "There is no time between the years."

But still, beloved, it is well,
With foot on each, the old and new,
To halt, and backward glance to tell
What we have done, or wished to do;
Then if but one step on we see,
Isn't that enough for you and me?

THE VOTE THAT COULD NOT BE ACCOUNTED FOR.

BY KATE H. BROOKS.

Some time along in the 70's, John's wife, being an omnivorous reader, and the house and neighborhood being tolerably well supplied with current literature, began to have ideas of her own on the subject of government.

She had always been a strict adherent of Republican doctrine, because "father voted that way," and John also, so John's wife believed in that party most emphatically. Ever since she had been old enough to carry a two-penny flag and understand that once in four years her candidate, or father's, rather, was to be elected or otherwise, she had intensely enjoyed the excitement and enthusiasm attending the process of deposing the nation's chief executive and putting another in his place.

As a child she often wearied those about her by asking why she and the other feminine members of the household could not vote, but as her mother said nothing and the father always explained the matter to his own satisfaction, after a time she became submissive, if not satisfied, with the reasoning of those in authority.

Time flew on, and as young boys were given into the hands of John's wife, first in the school-room and afterward in the home, she became conscious of a power she possessed, in a remarkable degree, of training and directing their young minds into right channels. Whether she used it wisely and well according to the light given her remains to be seen.

Perhaps there was a little touch of bitterness in the heart of John's wife, of which she was scarcely cognizant, concerning the long delayed reforms on certain questions in which she was deeply interested, but certain it was that her faith in the dominant power of the day was surely and steadily waning. For all the good which her party had accomplished since the days of the civil war, in building up the wealth and prosperity of the nation she was devoutly thankful; but she began to reason that the nation needed bringing out and broadening on other lines than that of wealth, and the power that wealth can wield.

Being an active, persevering sort of woman she disseminated these views broadcast in her home and neighborhood, and especially among the class of young men in the Sunday-school over whom she had gained an influence, which strengthened and grew as she taught them the practical side of the beauties of religion while instilling into their minds and hearts the mystic truths of their spiritual needs.

As John's wife read and studied, the idea grew with her that a different kind of government was needed to-day from that of twenty-five years ago. She saw farmers, day laborers and mechanics sending to the halls of Congress and the legislature a man chosen from the ranks above them, who often had no real sympathy in common with them; more often than otherwise he was a lawyer; quite often a man of wealth, believing that all might be millionaires if they would but do and dare as he had done; whereas his brothers were yet toiling in poverty and amid lowly surroundings, it must needs be they were not fit to govern themselves, much less to make laws for others.

John's wife pondered all these things in her heart, as is often the way with women, and because her husband did not always sympathize with her in her beliefs, she made confidents of her boys. The result was that they were better informed on the questions of the day than is usually the case among lads of immature age. They, in turn, disseminated their ideas among their companions, until the youthful element of that Utopian neighborhood was all alive with the questions of right and wrong pertaining to the government of the day.

John's wife believed that as the immense mail matter of this country was handled successfully by the government for the good of the people, the railroads, the telegraph, the telephone and express business should be handled in like manner. "But," said Ted one day, "I heard one of the Republican speakers say if that much power were given into the hands of one party that it would take a revolution to depose it; and that it would not do to repose so large a trust in the hands of one class of men."

"Ah, Ted," said John's wife, "do you think that same man would dare affirm that our postmasters, mail-cariers and all others concerned in handling the mail matter of the nation have been corrupted by the trust imposed on them? No, indeed; it would be hard to find a more reliable class of citizens, and when a few years ago the Republicans stepped out of power and the Democrats came in nearly every office in the land changed hands without any disastrous consequences whatever."

Then John's wife, warming to her subject, showed Ted the danger arising from monopolies somewhat in this wise. Her husband and others the year before had the exclusive control of a particular kind of coal which was being mined in but one place on only one line of railway. Now they had hoped to receive enough benefit from the proceeds of the same to enable them to afford better schooling for their boys and some comforts for their old age. But the railroad refusing to draw the coal to market, or rather putting the price of carrying it at an enormous a rate, they were forced to abandon the mine, or sell to an agent, who at that time appeared, and who afterward proved to be in the employ of this railroad. She convinced Ted that if the road had been run in the interest of its patrons, with the government behind it, such a wrong could not have been done in this free (?) land.

Then she pointed him to Victoria in Australia where each class of citizens has his representatives taken from his own class in life, believing that such persons can better legislate for them than one who has no acquaintance with their real needs. The government manages there successfully the railroads and all like institutions, without which no nation can become great in the interests of the people. At this juncture impulsive Ted broke in on her train of thought with an idea of his own.

"I say, mother, it's almost winter and we boys were wondering to-day what we shall do these long evenings. Why can't I have them all come here once a week and you talk to them about these things just as you do to me?"

And John's wife said "Yes," to the proposition; but strange to tell she had the lads come on the Wednesday night when John was never absent from the weekly prayer-meeting. The idea took well among the boys, some of whom had already attained their majority, and John's wife read more and pondered long and well the questions of governmental affairs in order to make the subject interesting to them.

"Now," said one of the young men to her one night, "we have discussed the component parts, both good and evil, of all the four parties in the field. There seems to be some folly, a considerable amount of wickedness in high places in all of them, and each has also its good points. I find I do not agree with any one of them in all its essential doctrines and principles. Now what's a fellow to do in such a case? In other words, how shall I vote, or shall I not vote at all?"

And Mrs. John with shining eyes rose to the occasion and said: "You are not the only one who finds himself in such a quandary, Frank; and, please God, I believe I can see how, in the near future, the dominant parties are to be broken in pieces and scattered; then out of all this seeming chaos, which necessarily will cause consternation, the best parts of all will naturally drift toward one another and amalgamate; and as in times past in great national conflicts leaders to match the occasion have arisen, so in the future they will be forthcoming; then we shall have a free government with equal privileges for all and special rights to none. As for your vote, I advise you to vote with that party which comes nearest your ideal, for none of them can yet fill it, of what a government for the people and of the people, should be."

So the young men's votes scattered, and thus it was that the election returns electrified the nation, and that reform forces now stand between chaos and shuddering omnipotence, as to old parties, and on the Mount of Vision for themselves. May they know how to use their eyes!

REFORM MOVEMENTS.

BY E. EVANS.

I agree with THE UNION SIGNAL that "this is not only an hour for thought, but for action on the part of all who are interested in breaking the mould of past conditions in the American problem."

History is rapidly repeating itself, and if great events cast their shadows before, these shadows clearly indicate the utter hopelessness of the Republican party. It has staked all upon the only issue it had, namely, the high protective feature of the tariff, and has lost all; and now, with a solid South against it, and a divided North, it can hardly hope to ever again administer the affairs of this country. Had the party, after the difficulties pertaining to the war were settled, turned its face squarely towards the next great problems of reform which presented themselves, viz: the liquor question, which in the very year of its birth was a "living issue," and the suffrage question, which can scarcely be called second to it, it could have ridden gloriously on to new conquests in the problems of our race! But like the old Whig party, which played "hot and cold" on the slave question, it has lost the confidence of the thoughtful people of this country, and like the Whig party, must step down and out. It has tried to keep up the old "bloody-shirt" issues ever since the war, until it has so incensed the South against it as to render impossible the hope to carry a single Southern state.

I regret to have to say this, for I have been an ardent Republican, up to 1880, and would still have been in its ranks had it proved itself equal to the demands of the age in which we live. But failing to listen to the voice of reason, justice and righteousness, preferring rather to listen to the bewitching enchantments of the liquor traffic, spoils, monopoly and greed, it has laid its head into the lap of these "Delilahs" until it is shorn of its strength, and now these lovers will no doubt amuse themselves in boring out its eyes!

I am often asked why I am always talking about the demise of the Republican party, and not of that of the Democratic party. The reason is very plain. In ante bellum days more antislavery men were found in the Whig party than in the Democratic party, and in the formation of the Republican party these antislavery Whigs were the first to move out, which left the Whig party a mere skeleton, and out of these noble Whigs, reinforced by the Democratic "barn-burners," the new Republican party was born! Had the 874,000 Know-nothings at the time gone with the 1,341,000 of those noble men who voted for Fremont and Dayton in 1856, the Republican party would have been triumphant in its first effort, and Col. Fremont and not Lincoln might have filled a martyr's grave. But:

"God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform."

Now the Prohibition party has occupied very much the same position as did the old liberty and Free-soil party, though of much longer duration, and the People's party bears much resemblance to the spasmodic uprising of the old Know-nothing party. If this be true, we are on the eve of great events!

But let us drop the old dispensation and come down to the new. The conditions are now: One of the two great hitherto dominant parties has been signally and hopelessly defeated! Where are the millions of the noble men who have formed the rank and file of that party going? They cannot and will not go to the Democratic party! They are by nature and education naturally reformers. They will never consent to feed at the "flesh pots" of their ancient foe—the Democratic party! The whisky element and the old disappointed spoils-hunters of the party will naturally gravitate to the old Democracy. This is their natural home, but not so with the rest of the great brainy millions of Republicans! They will never find a home in the Democratic ranks while it stands as a bulwark of the liquor traffic and all its attendant evils.

There are, both North and South, a large number of far-seeing men in the Democratic party. When the new political dispensation is fully inaugurated, and these good men are asked to take sides on the great moral issues, which will be the gauge of battle of the new party, these men will "come out from among them" by the hundreds of thousands and take their stand with the reformers, as did the "barn-burners" with the Republicans in the fifties.

Now what is to be done in order to bring about conditions favorable to this state of things? In my judgment no time should be lost in calling a conference of leading reformers from every state in the Union. There should be at least three from every state, and these men should be chosen with great care as to their fitness to sit in such a council. A like number of leading women should also be invited.

In order to call together such a conference it will be imperative that a voluntary committee should be organized temporarily for the purpose of taking the initiatory steps necessary to the issuing of the call.

I would suggest such men as Gen. James B. Weaver, of Iowa, Dr. Taylor, George M. Miller and A. J. Streeter, of Illinois, S. H. Comings, of Michigan, Gideon T. Stewart, of Ohio, Terrence V. Powderly, of Pennsylvania, Henry Clay Bascom, of New York, Hiram Maine, of Indiana, Wolfenberger, of Nebraska, Louckes, of South Dakota, Satterlee and Donnelly, of Minnesota, Dohoney, of Texas, and Bidwell, of California. This will make fifteen members in this provisional committee. I would suggest that THE UNION SIGNAL name a certain number of women as members of this provisional committee, but enough of them should be present to assist in formulating a proper call for a national conference to be held as early as possible in 1893, at Chicago, and copies be sent to the absent ones for their signatures.

This committee should not attempt to formulate a platform of principles, but simply outline the object of the call, and the necessity of a union of reformers looking to future political action. In sending out invitations to this national conference, prominent men in both the old parties, who have been known to be reformers in their own parties, should be invited—and there are many of them. I think I know prominent Republicans in this state—civil service reformers—who would attend such a conference.

Not a moment should be lost. The great W. C. T. U. should be the first to move. It has no votes as yet, but it has something that is better—it has moral convictions and the moral courage to assert them. Why should it not arise in womanly might and assert that no more "cob-house politics" can command its support! I am confident that the time has come for reformers to inaugurate an aggressive movement, such as will eventuate in the triumph of a great National Reform party, and the overthrow of the many evils which are now menacing the life of the Republic.

COLUMBIAN CRUMBS.

The Esquimaux Village.

BY B. V. CUSHMAN, M. D.

"It beats all how human folks air, whether they come from Labrador or Patagony!" exclaimed an old gentleman, coming out of the Esquimaux hut, "where the baby is," as our party went in, New Year's day. A high board fence surrounds the group of cabins in which the queer little people are quartered, and the transition from the city of palaces to the Esquimaux village is sudden as was the change of weather that afternoon. The population of this realistic picture of life under the Arctic circle is fifty-nine, and our round of calls convinced us of the pertinence of the old man's observation. The baby, a bit of nut-brown humanity about as big as an average-sized bisque doll, swings in a hammock by the stove. It is plain that his tiny mother considers her cabin the most interesting one in the settlement. She is clad in pants made of the skin of the hair seal, tanned with the fur on, and a half-fitting jacket or basque of the same material, short in front, but at the back extending in postillions to the bend of the knee, completes the costume. All the women have very small feet, shod in moccasins. The dress reformer's fondest, freest dream is realized in this costume. The "under arm curve" is perfect, and that arbitrary equator upon woman's sphere, "the waist line," is purely imaginary and indistinguishable. Yet the wearer is not as happy as we would expect to find her. One dear little woman confided to me that she "never wore skin pants before, and cried when she had to put them on here." She kept her work table before her all the time of our stay. I mused what, after all, it is that we progressive ones crave. Certainly compulsory "pants" are grievous to our northern sisters as are trailing skirts to us when fashion commands them.

Most of the settlers are from the south of Labrador, where the Moravian missionary has wrought, bringing in Christianity, civilization and petticoats. But the desire of the exhibitors is to show the race in its native style and habit. There are two heathen families, and while their features, stature and color are the same, they might belong to another planet if their conditions only were taken into account. The Christian homes are without exception cleanly, the plain tables white as scouring makes wood, the windows clear and the beds clean. The others justify the time-honored comparison, "dirty as the heathen." Squalid, abject and sodden are those who have not known the quickening touch of the Spirit. At first view of the simple conditions—a skin bag for a bed, a primitive sled, drawn by dogs leashed with strips of skin for conveyance, and coats with headpiece cut on—I said: "This is life reduced to its lowest terms. Food and raiment, the prime necessities, are provided. What more can be done for the physical man?" But when I entered the heathen cabins, saw the filth upon the faces and missed the Bible from the shelf, I said: "No; this is life at its lowest." The conscience of the Moravian Esquimaux is respected by closing the gate of the village against visitors on Sunday. It is not a bad beginning of the great Exposition—this "exhibit" of simple, godly life as it exists near and beyond the timber limit of the far North.

MUSIC IN THE WOMAN'S BUILDING.

The woman's committee on music has a highly commendable plan for bringing forward amateur musical talent. It proposes to give fortnightly concerts, at which only women and girls who are amateurs of high order of ability, and who have been residents in America for ten years or more, will be allowed to appear. Any one aspiring to a part must be tested and approved by a jury from the committee, besides being able to meet the requirements of Theodore Thomas, the musical director. It will be a mark of high honor to appear at one of these concerts and will confer lasting distinction upon the fortunate amateur for the solid reason that each will be rated upon her merits, no diploma of any conservatory being accepted as proof of proficiency. Examinations will be given not later than February, either in this city or at points in the different states known to the chairman of the Woman's Board of the state, to whom application should be made. Quartettes, trios, instrumental or vocal, and choral and orchestral organizations will be eligible. All women following music as a profession, who wish to appear in the Woman's Building, must address Director Thomas. The Minnesota Board offers a medal to every successful candidate belonging in that state.

CLIFF PALACE.

Archæologists and musty, fusty scientists are not the only ones who will be interested in the fac simile of Battle Mountain opposite the Forestry Building. Mr. Jay Smith, at the head of a party of scientists and artists, with efficient guides, spent five months last season exploring the canyons of Colorado for relics of the "Ancient People," who made their homes of stone far up the heights of almost inaccessible cliffs. Battle Mountain seems to have been the site of a city. These primeval buildings will be reproduced as they exist, and in number to cover two hundred square feet. A room is generally circular, about twenty-two feet in diameter, with a stone seat running around it, and with a cemented hole in the middle of the stone floor for a fire-place, a low wall behind it serving as flue. The primeval housekeeper seems to have loved closets too, for they are found in numbers cut in the stone sides and closed with fitted stones. The doors are stone slabs. All the masonry is straight and strong without attempt at ornament, but they made beautiful stucco from the many-colored sandstone of the cliffs. Mummies are found in sealed rooms, better preserved than the mummies of Egypt. This is probably due to the dryness of the atmosphere. The most perfect of the bodies is that of a woman of medium weight, of fine light hair—no specimen of coarse or black hair was found—and small hands and feet which indicate a hereditary idle aristocracy. Mr. Smith believes that the cliff-dwellers were a numerous race. He says that for miles in that region it is impossible to fly an arrow from one group of houses without hitting another. Burial wrappings are found of fine weave, and some pottery is of handsome shape and graceful design. Many unsuccessful attempts have been made to sprout seeds found in the jars beside the dead. This would seem to point to a race older than the mummified Egyptians, as wheat found in the oldest of their mummy cases grows readily.

"Our folks" will be interested in Mrs. Hart's where the cottages represent the varying industries of different counties. County Dublin displays rare old linens and embroideries in design taken from Celtic manuscripts, also bog oak carving. The famous Kerry cow will be there too, with a model dairy. Limerick has beautiful specimens of lace and the process of making; marble-carving, wood-carving and glass-staining "come from Cork." To us who heard or read Mrs. Hart's interesting lecture in this city a few weeks ago, county Donegal, with its homespuns, will be the greatest attraction in miniature Ireland.

GEORGE MEREDITH'S HEROINES.

BY J. O. G. LITTLE.

Ten years ago George Meredith's novels were, so far as the general reader was concerned, practically unknown, certainly unread. To-day he occupies a foremost, if not the foremost place among contemporary English writers. This sudden accession to Meredith's popularity becomes all the more significant, when it is observed that the distinguishing characteristic of his writings lies in his treatment of his heroines and in the ideal of womanhood thereby displayed.

Briefly it may be said of him that he is a realist, but a realist in the best sense of that much-abused word; a realist in the sense that he appeals to the truth, the reality of things. Of the conventional, of that thoughtless habit of acquiescence in the established order, which has condemned the less courageous of soul among women to live in an intellectual zenana, Meredith is the avowed satirist. Better, he seems to cry, better that a woman should forge for herself her own character from the iron of experience, even though the iron bruise her in the process, than that she should remain cramped by "the infinite grossness of the demand for infinite purity, spotless bloom." For this very demand for "innocence"—an immaculate innocence, be it understood, not nobly militant against the evil in the world, but blankly and passively ignorant of it, which many an English mother in the innocence of her heart takes as the goal of her daughter's "education"—arises not from any high ideal of women, but from what Meredith calls "a voracious, æsthetic gluttony, craving them insatiably through all the tenses, with shrieks of the lamentable letter I."

"The Egoist," the novel from which the sentence just cited comes, is preëminently Meredith's typical book, and one which few men can read without many twinges of conscience. Through the two personalities of Sir Willoughby Patterne and Clara Middleton, he draws into a single focus all the questions at issue at the present day between men and women. Sir Willoughby is a baronet, rich, intelligent, and sincerely in love with Clara. But love with Sir Willoughby is something exclusive, an égoisme à deux, deriving a false sense of poetic isolation by disdainfully fencing itself off from the world. This, Clara at first feels, rather than knows to be a false sentiment; for with her (as with so many women) it is only through the struggle for freedom that her brain becomes awakened. She feels that marriage means absorption into the vortex of Sir Willoughby's egoism; to be allowed to see the world only through his eyes; to submit, in short, not merely to the sacrifice of her own personality but to the annihilation of it. They are already engaged—a relation which in England is only a little less binding than actual marriage—when she becomes aware of the situation, and the greater part of the story is the account of her efforts, in the face of social prejudice, to reëstablish her own freedom, and get out once more into the fresh air of reality, in which, of course, she is eventually successful.

The plot is slender enough; it is rather the swift, incisive utterance of the needs of a woman's soul and the defects in a man's way of meeting them, that create the main interest of the story and give Meredith a claim to be the historian of the struggle between the old Adam and the new Eve. "She would not burn the world for him," he writes satirically in the scene where Clara first realizes what her betrothed means by marriage—"she would not, though a purer poetry is little imaginable, reduce herself to ashes, or incense, or essence, in honor of him, and so literally become the man she was to marry. She preferred to be herself, with the egoism of women! She said: "I must be myself to be of any value to you, Willoughby."

Nor does Clara Middleton stand alone among Meredith's heroines, for are there not Diana, Vittoria, Rhoda Fleming, each in their way claiming the same right "to be themselves"? "Who can think," says Diana somewhere, "without thinking hopefully," and this, in a single sentence, is Meredith's ideal of women, which in the thirteen volumes he has written, he holds up before English society. He would have mankind recognize for every woman the right to be herself, to give her reason free play, in the firm conviction that reason, as well as righteousness "is justified of her children."

And behind this ideal of intellectual optimism stands dimly a greater, which finds its clearest expression in Meredith's poetry,—for Meredith is a poet, as well as a novelist. In love, as an intellectual passion, finding its poetry not through the selfish exclusion of the world of pure reality, but through the cheerful acceptance and transfiguration of that reality by the strength of love's own inspiration, Meredith finds the ultimate solution of the old misunderstanding. For love, he would tell us, should be an intelligent and active sympathy, not a sentimental exactiveness; and in the thought of it as thus conceived, he finds the promise of a freer social atmosphere, a wider spiritual horizon of man by men and woman by women, realizing their true selves in a life lived according to the accreditable light of reason.

Yet lowly are morning's pure gray eyes."

MRS. NASBY VISITS BETHESDA MISSION.

It was nigh onto two year sence I had been in Shekawgo, and I told Jeems Allen ef he'd git me a pass, he needn't mind about no other Christmas present for me.

Jane wus delighted—she's always so willin' to have Jeems Allen git me passes! You know he's a railroad conductor. Phebe writ me to come right along. She never forgits how I stood by her when Jack was drinkin'. He don't nuther.

I never seen nothin' ekal to it! In the fifty-nine year o' my life I havn't saw so much Christmas all put together as there wus in Shekawgo this winter. Ef I should try to tell you about it all, the upshot would be as it used to wus, when Petroleum made New Year's calls in old Kintucky, and took a different kind o' drink in every house. So I'm going to just tell you about the thing I sot most store by. That wus the holiday doin's at Bethesda Mission that the Shekawgo Central W. C. T. U. keeps up. They had three spells at it. Fust wus Christmas eve. Phebe said some orriters from the Columbian School of Oratory wus comin' that night. Jack 'lowed 'twould be horrid, sure. Phebe hushed him up in her peacafyin' way, but in my own mind I sided in with Jack. I hev noticed about myself that at such times I am mor'n likely to side in with the man, but I never say nothin'. If you do, the chances air both on 'em'll turn ag'in ye. Men and their wives is slipprier to manage than either one on 'em alone. They enjoy fightin' between theirselves, but they don't want nobody else to git inside the ring.

Wall, we went to the mission and bimeby in they come, a passel of youngsters. The girls' cheeks was a glowin' and their eyes danced jigs every minit, no matter how demure and preachified they tried to be. I nudged Jack and told him it was jes' like puttin' a bankwet in site of the Russian suffrers and havin' it staked off with bayonets. They could see the roast pig and smell the cabbage and fried onions, but they couldn't have none. Jack said he didn't know, and then I knew Phebe had got him thinkin' 'twus all right. One of the girls told how a church wus built somewhere out west, and it "took" to beet all. Then another sung, "Jesus, Lover of my Soul," and I declare it wus the purtiest love song you ever heerd. A young man disclaimed something and one of the other girls sung "While Shepherds Watched Their Flocks." Where on airth the minx learned that, I'd like to know. I hain't heerd it these forty year. Why, it broke the meetin' all down. Old gray-headed men told how their mother used to sing that at Christmas time. Then the leader made a soft little speech like, and seven men riz up for prayers. I hain't seen so many folks want to be prayed for in the two year sence I wus at that mission before. They've been comin' right along this month and they look as if they do considerable prayin' for theirselves now.

The second spell was New Year's eve. There was more young folks than ever that night, and they had the little room behind the platform in an awful litter with their turkey and oranges and grapes and cake, and lots of bread and butter and ham. The house was crowded. There's grate drawin' power in turkey. The men who I'd seen at the mission right along didn't seem to eat as well as the strangers. I asked one of 'em, a peart lookin' feller, "Does it take away yer appytite to come here reg'lar?" "Oh, no," ses he, "but you see we don't spend our money fer booze and so we hed good suppers at home about two hours ago. We jest eat a little here to be sociable." I see then how it wus. The young folks this time that gave the entertainment wus from Plymouth church. A beautiful lot they were, and such good cookin'! The singin' wus lovely, too. There wus sole in it. And underneath, like the roll of the sea under a sailin' vessel, wus the notes of the organ. 'Peared like the voices played on the swell of that organ as porpuses sport on the white caps off Hatteras. I used to have the name of bein' the best treble singer in Pike county, and I hain't lost my ear yit, if my voice is cracked. I went up to the player, Miss McClellan (I asked her if she was kin to the Gineral, and she said she s'posed she wus; Petroleum and the Gineral wus grate friends, so I felt acquainted with her right off) and ses I, "Whare did you git this instrument? It's bootiful." "This," ses she, "is a Christmas gift to Bethesda Mission from the Chicago Cottage Organ Company." Ses I, "They ought to change their names to Royal Palace Organ Company. We have ben talkin' about gittin' an organ in the church at the Cross Roads fer the last five years, and as soon as our minds is made up I shall have 'em git it of that company. Folks that make Christmas presents like this ought to git trade."

I am forgettin' to tell you the best of it, and that's about the meetin' after the turkey, New Year's night. Forty-seven of 'em signed the pledge after the speech, and then they set down for a prayer-meetin', and 'twas half-past twelve, 1893, before we started fer home. A good number of 'em made a splendid start and have been coming to the meetin's ever sence. One of the best things about that meetin' wus the testimony of the men who started there one, two, and some of 'em three and four years ago. Jack says ef Keeley hed cured them men the hull United States and Great Britain'd have heerd on't, and he beleeves from what he sees of both, and Jack's where he sees both, that more men is truly and lastingly "cured" in that one mission than in any gold cure. When I asked him why on airth folks don't believe more in it then, he said, "The Lord Jesus Christ don't advertise!" That's what Jack said, and I'm tellin' ye of it. Ye kin take it fer what it's wuth.

The last spell wus at the end of the week of prayer when the young folks come from the Blue Island church with a supper. I reckon the best prayin' them dear children did wus done that night in feedin' the hungry, and tellin' 'em where ther's bread enough and to spare. Besides, they have gathered up and sent in over five hundred garments to clothe the poor. That will go into their own weddin' garments when they come to the marriage of the King's Son.

In all these doin's there was jest one person who disturbed the meetin'. He wus there the night of the biggest supper, and acted so that they had to put him out. I had set down in the back end of the room when it happened, and a man beside me said: "That feller's full." Ses I, "You're right he is! I've ben watchin' him drink seven cups of coffee and the turkey and stuff that went with 'em. I alwus knowd a man could eat enough to have a bad effect on him, but I never seen it work afore jest as it did that night.

OPEN MID-DAY MEETINGS IN WILLARD HALL.

BY A WAYFARER.

[Last week a Boston traveler attended a noon-day meeting in Willard Hall. He has been a sort of free lance, a baptized liberalist. The meeting "struck him through" into prose and verse, and he sends THE UNION SIGNAL the following heart testimony to the power of truth as it is witnessed daily in the Temple.—EDS.]

THE TEMPLE HALL.

Near the heart of the great lakeside city is a monumental building that marks the united interest of devoted women, far and near, for the cause of temperance and practical Christian aid.

Each day (as a "wayfarer" has been pleased to find) a leader of note directs and brings out the most timely word and help for present needs. During last week one among the most earnest workers in this cause (Dr. Henry A. Delano) pointed out in a few minutes' talk some of the needs now of hearty and coöperative, consecrated Christian work.

Taking up the thought that Christ came down to do the will of His Father, the speaker made a direct plea for the harmony and singleness of Christian purpose aside from church names or creeds. He spoke in the name and spirit of our common leader, the Christ of truth and righteousness. While men and women are daily struggling for their material needs, and contending with the evils and dissipations of life, the ever-willing giver stands ready to supply the higher needs and help restore from ways of sin.

These lines of thought, amplified and pointed, found ready response in songs of gracious invitation, prayers of fervent faith, and touching testimony of the power of Christ to save through willing trust and contrite obedience.

Who, in forecast, can measure the outcome for good of such united devotion to duty and faithful continuance in the cause here represented? How many heavy-laden, hopeless almost, in the gropings of their own false way and struggles downward, may find a living word of cheer, the hand that grasps in sympathetic kindness, and points in clearest faith, onward, upward!

May it ever be, that the resplendent glow of light and beauty within these walls will symbolize the warm glow of Love, the free touch of Truth, making this a veritable Temple for the indwelling of the Lord of Light and Life —where He may daily whisper:

PEACE UNTO THEE.

Weary-worn, doubting hearts,
Pierced oft by cruel darts,
Souls bound by slavish arts,
Seek ye the Lord!

Led in forbidden ways,
Fed on the greed of gain,
Down in the mire of sin—
Arise, be free!

Not in thy strength alone
Canst thou the evil one
Overcome—nor atone
For every wrong.

One there is—friend of man,
Seeks to save, all hath done,
Shown the way, therein won
Freedom for thee!

By touch of word, "Be still!"
Stormy waves quick obey,
Bear Him on; at His will Calm into peace!

Tempest tossed, so may we Walk by faith, hear within,
The silent voice saying,
"Follow thou me!"
"Peace unto thee!"

SOUTH CAROLINA PROHIBITION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—From the heights of answered prayer I write the joyful news, that we have prohibition in South Carolina. No bitter campaign or roaring of cannon heralded the triumph of the righteous law, but after the 1st of July there will not be an open saloon in the state. The New York Tribune says, "If the South Carolina legislature had tried, it could not have framed a more iron-clad prohibition law." Of course all Prohibitionists are not agreed as to its merits, and think another way would have been better. In other words, their doxy is the only orthodoxy; every other is heterodoxy. But we W. C. T. U. are just as grateful and rejoicing as possible; and if the Evans Bill is carried out, we shall be satisfied.

The act provides that after July 1 the manufacture, sale, barter or exchange, or the keeping and offering for sale, barter or exchange of any spirituous, malt, vinous, fermented or other intoxicating liquors, or any compound or mixture thereof shall be unlawful. The machinery for the enforcement of the law is sweeping, and the penalties for violation extreme.

The payment of a United States tax, or the possession of liquor in sufficient quantity to indicate an intention to sell, is to be regarded as sufficient evidence for conviction, and upon conviction the first offense shall be punished by a fine of not less than one hundred dollars, and imprisonment in the county jails for not less than ninety days nor more than one year.

All places where intoxicating liquors are sold, bartered or given away in violation of this act, or where persons are permitted to resort for the purpose of drinking intoxicating liquors as a beverage, are declared to be common nuisances, and upon the judgment of a court or judge having jurisdiction, being so declared, the sheriff, his deputy or any constable of the county or city where the nuisance is located, shall shut up and take possession of all the liquor found on the premises, with all signs, screens, bars, bottles, glasses and all other property used in maintaining the nuisance, and after judgment against the defendant, be confiscated to the state, and the owner fined or imprisoned.

No prohibition bill has ever yet been framed to which objections were not urged. "We must have liquor for the sacrament," says a good churchman, who has not sufficiently studied Leviticus 10: 9 and 10, but notwithstanding our Saviour himself called the contents of the cup "the fruit of the vine," persists in having the mixed and burning fluid at the Lord's table, hence saloons are necessary to them. Others claim, "There is no substitute for liquor in some diseases." All these objections are met and overcome. The purest and best liquor, which has been tested by the first chemist in the state, can be procured from officers elected as dispensers, to supply liquor in all necessary cases, on no conditions to a minor or habitual drunkard. The purchaser will be required to prepare a written certificate, containing name, age and residence, the kind of liquor purchased and for what purpose. These certificates will be entered in a book, which will always be kept open for inspection. There is a severe penalty prescribed for any false statement made.

The dispensers must be men of known sober habits, of good character, and must give a bond of $10,000 for the faithful performance of their duties. The work of the state dispenser is overlooked by a state board of control, composed of the governor, attorney-general and comptroller-general, whose voice is supreme.

The amount of liquor sold is published quarterly, also to whom sold. Any railroad or express company carrying any packages without the state dispenser's seal and certificate will be prosecuted. The liquor can only be sold in sealed and stamped packages, containing not less than half a pint, which must not be opened on the premises. The liquor men and their allies are bitterly opposing, and everything that money and superhuman effort can do will be done to prevent the enforcement of the laws.

The Hon. John Gary Evans, the youthful senator who framed the bill, is the son of Gen. N. G. Evans, who was a graduate of West Point, and quite distinguished himself both in the United States and Confederate states armies. Senator Evans inherits pluck and courage from both sides of his family. His mother is the sister of Gen. Mart Gary, known as the "bravest of the brave" in the Confederate service. He is not thirty years old, and is a knight sans peur et sans reproche. An intelligent, cultivated gentleman, a lawyer by profession, it is not likely he framed a bill which can be set aside for its unconstitutionality, nor that he will submit to having it defied.

Nine years ago I went to Edgefield to visit my life-long friend, his mother, Mrs. Evans, and if possible to organize a W. C. T. U. I say if possible, for Edgefield was the headquarters for rum and riot. I found the venerable Dr. Walker of the Episcopal Church, my father's friend, ready to give every assistance in his power. John Gary Evans, then a student of law, walked with me to the platform, where I was introduced to a packed audience by Dr. Walker. I have never addressed a more enthusiastic assembly, and as soon as I took my seat Mr. Evans came to the platform and asked all who were in favor of closing the bar-rooms to adjourn to his office to consult. The election to decide whether they should have bar-rooms was near at hand. I talked day and night to whites and colored. The morning of the election, as I was leaving for an appointment in another city, an ex-governor on the train said: "Mrs. Chapin, is it possible you entertain the slightest thought that Edgefield will go dry?"

"I certainly do."

"O woman, great is thy faith," he replied. I begged him to add the concluding part of the verse. He declined, saying, laughingly, "I am too old to give up my night-cap."

That evening as I sat at supper table, a messenger came from the telegraph office saying I was wanted there. The ladies went with me, and the telegram read: "'Glory to God in the highest!' Edgefield has gone dry"—sent by Rev. Dr. Walker, blessed old saint. "It is the happiest new year I have passed in years," says the wife of "a drinking gentleman"; "there is a rift in the cloud which hung over me in the fact that I had six boys to raise, with an open bar-room at every corner of the street." Our victory has come to us through the Democrats. Honor to whom honor is due. S. F. CHAPIN.

INTERESTS OF SOUTH AFRICA.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Oftener than ever before in the past six months have I quoted these lines from the late Lord Tennyson:

"Yet I doubt not through the ages, one increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of men are widen'd by the process of the suns."

As I have seen the growth of purpose and the widening thought of this modern marvel, the W. W. C. T. U., gratitude that I am permitted here to help a little takes the place of all other feeling.

The days were so full of interest through all the long journey with the four women, each so "fitted for her sphere," who came with me that I did not try to imagine what we should discover in South Africa. My traveling companions were, Miss Campbell, for eleven years teacher in the Huguenot Seminary for young ladies at Wellington, and our right worthy representative to the Boston convention whom we called "our general;" Mrs. Allen—coming out to see her sister, Miss Furgason, principal of the seminary, a sweet, Christian mother, has done more than can be counted to make the school and its branches centers of influence in South Africa; Miss Dudley, the Oberlin B. A., also teacher at Wellington, who had seen some of the beauties of the W. C. T. U. in the United States, but apparently more after leaving, for she joined the Wellington union at the first regular meeting after our arrival; and by no means least, Miss Louisiana Durant, of Washington, D. C., a strong, brave, helpful young life, come "out for to see" some of the great world and its wonders. Two days before we landed at Grenock, Miss Campbell discovered Miss Hays, teacher of mathematics at Wellesley, who had not put on "the white ribbon" till she found she was so glad to see those worn by our party.

In London we were in the same house with Mrs. Gulick, visited Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Hood, and there met Miss Pash, who has just gone out to India for the British W. W. C. T. U. On board the Athenian we met Mr. and Mrs. Maynard, both strong temperance workers. Mr. Maynard is one of the directors of the steamship line, and the only gentleman on board who was an "abstainer," except the captain. We had together some very delightful Bible readings the last two weeks out. Sometimes one or two of the other lady passengers would join us, but strange to say, most of the people did not seem to care for what was the best part of our day.

July 29th dawned over Cape Town with a gray mist falling, but we forgot it in the sunny greetings of Miss Furgason and Mrs. Ridell, of Wellington, Mrs. Cleghorn, president of Cape Town W. C. T. U., Mrs. Drouillard, our colonial superintendent of legislation, who is American born, with a beautiful bouquet for me from the Colonial president, and two representatives of the Mobray Y. W. C. T. U., bearing sweet violets with white ribbon streamers and the blessed assurance The Lord shall be thine everlasting light.

It was dark when we reached "Wellington, my Wellington," and I have a sort of confusion of ideas as to who came and who stayed. One, however, stands out clear and vivid in my mind from that day to this—"my beloved relative," Miss Mary B. Palmer, whom we all think is like our valiant Mrs. Nichols. She has the same sort of pretty, crinkled, fair hair and the same sort of strong, independent character and carriage, modified by that perfect bearing known as "ladylike"; our Miss Palmer, summed up, is a "balm-of-consolation" woman, looking always as if she had just a message from an angel, and was going quietly off to take it to some one else.

There were two "cape carts" filled, and the seminary was brightly illuminated as we drove to the door between two lines of a hundred and fifty young ladies, singing "Welcome, Welcome, to our Friends from Over the Sea." We passed in under the Star-spangled Banner and the Union Jack draped with wide white bows and streamers. Miss Pride had driven over from The Paarl, with all her teachers who are true white-ribboners. I did not really know much of this beautiful, modest, young woman, who might have earned the sobriquet of "Miss Humility," till the annual meeting, where she blossomed out grandly; she is not only the Pride of the Paarl, but of the W. C. T. U. of South Africa.

The Y. W. C. T. U., with its two hundred members, is fast becoming a social power. Miss Cummings, prompt and practical, edits the organ of the Y Branch, a quarterly, called Y's and Otherwise, which is ten cents per number on your side of the Atlantic. A fine Y was organized at Port Elizabeth during the annual meeting in October.

When I came to the Colony there were eight W. C. T. unions, not including Woodstock, which has never become auxiliary to the Colonial union, and nine Y unions. The following week I accompanied Miss Cummings to Cape Town, where she organized eleven young ladies into a society. I then visited all the Y and W. C. T. unions except one, which is so far away I have not yet reached it. I have been able to organize five additional unions, three bands of Young Crusaders, and in two places names are being taken for a Y. I have also spoken in several towns where the Good Templars are well organized, and do not see the advisability at present of forming another society. Everywhere I have been most kindly and hospitably received, and the work I represent has received thoughtful attention. Much of the strength of the I. O. G. T. is due to the efforts of Mr. Theo. Schreiner, his sister, Mrs. Lewes, and their niece, Mrs. Stewart.

In the Western Province the "great vine growing district," through their influence hundreds of wine farmers are studying the problem of exporting grapes in their natural state, or turning them into jam and jelly rather than into wine and brandy. Many of these are Christian men, who are only beginning to doubt their right to make intoxicating drink. It may seem that this is slow work, but it is a wonder of accomplishment in a country where to visit thirty towns and deliver ninety-two addresses, I have had to travel, by rail and post cart, two hundred and eighty-six hours.

Three years ago Miss Pride, whom Miss Willard had appointed Provisional president, met five ladies in Cape Town to elect Colonial officers. Last October fifty delegates were sent from seventeen unions. Very neat and complete programs were issued weeks before, and every detail carefully planned by the general officers and local committee. A great loss was by the illness of Miss Cummings, who after traveling nearly forty-eight hours to be present, found herself on the opening morning the victim of measles. The local press gave ample room for reports. One "innovation" was successfully accomplished, that of holding Sabbath services. The Juvenile department was instituted and plans made for a literature depot. All the old officers were reëlected, Miss Pride, Paarl, president; Miss V. Blerk, Paarl, corresponding secretary; Miss Geard, Port Elizabeth, recording secretary; and Miss Bliss, Wellington, treasurer, besides, Miss Campbell was elected general vice-president. The World's constitution was adopted after quite a lengthy discussion, with the exception of the clause relating to representation on the World's Executive committee, the meaning of which, it is claimed, is obscure, notwithstanding Miss Campbell's declaration that the "members of the committee for drawing up the constitution were all active or ex-schoolmarms."

The local unions now existing are thoroughly well organized; there is a strong bond of unity between them and the general organization, and an unqualified admiration of the working of the W. W. C. T. U.; there is a deep spiritual power going out from the Colonial executive committee that cannot be resisted; and there is remarkable growth of sentiment and practical work in the purity department since the visit of Dr. Bushnell and Mrs. Andrew.

1. The great want is temperance literature adapted to the needs of the people. We must have literature; hundreds of thousands of pages of it. Much of it will have to be prepared and printed here, and we must have funds to do it.

2. The Electoral Circles should be organized and hold rallies, all day conferences, and outdoor meetings, with good music and speeches.

3. The objection that Colonial gentlemen and ladies have to speaking in public must be overcome.

4. Juvenile work must be put on a more instructive and systematic basis.

In these things the W. C. T. U. of Cape Colony is a unit, and upon the great principles of the W. W. C. T. U. it is prepared to live and die.

GOD'S CONDEMNATION FOR LACK OF FAITH.

And the men, which Moses sent to search the land, who returned, and made all the congregation to murmur against him, by bringing up a slander upon the land, even those men that did bring up the evil report upon the land, died by the plague before the Lord.—Num. 14:36, 37.

There are slanders abroad in regard to the Temple. An evil report has gone out and those who are weak in faith are ready to take up the reproach and believe it. They see not the mighty hand of God in the perfecting of the work thus far, in giving us such a magnificent building, so well adapted to our work, at such a notable time, in such a notable city. Its very beauty will make it the cynosure of every eye that visits the World's Fair city this year. It will cause an arrest of thought and attract more attention to our work than anything we have done since the Crusade. The first thought will be: What a gigantic evil the liquor traffic must be when sufficient interest could be aroused on the subject to enable the W. C. T. U. to erect such a magnificent building. The next thought will be: These women are dead in earnest, they have come to stay; their cause, "the protection of the home" is righteous and we must aid them. These slanderers of the Temple say in face of the fact that the trustees now hold for the W. C. T. U., the controlling interest of the stock, and also the self-evident fact that the Temple as a business enterprise is a great success, that the W. C. T. U. will never own it and will never be able to pay for it. We never expected they would pay for it except in part, but those friendly to the cause are legion and God will put it into their hearts to pay for it. So let our timid and fearful sisters take heart; don't mind the slanderous and evil reports that you may hear, no matter from what high source they come. God is the same yesterday, today and forever, as He was with His people of old. He will be with us. Woe unto those who put their puny strength against His mighty arm and say, He is not able to deliver. He will deliver with a strong arm and a mighty power and the entire indebtedness on the Temple will be paid and that speedily. The plans of our brother, Rev. Watson Tranter—whom God has sent to be our helper in the great work of paying for the Temple—are maturing most hopefully. Let the faithful stand and see the salvation of the Lord.

Mr. Henry M. Sherwood, Chicago, sends $100 to show his great sympathy in the Temple work; he desires his wife's name to be placed upon a tablet. Mrs. Emilie D. Martin, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, one of the faithful white-ribboners who never doubted the success of the Temple, sends her check for $100; her noble husband sent $100 last year. Mrs. Lydia M. Johnson, Farmer City, Illinois, sends her check for $200. She desires the name of her husband and self placed upon a tablet. Her husband, Elias Johnson, passed to his glorious reward in June, 1890; he was a notable Prohibitionist and voted the first prohibition ticket ever placed before the people. By all means such men's names should glow with the luster of their deeds on the panels of Willard Hall. The following personal gifts, although small, come from hearts just as loving and generous as those noted above:

Mrs. F. M. Jervis, Rose Hill, Iowa, sends $3.65 from her mite-box; she writes, "You must not think that money is plenty with me, as I earned this by selling eggs, and am wearing the same old bonnet and dress; but this terrible liquor traffic must be expelled from the land." Mrs. A. B. Keyes, Moline, Ill., an old Crusader, sends $5. She says: "I have helped before with a mite-box and only wish I could do a great deal more for this monument of woman's self-denial and perseverance." Mrs. Rev. W. W. Brown, Sheldon, Ia., sends $5—the proceeds of selling "The State Hymn," of Iowa composed by herself. Mrs. M. J. Maynard, Tullahoma, Tenn., started out to give the Temple one hundred dollars, but reverses came and being unable to do so, she sends $5; she says: "$3.65 is from my mite-box, the balance is from selling flowers. I never sold a plant until I wanted to make money for the Temple. I sent some last year made in the same way. I will try and fill the mite-box again." This noble woman has now sent $30. Mary Pearson (residence not given) sends $5; she writes: "I am glad through the kindness of friends I can send this much; a little boy gave me more according to his ability than any one else. How I wish I could multiply the five by hundreds but I am poor and can do but little." Miss Susan C. O'Brien sends $2.52; "fifty-two cents," she writes, "is my birthday offering." I wonder what the amount would be if all the white-ribboners would go and do likewise. Mrs. Kellogg, Grand Rapids, Mich., sends $2 to have the names of her two grandsons, Orson M. and Frank M. Kellogg, placed in the Michigan record book.

Mrs. Marion H. Dunham, Iowa's state president, writes: "I send $50 for Des Moines county union tablet, and hope it will not be long before the rest is paid." Charlestown, Mass., Y's and Morristown, N. J., Y's, both are raising $100 and have lately sent installments. Why don't more of the Y's do the same thing? Normal School Y's, Millersville, Pa., Oil City, Pa., Y's, Milton Junction, Ia., Y's, Caledonia, Minn., Y's—the above Y unions have all sent money lately, but not on hundred dollar pledges.

A two-cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, the Temple, Chicago, will secure a mite-box, descriptive card and bulletin; remember, all who fill a mite box ($3.65) before next April will receive a photographic group consisting of Lady Henry Somerset, Miss Willard and the founder of the Temple. All drafts should be made out in the name of Miss Esther Pugh. All matters pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Carse.

"WORD FROM NATURE."

BY CARDINAL J. H. NEWMAN.

Weep not for me;
Be blithe as wont, nor tinge with gloom
The stream of love that circles home,
Light hearts and free!
Joy in the gifts Heaven's bounty sends,
Nor miss my face, dear friends.

I still am near,
Watching the smiles I prized on earth,
Your converse mild, your blameless mirth;
Now, too, I hear
Of whispered sounds the tale complete,
Low prayers and musings sweet!

A sea before
The Throne is spread; its pure, still glass
Pictures all earth-scenes as they pass;
We, on its shore
Share in the bosom of our rest
God's knowledge, and are blest!

[In the following tender lines the great Cardinal who wrote "Lead, kindly Light," speaks in the name of a departed saint, and surely the words are most blessed and consoling. The poem was sent to Miss Willard in view of her recent loss, and they will comfort tens of thousands, as they have her.]

WHICH LOVED BEST?

'A True Temperance Story.

BY CLARA SMITH COLTON.

(Concluded.)

"The next year Stanley was deep in politics, working for a higher office. During the following four years he rose rapidly. Having been elected by a constituency, part of whom were allied to the saloon interests he soon found he could not afford to offend them; that he must even stand treat and give elaborate wine suppers if he wished to win. He began to be worn out with overwork and the excitement of campaigns. Then the doctor prescribed for him 'ale or a good brand of lager beer.'

"No one thought of calling Stanley a drinking man; but each time that he came back from the capital we noticed his rapid increase in flesh and the dark, reddish cast of his formerly fair face, and the heavy look of the clear blue eyes that we used to admire. Louise's mother told me that when Stanley was overworked and had to use stimulants as she mildly put it, he was very exacting and fault finding and absurdly jealous of Louise, whose excitable, intense nature resented it fiercely. The doctor said:

"'You have a very nervous temperament, Mrs. Thornton. You must avoid all exciting emotions or experiences.'

"Oh, physician! You who prescribe ale, wine and lager beer as necessary stimulants for the husband, you tell the wife to avoid exciting emotions.

"That same year the blue-eyed baby boy came—a lovely child, every one said, and the image of his father. But when he was about six months old a peculiar trait began to develop. He showed a strange aversion to his father; an actual terror which could not be overcome, but manifested itself in hysterical sobbing, dilated eyes and trembling clinging to his mother at the mere sight of his father. I was present during one of his spasms of fright. I never saw a baby's face so pitifully like a grown person's—his father's features, his mother's expression; the quick throwing out of the tiny hands, then the clasping them tightly together. This was his mother's gesture when excited. I remembered it six years before when beautiful Louise said: 'Don't let Ruth be so cruel as to cast off Stanley for that strict temperance whim of hers!'

"Stanley was nearly frantic over the condition of his little son in whom his affection and ambition were deeply centered. He summoned the most skillful medical advice for his baby and wife; for Louise, poor girl, had fallen into a deep despondency, a quiet, unweeping grief that was pitiful to see. The doctors prescribed plenty of outdoor air and exercise.

"Louise would not trust her baby to a nurse. Day after day she would go with the little carriage to the pleasant woods back of their home for long, quiet walks or restful hours in the hammock. The physicians tried many ways of accustoming the little one to his father; but the strange fear only grew stronger.

"One morning the doctor thought best to force the child to his father's arms. It was a most heartrending scene, Louise's mother told me.

"That afternoon Louise stayed longer than usual in the grove. She had not returned at sunset. They went to call her. The hammock and the little carriage under the great oak tree were empty. They went further—on into the pasture beyond; and there they found her white shawl and baby's little blue cloak near an old well.

"When I saw Louise lying cold and still, with her baby boy clasped close in her arms, as they had found her, I said, 'Oh, that she had been as strong as Ruth!'

"After the sad death of his wife and child, Stanley plunged deeper than ever into the whirl of politics, and he cast off all restraint in the use of intoxicants. People said, 'Poor man! he drinks to drown his sorrow!' He is a prominent politician, but you would not recognize him as the refined, scholarly lawyer who began life so auspiciously.

"You ask me about Effie and Ruth? Ruth came forth strong from the depths of sorrow; for although she loved Stanley Thornton as she never could love any one again, she loved God and truth with a higher love. She entered heart and soul into work for temperance; and it seems as if the Angel of Pain has given an almost spiritual fire to her eloquent, logical words.

"Must I tell you of Effie, too? I had lost sight of her except to know that she led a gay life in the city where her husband, Mr. Chadwick, took her to his beautiful home. But this summer Louise's mother gave me a paper which she had received with a marked paragraph. It was headed, 'A Beautiful Girl Ruined by Strong Drink.'

"'A beautiful girl, once a welcome guest in the homes of prominent families, was to-day in the police courts of this city. She was the petted daughter of a well-known family, but the custom of serving wine in the house bred in her a taste for liquor, and in time, in spite of the efforts of her husband and friends, she became a drunkard. She had received a fine education and had unusual musical talent. As she became confirmed in the drink habit she was cast off, at last becoming the pianist in a low beer saloon and concert hall, where she was arrested last night for being implicated in a drunken row. She is only thirty, but all her girlish beauty is gone and she is completely wrecked.'"

. . . . . .

Such is the history of these three fair girls; and it is only one of many tragic, true stories; and the lesson is plain to other fair young girls and to mothers of sunny-hearted daughters. If a young man be not strong enough to hold firm the strictest principles of temperance, is he strong enough to hold safe in his keeping the life-happiness of a gentle, trusting girl?

"DRINK WINE AND DRINK IT LIKE A LADY."

BY E. T. SCOTT.

Sauntering leisurely along the street, a well dressed young lady passed me. She gave a peculiar call. It was answered by one about her own size and age. The two girls seated themselves on the edge of the porch and at once began an animated chit-chat and so loud as to be distinctly heard rods off. This is a part of what I was almost compelled to hear:

"Yes, we played cards with the gentlemen and drank a good deal of wine, and perhaps said and did things that we ought not to, but the folks needn't make such an awful fuss about it."

"Sh—!" warned her companion. "If my mother were to hear what you say it would be the last of my going out of this house after dark."

So long as men with rotten hearts are on the lookout for victims, and such careless ones present themselves as these girls apparently were, recruits will continue to swell the army of the "lost."

"We played cards and drank wine." When did they begin this habit of wine drinking, I wonder? Once when my field of labor in this gospel temperance work was in one of the interior towns of one of the Middle States, I met on the principal avenue a young woman, a former pupil in the Sunday-school in a distant village. A moment's conversation showed how the cruel vulture had done its ghoulish work. The spirit of the good Samaritan moved me. I prayed that I might be able to turn her wayward feet. The purity of blessed childhood's days and scenes, associations, sweet and sacred, hallowed memories, early playmates—all, all were presented in the brilliant color of hope and trust. A mist filled her eyes.

"Come, I'll take you home. In less than a day we will be there. How glad your parents will be to see you! Surely, you do not forget the love of father and mother, and you do want to see them again, don't you, Mary?"

Straightening herself up to her full height, her face white, her form rigid and strained, in a voice whose tone conveyed hate, mingled with utter despair, she answered: "Yes, I do remember them. They taught me to drink wine at the family board. I was told to drink it like a lady. Easily and quickly enough I learned to like it. I tried to drink it 'like a lady.' Under its influence the bottle drained, brain reeled; the world was torn from under my feet, the sky became all brass. To-day I am eating the ashes of the apples of the Dead Sea. There is nothing left worth living for. I can't fight against the odds much longer. Every hand pushes me nearer the bottom, then comes the end. Some day I must stand at the bar of God, and I tell you I shall be a true witness against those who taught me to 'drink wine like a lady.'"

Father, mother, what answer? For there will come a time when that question will be asked, and must be answered.

SPIRITUAL HEREDITY.

A Remedy to Prevent Spiritual Decline.

BY MARY D. BRADLEY.

"An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure." In the spiritual as much as in the physical life we are taught that the law of heredity rules. The call for a better spiritual constitution is plainly met by a faithful use of the prescription given by the "Great Physician":

"Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it. . . For all the promises of God in him are yea and in him Amen. . . The promises are to you and your children. . . I am the Lord thy God, showing mercy unto thousands of them who love me and keep my commandments. . . A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children."

"Who are these with thee? The children which God hath graciously given thy servant. . . And they (mothers) brought young children to Him. . . She (Hagar) lifted up her voice, and God heard the voice of the lad and said: 'Hagar, fear not. I will make of him a great nation.' . . By faith Abraham offered up Isaac, being fully persuaded that what He had promised He was able also to perform. . . In thee (Abraham) shall all the families of the earth be blessed. . . In Isaac shall thy seed be called, because thou hast obeyed my voice. . . By faith Jacob blessed the sons of Joseph. . . By faith Joseph when he died made mention of the departing of the Israelites. . . By faith Moses was hid of his parents. . . By faith Moses when he was come to years . . endured as seeing Him who is invisible."

"The woman (Samson's mother) told her husband, 'A man of God came unto me . . he said unto me . . the child shall be a Nazarite to God . . to the day of his death.' Then Manoah entreated the Lord and said, 'Oh, my Lord, teach us what we shall do unto the child. . . How shall we order the child, and how shall we do unto him?' And the angel of the Lord said, 'Of all that I said unto the woman let her beware.' . . And the child grew and the Lord blessed him, and the Spirit of the Lord began to move him. . . Ruth said, 'Thy people shall be my people and thy God my God.' . . And she bare a son . . they called his name Obed, he is the father of Jesse, the father of David . . I will raise unto David a Righteous Branch. . . I, Jesus, am the root and offspring of David . . and behold I am alive for evermore . . Hannah (Samuel's mother) said, 'For this child I prayed, and the Lord hath given me my petition. . . Therefore I have lent him to the Lord; as long as he liveth he shall be lent to the Lord.' And he (Samuel) worshiped the Lord there, Samuel ministered before the Lord, being a child."

A neglect of the remedy produces a contrary effect. "I, the Lord thy God, am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me. . . Correct thy son and he will give thee rest . . but a child left to himself bringeth his mother to shame. Now the sons of Eli, they knew not the Lord. . . His sons made themselves vile and he restrained them not. . . They hearkened not unto the voice of their father. . . Wherefore the sin of the young men was very great before the Lord. . . And his (Eli) daughter-in-law, Phineas' wife . . about the time of her death . . named the child Ichabod, saying, 'The glory has departed from Israel . . because of her father-in-law and her husband.'"

The promise follows the faithful parent into the new dispensation, under the new covenant: "I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel. . . I will put my laws into their minds and write them in their hearts, and all shall know me from the least to the greatest. . . There was in the days of Herod . . a priest named Zacharias . . and his wife, Elizabeth. They were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances blameless. They had no child. . While he executed the priest's office before God . . there appeared unto him an angel of the Lord. . . The angel said, 'Fear not, . . for thy prayer is heard; thy wife . . shall bear thee a son; thou shalt call his name John; thou shalt have joy and gladness and many shall rejoice at his birth; for he shall be great in the sight of the Lord, and shall drink neither wine nor strong drink, and shall be filled with the Holy Ghost. Many . . shall he turn to the Lord their God. He shall go before Him.' . . . And the child grew and waxed strong in spirit. And Jesus began to say: . . 'Verily I say unto you, among them that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist.' And Mary said, 'Behold the hand maid of the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word. . . Henceforth all generations shall call me blessed.' . . And she brought forth her first-born son . . and . . called his name Jesus. . . And Jesus increased in wisdom and stature and in favor with God and man; and he said, 'Wist ye not I must be about my Father's business?' . . And Jesus lifted up his eyes to heaven and said, 'Father, . . I have glorified thee on earth, I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do. . . It is finished.' . . And behold a voice out of the cloud which said, 'This is my beloved son in whom I am well pleased, hear ye him.'"

HYGIENIC HINTS.

"To Timothy, my dearly beloved son. . . I call to remembrance the unfeigned faith that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother, Lois, and thy mother, Eunice, and I am persuaded that in thee also; from a child thou hast known the holy Scriptures which are able to make thee wise unto salvation. . . Wherefore . . stir up the gift that is in thee. . . Hold fast the form of sound words. . . That good thing which was committed unto thee keep by the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in us. . . Flee youthful lusts. . . Continue thou in the things which thou hast learned. . . And finally . . Put on the whole armor of Christ. . . Be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus, and . . endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ. . . He that overcometh shall inherit all things; and I will be his God, and he shall be my son."

AUNT ABBIE'S ADVICE.

Never utter a word of slang,
Never shut the door with a bang.

Never say once that you "don't care,"
Never exaggerate, never swear.

Never lose your temper much;
Never a glass of liquor touch.

Never wickedly play the spy,
Never, oh, never tell a lie!

Never your parents disobey,
Never neglect at night to pray.

Remember these maxims
Through all the day.

A CHRISTMAS STORY—TOLD AFTERWARD.

BY ADA M. MELVILLE.

The New Year was not so very many days old when Uncle Jimmy Westhood landed "bag and baggage" in the town of Red Feather, on the Mississippi river. The family sleigh was waiting for him, but before he had time to get in and cover himself with the shaggy buffalo robes two pairs of loving arms were clasped tightly about his neck and two eager voices were crying:

"Oh, Uncle Jimmy! Say, Uncle Jimmy! You will, won't you, tell us a story to-night?"

The wind was blowing and the snow flying as it only can in Minnesota, and the besieged uncle was glad to promise anything so he might hide himself from the cold. In a few minutes he was settled in the comfortable sleigh, the dear niece and nephew were on either side of him and the gray horses were making fast time "up hill and down dale."

"You see," began little Helen, "father said you couldn't tell stories and that anyway you wouldn't want to, so we just said we'd make you, and now you will!" clapping her mittened hands so that the grays thought something was up and went even faster than before.

After supper—and what a supper it was!—the children begged for the story, and Uncle Jimmy had not a word to say, for hadn't he promised?

"The best story I know," said Uncle Jimmy, "is one about Christmas. It is a true one, but maybe you won't mind that."

"That's heaps better," answered Charlie. "It's only girls who like story stories."

"Just you wait till to-morrow," said his sister, "maybe you'll take that back." But she laughed when she said it, and Charlie was not badly scared. These two little people were very fond of one another.

"Do you remember my writing about being in Chicago?" began Uncle Jimmy.

"Oh, yes! Are you going to tell us about the White City by the Lake—the one you said you would?"

"Not this time. We left Chicago a week before Christmas, for it takes nearly a week to go from there to our home in Washington, and we wanted to be there in time for Christmas turkey."

"And weren't you?" gasped Charlie, to whom such a loss would have been dreadful.

"Charlie, you hush up," commanded Helen in her most grown-up voice. "Uncle is tellin, us."

"Everything went smoothly and we were thinking of Santa Claus and plum puddings when—what do you suppose?"

"Oh, what?"

"A great blizzard."

"Pshaw!" exclaimed Charlie in disgust. "And you couldn't go on?"

"Not a step. We were snowed in. But it might have been worse than it was so we determined we would not grumble. I won't stop to tell you the things we did to pass away the time, but go right on to my story.

"On Saturday morning we noticed a young man going about among the passengers, talking in whispers to the gentlemen, and the faces of all with whom he spoke grew very mysterious and very happy. At last he came to me.

"'We are planning to give the children on the train a little bit of Christmas,' he said, 'and we want all who will help to gather in the rear car.' Of course we all went, and after a great deal of fun over it an expedition was planned to explore the hills near by."

"What for?" asked niece and nephew in a breath.

"A Christmas tree, to be sure—that is the land of Christmas trees, you know. We had a great time, but at last we found a good tree, cut it down, dragged it to the train and got it in without a child seeing us.

"What were you going to put on it?"

"You'll see. There was a small village about a mile away, and this young man with the merry, kind heart persuaded half a dozen of us to go with him and see if we could find any trace of Santa Claus up there.

"We reached the village by a path through the woods, and frightened the man who kept the one small store almost out of his wits taking him so by storm. Our young leader must have been thinking pretty hard, for he seemed to know just how many boys and girls he had to provide for.

"When we had robbed the store of most of its Christmas treasures—candies and candles and cheap toys—and left the owner with a fuller till and lighter shelves, we tramped back through the snow, and spent the rest of the day dressing the tree. Some of us had little folks at home, and since we could not be with them at the happy season we were glad to help make others happy.

"When the tree was all trimmed we declared there ought to be a Santa Claus, and every one said it must be the young man who had planned it all. So we dressed him up in furs, dusted him over with snow, hung bells all about him, and giving him a big horn, sent him through the train.

"'Merry Christmas! Merry Christmas!' he shouted, tooting on his horn and shaking hands right and left.

"How the children laughed and clapped their hands. There was one little lame fellow who could not walk, and Mr. Santa Claus picked him up and carried him in his arms."

"My!" exclaimed Helen, "wish I'd been there!"

"Every one was invited to the Christmas tree in the rear car right after supper, and Santa Claus promised to be there himself and give each one a present.

"What a car full that was! Thirty children, some of them just learning to toddle, some well into their 'teens. The tree stood at the end of the car, and looked very handsome with the twinkling candles and gaily colored toys. Santa Claus stood by it and made a little speech. Then before the presents were distributed he said, 'Supposing we say "grace" just as if we were at home.' And all the children bowed their heads, while their big brother, as he had called himself, thanked the dear Father for all the good times and this good time right in the midst of snow and cold."

"Wasn't that nice?" whispered Helen, nestling closer to her uncle, while Charlie rubbed his brown eyes and said nothing.

"Some way or another Mr. Santa Claus had a list of the children's names, so he called them one by one and gave them the gift, telling them in a very funny way that as his reindeer were all in the snowdrifts and Santa Claus town so far away he could not give them all he wanted to, but next year, perhaps, he'd do better.

"But I must not forget to tell you about the lame boy. He seemed to be the only poor child among them all; but he was so bright-faced and kind that every one liked him. I wondered what Santa Claus would give him, for he could not run around and play like the others, he could not even sit up straight, and his hands were stiff and lame with rheumatism.

"'Every one had had their gifts except this one boy, but he looked as if he had not thought of himself at all. There were no more toys on the tree. Could Mr. Santa Claus have forgotten him?

"'Ou's fordotten Tarl,' exclaimed a little girl, and then Santa Claus laughed.

"'I think Carl has forgotten himself! But see here, children, I found one bundle in my pack that seemed nicer and fatter than the others, and I just wondered'—

"'Give it to Carl!' some one shouted, and then they all joined in, 'Give it to Carl! to Carl! Carl!'

"And Carl got it. What do you suppose was inside? A boy's pretty cap, a pair of warm mittens and a handsome picture-book. I think Mr. Santa Claus had meant them for some little lad in his own home, don't you?

"The evening closed with Christmas carols and a few short, merry speeches. Then the children proposed giving their candy share and share about to the conductors, brakemen, engineers and others employed on the train. This made others generous, a collection was taken up and the candy supplemented by something more substantial. And so ended our Christmas eve on board a train in a snowdrift."

"You never told us Mr. Santa Claus' name," said Charlie.

"I guess it must have been Mr. Greatheart," answered Helen, who had just been reading Pilgrim's Progress. "Anyhow, that's a good make-believe name for him, I think. Don't you think so, too?"

LITTLE FLAXEN HAIR—"Papa, it is raining."

PAPA (somewhat annoyed by work in hand)—"Well, let it rain."

LITTLE FLAXEN HAIR (timidly)—"I was going to."

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—Within the pages of THE UNION SIGNAL this week is another paper which contains an account of the life, death and work of Miss Mary Allen West who, before she went to Japan a year ago, used to write letters to the young white ribbon readers of the children's page, and sign them "Captain Mary."

What a pleasure it is to read of her helpful life, and I wonder how many of you will know enough of these queer people, the Japanese, to marvel at the welcome she received. You remember it is only a comparatively short time since heathen Japan opened its ports to the commerce of the world. The government has been hostile to the Christian religion and so it was very surprising that Mr. Sho Nemoto, a government employe, should have been permitted to leave his desk to attend the body of a Christian temperance missionary. God softened their hearts, and Miss West's work and death in Japan are among His instruments in overcoming King Alcohol.

The Japanese have many peculiarities which seem very strange to us. Reading and writing commence on the left hand side of the last page. The carpenter planes toward himself. The seamstress sews away from her. They sleep on the floor taking away the bedding in the day time. The front door occupies the whole back wall of the building. Hotel proprietors bend on their knees and forehead, and servants smile when corrected.

It is more entertaining than a story to read about these interesting people and I hope that many of our Cozy Cornerers will search their school and public libraries for books about the Japanese.

CIDER ESSAYS, CONCLUDED.

I believe cider to be intoxicating. My papa says he has seen lots of folks drunk on hard cider. It is made from the poorest kind of apples; they are first picked up in orchards then drawn to the cider mills to be ground and pressed into juice. They are put into a hopper, dirt, worms and all ground fine, then they are put into a press and pressed until the juice separates from the apples. then it is put into barrels and called cider. It is sweet when first made. After standing from four to six weeks it be comes intoxicating.

Lisbon, Mich. EVA FRAREY.

Only eight years old is this little writer.

I will write and tell you all I know about cider. I have never seen cider made, only I know it is made out of apples and that the apples are put through a large press called the cider press. When all the juice is squeezed out it is then put in large tubs and set aside till it is fermented, and then put in small barrels called kegs, and sent to all parts of the country. It is then drank by thousands of people and sometimes they drink so much they get intoxicated and do not know what they are doing.

OUR BILL OF FARE.

The memorial supplement for Miss Mary Allen West, our departed editor and World's W. C. T. U. missionary to Japan, is found within our pages this week. That it will be read and treasured by a host of readers and friends of the great cause, we doubt not. Our regular bill of fare contains its accustomed variety of pertinent editorials, articles, stories and poems by writers whose names are more or less familiar. These, with the news from the broad field of temperance endeavor and the attractive reading for the children, compose the menu for our genuine home protection paper.

SOUTH CAROLINA SALOONS MUST GO.

The Evans Dispensary law of South Carolina is causing much comment both in prohibition circles and in the ranks of "our friends, the enemy." The question with staunch Prohibitionists is, Should we support the law? Should we befriend any measure which practically makes terms with the rum power, and does not seek to wipe it out of existence? Standing as we do upon a rigid "no compromise" platform, can we consistently give moral and civic support to a legal enactment, however stringent, which seeks the "regulation" of the liquor traffic?

Some twelve years ago high license came to the front as a remedy for the increasing evils of the saloon business. It was first introduced in Nebraska through the celebrated Slocum bill. Most of the Prohibitionists and W. C. T. U. women of that state regarded the measure as a great improvement upon the old method of regulation, and worked hard to secure the passage of the bill. High license has proved a failure, as we all acknowledge, and it was so pronounced by its originator upon his death-bed. Nevertheless, by very reason of its failure to wound the evil power at which it aimed, the Slocum bill may still be regarded as a step toward ultimate prohibition, because it has forced the people to see its utter futility as a temperance measure.

Every new experiment on the regulation principle demonstrates the utter inability of that policy to keep the liquor traffic within bounds, and helps the temperance cause by making plainer the true source of the evil. The high license plan has taught the people many valuable lessons, and has done much to swell the prohibition ranks.

The new law of South Carolina seems to be truly a progressive step along this same educational line. The Evans bill is evidence of a growing sentiment against the present system of regulating the liquor traffic, and in favor of a radical change of management. It is evidence of the working of a leaven of remarkable vitality in the Palmetto state—a leaven which bids fair to raise it eventually to the prohibition standard. We see in this strong and healthful expression upon the saloon question from the South a breaking up of the old conservative lines, the outcome of which cannot but prove helpful to all phases of reform.

It is suggestive, to say the least, that this new plan for the solving of the liquor problem, coming with startling abruptness to Prohibitionists and liquor men alike, should coincide with the wholesome partisan agitation, and growing disrespect among the people for the party lash, which characterized the state election.

Truly, South Carolina seems to be undergoing the throes of a new birth. She led her southern sisters once in a great national upheaval which wrought unmeasured woe and caused estrangement in the united sisterhood of states. May she now lead off a second time in a movement which shall result in discomfiture to the common enemy and still further obliterate dividing lines—lines which are daily growing more indistinct, and which long ago became invisible to the W. C. T. U.

We suggest a few reasons why Prohibitionists should be friendly to the Dispensary bill as an educative measure. In the first place it declares that the "saloons must go." This of itself is an immense step forward. Take away the enormous profits of the retail trade and the backbone of the rum power is gone. It can then be more easily reached and controlled by the arm of the law. Under the present system of licensed saloons the entire business is largely operated by brewing and distilling syndicates. Two-thirds of all the licenses in our cities are paid by these syndicates. In some cases they employ a barkeeper to run the retail house for a stipulated share of the receipts; in other cases they pay the required license for parties who agree to rent and fit up their saloons—the amount to be remitted in installments. Again, in other instances, the brewing companies or trusts provide the license fee, the rent and the furnishings, and charge the retailer an extra amount per barrel until the capital thus advanced is back again in their own pockets.

As long as whisky and beer can be wholesaled at a profit of one hundred per cent, and as long as they can be retailed at a profit of from two to five hundred per cent, an unlimited number of men can be found who are willing and eager to go into the liquor business.

It is clearly to the interests of the great brewing and distilling syndicates to establish and strengthen the retailer—to stand behind him politically and financially. The retailer in turn has great incentive to build up his end of the business and to use the most effective means in his power to render the saloon attractive.

The Dispensary law strikes at the root of the evil by taking the business entirely out of the hands of the retailer and constituting the state the dispenser of all liquors. This position is in itself perilous, but the legalized man-trap will, after July 1, 1893, be a thing of the past in South Carolina. Every saloon, from the gilded palace, with its electric lights, marble floors, onyx counters, its elegant billiard tables and card rooms, costly bar furnishings and full dress waiters, down to the vile basement dive, the last step in the downward grade where Gambrinus deals the final blow, where he gives the finishing touch which sends his victim to perdition—all these places of temptation, all these open doors to vice and crime are closed by the provisions of the Dispensary law.

In the second place, the bill provides that all intoxicating beverages shall be taken from club rooms and cafés. No more wine parties or champagne suppers in magnificently appointed rooms for the entertainment of social and literary clubs or theater parties! Many a young man and woman trace their downfall to the sparkling glass taken (often under protest) for the sake of so-called sociability. Few young people are naturally depraved. "Vice is a monster of so frightful a mien" that it sometimes takes years of familiarity with its face to make them "first endure, then pity, then embrace." But hideous as it is, it possesses subtle allurements, and the fashionable club room with its extensive wine list is one of the most effective recruiting places of the rum power.

The Evans law enacts further that the liquor shall be sold in sealed packages of not less than one-half pint, which may not be unsealed by any county dispenser. The purchaser is required to specify in a written certificate containing his name, age and residence, what kind of liquor is wanted and for what purpose.

These provisions make obsolete the foolish and dangerous custom of social "treating" over the bar, against which it has been found impracticable, under license conditions, to enforce a law.

There are many points in the South Carolina law which Prohibitionists would do well to consider carefully, but it has one special advantage which alone would make it worthy of our active support, and which should make us eager to give it a fair trial. It is that the licensed saloon becomes a minus factor in politics. The good, all-round results of the elimination of the saloon from the political situation can hardly be overestimated. So few people realize its power in shaping the civil policy of our cities, and indeed of our nation. So few seem to understand that the saloon, represented by its money, is the power which makes the political wheels go round.

The passage of the Dispensary bill has brought consternation into the camp of the enemy, not only in South Carolina but throughout the entire country, and they are no doubt, even now, devising ways and means to evade the law, and to render it as inoperative as they dare. The law closes the saloon, but it does not annihilate the political trickster. His name is Legion, but we know our allies of the Palmetto state too well to fear that they will ever be found "sleeping on guard."

We have no hopes that the Evans law contains the solution of the liquor problem, but we consider it to be, like the high license law, a landmark on the road to the prohibition goal. Whatever the strength or the weakness of the new law, it must, in the nature of things, aid very materially in the evolution of the prohibition idea, because it will demonstrate the absolute impossibility of stamping out the evils of drink by any "regulation," state or national.

TURNING ON THE LIGHT.

If William N. Dodge, the translated president of the National Temperance Society, continues to take note of the proceedings of the Congress of the United States, he must have observed with interest the introduction in the House of that resolution calling for investigation of the whisky trust.

We scarce need remind our readers of the perennial request of the National Temperance Society for nearly a quarter of a century, beseeching Congress to appoint a commission of inquiry into the effects—economic, sanitary and social—of the output of the whisky trust. Every one knows how this "cry of the righteous" was unheeded from year to year, until now its volume is increased by another tone, not strictly harmonious, nor yet wholly discordant. Anything having power to focus the Cyclopian vision of government upon the liquor business, in a critical way, will help our cause along. The drink traffic has nothing to fear so much as light. Possibly temperance reformers could ask for nothing better at this moment than the strife raging inside the enemy's ranks. When brewers and distillers "tell on one another" the disclosures will be dazzling.

Heretofore the call for congressional investigation has been based upon statistical figures found in reports of prisons, insane asylums, hospitals and almshouses. The claim was made that a large proportion of the inmates of these institutions were such because of using intoxicants, while the expense to the public was great both for maintenance and commitment. Congress was asked to assume the burden of this charge, either to sustain or refute. Never was more reasonable demand made by tax-payers, yet there was always something that arrested the measure.

A year ago Louis Schade, Washington's whisky attorney and editor, boasted that he had been the cause of its defeat for seventeen years. His attitude toward the resolution now before the House will be known, perhaps, when the vote is taken.

The zeal of distillers for Owen Scott's bill, increasing the tax on distilled liquors from ninety cents to $1.25 per gallon, is ominous. That together with the bad odor of Whisky Trust stock on 'Change in Wall street has had to do with Congressman Burrow's call for a congressional candle. The board of governors of the Stock Exchange threaten to strike whisky stock off the list traded in, upon the ground that "the Trust has no identity with the legitimate whisky business of the country." Yet it is believed that it controls ninety-five per cent of the distilleries of this country. The directors were able to increase the price of their product twenty cents a gallon in one month, without any falling off of orders. "The legitimate whisky business" seems not to be doing much. The average earnings of the Trust, however—according to a press correspondent who asserts that his knowledge is from the inside—is $2,000,000 per month.

Mr. Burrows states as his purpose in introducing his resolution—which calls for the appointment of a select committee of nine investigators—the unearthing of what he believes to be "an organization which exists in defiance of public law, and which is producing and distributing a product injurious to the public health . . . one of the most monstrous trusts or combines that is existing in this country to-day, doing business in violation of the laws of the country and destroying the health and lives of our people."

The Trust is incorporated to produce spirits for mechanical and laboratory purposes. Mr. Burrows expects investigation to disclose the fact that not over fifteen per cent of the output is so used. The remainder goes to rectifiers through the agency of a distributing company, which receives two cents a gallon for handling.

The rectifiers are wiser than Macbeth's witches in compounding their sense-and-soul-destroying broth in the cauldron sheltered by United States license. They even conjure Father Time, having discovered a spurious process of "aging," by which the change of years is accomplished in a night—typical of the rapid aging of the consumer. The necromancy is accomplished by means of oils and essences, the subtle work of the chemist. "By this process of adulteration," Mr. Burrows goes on to say, "any sort of liquor can be compounded to satisfy the taste of the consumer. From the same vat of spirits can be produced whisky of any age; rum from Jamaica or any other place on the globe; brandy from the most celebrated districts of France, the most approved after-dinner cordials, and gin that would deceive the most educated tastes; all can be produced from a few jars of coloring matter, and a vial of drugs, upon the labels of some of which appear the skull and cross-bones as warning to the user." Verily, wine is a mocker!

Another charge preferred by the honorable complainant, if true, brands distillers as deep-dyed ingrates, considering all the favors they have had at the paternal hands of government. It is this: By their clever imitations they have practically debarred from the country the genuine foreign product, paying two dollars and fifty-cents per gallon import duty, while the government receives but ninety cents a gallon on their bargain-counter wares.

We confess to more amusement than indignation at these dark hints of malpractice and imposition upon a thirsty public. Whisky has always contained an "essence" that made the imbiber drunk, and what worse thing can happen to an individual than to be drunken? If the desire to protect the people from baneful beverages be sincere, let Congress banish the whole brood of the still. Its best and its worst are alike bad. The investigation, if appointed, will find all it is looking for. If it go far enough it will find a close relation between gilt-edged, law-protected temptation, and the debauchery and crime common to all saloon-infested localities. If we have overestimated the aggressiveness of the liquor traffic as a factor in the drink nuisance; if sympathy for the drunkard has biased our judgment, let us be corrected.

Turn on the light!

ONE OF THE HOPEFUL SIGNS.

In an article in the New York Christian Advocate entitled "A Third of a Century in India," J. M. Thoburn, for thirty-three years a missionary in that country and for four years Bishop of India of the Methodist Episcopal church, has a paragraph concerning the advancement of Indian women of the greatest interest to all who are specially interested in the great forward movement of women in this woman's century. It is of the more significance because the Bishop, who certainly ought to be qualified to speak on the subject, gives almost the entire credit of this rapid progress of Indian women to their Christian sisters. The Bishop says:

"During these years education has been placed upon an entirely new footing, so far as women are concerned. When I first arrived in India the general belief was that all the education Indian Christian women needed, at least for the present, was to learn how to read and write. A few of them, such as the wives of preachers or teachers, might be educated a little better, but in the main, even among missionaries, the discreditable notion prevailed that to educate native Christian women beyond the most elementary branches would spoil them. All this nonsense has vanished forever. All the leading missions now have high schools for Christian girls, and every year not only Christian girls, but even some who would be called heathen by their sisters in America, contest with young men for the highest degrees given in the great universities. More than that, they are now found in steadily increasing numbers in the medical colleges of India, and not a few of the daughters of Indian people are now practicing physicians. The credit for this progress among the women of India may be laid almost wholly at the door of the various woman's missionary societies which have been formed in the past quarter of a century. In nearly every department of public activity woman has been surprising the world in recent years by displaying talents for which the world had heretofore given her no credit, but in no sphere of public life and public activity has she done herself more credit or achieved more noble results than in the great mission fields of the world."

In his report to the general conference the Bishop has this in regard to the organization of woman's work in India: "In addition to this central conference we have three annual conferences and one mission conference, with seventeen presiding elders' districts and fourteen district conferences. Connected with each annual and district conference we have a properly organized woman's conference, meeting at the same time and place, and taking full cognizance of all the varied interests of our women's work. These conferences of our faithful sisters have come into being, and have had their organization perfected from time to time, by the natural exigencies of the situation, rather than by the design of any person or party connected with our work. It would be difficult to determine the date of the first organization of the kind, but when once planted their growth became wonderful in its way, and their influence is becoming more marked and beneficial every year. They have courses of study adapted to the various grades of workers, and from the missionary's wife to the humblest Bible-reader every female worker feels that her work is recognized by the church, and that she is responsible to the church for a right performance of her duty. Perhaps I might be pardoned if I venture to say that nowhere else in Methodism, if, indeed, anywhere else in Christendom, is woman's work so fully recognized and so thoroughly organized as in the Methodist Episcopal church in India.

"At the late sessions of the annual and district conferences, beginning on the first of last October, and concluding in the third week of January, I formally appointed no less than 1,178 Methodist preachers to the work for the current year; and if it will not chill your enthusiasm I will add that during the same time, and in the same formal manner, I appointed no less than 575 Christian women to various forms of Christian work in connection with the same conferences.

"As for the appointment of women at the regular sessions of our Women's Conferences, I need say very little. We are not theorists, and have no time for the study of purely speculative questions, but when we see a work to be done, and Christian women at hand to do it, we not only bid them take it up in God's name, but feel it our duty to give them every advantage which thorough organization and wise supervision can secure to them. Of woman and her advancement in modern times it may truly be said that she has worked her way. The women who achieve success by actual work are those who are doing most to elevate their sex, both in point of dignity and privilege, and we believe we are doing our uttermost for the future advancement of the women of India when we throw wide open to our Christian sisters every sphere of labor in which they can do their Master's work."

It is refreshing in the midst of so much narrow, bitter and prejudiced opposition to the widening of woman's work to find these noble brothers who are broad and progressive enough to let "God's facts interpret God's word." These are the hopeful signs of the times, the sure prophecies of the complete emancipation of woman and the consequent uplift of humanity.

THE FIRST DAY OF THE WEEK.

A correspondent asks THE UNION SIGNAL to give the reasons why white-ribboners consider the first day of the week the Sabbath, and if we approve of compelling all to keep Sunday, and even persecuting those who do not.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and THE UNION SIGNAL as its organ, have always stood for the fullest liberty of conscience, and so far from approving of compulsion or persecution, our organization, through its Sabbath observance superintendent, caused to be inserted in the National Sunday Rest Bill a proviso exempting from the requirements of the bill all persons who having conscientiously observed Saturday as the Sabbath, do not by their labor on Sunday, interfere with the rights of others to a quiet day for rest and worship; nearly all the states have exceptions in their Sunday laws for this class and it should be universal.

It is not difficult to see that a weekly civil rest day can only be secured or maintained when such day is uniform throughout the country, and it is eminently proper that the uniform day so chosen should be the day which the vast majority consider sacred. Believing that the right to such rest day is a vital one and should be most carefully protected, we can but counsel our friends to throw no obstacles in its way, even though it may involve personal self-denial.

The reasons why, in common with most of the Christian world, we believe that the first day of the week is the Sabbath, lies mainly along these lines. We believe that God set apart the Sabbath when He created man (it was the first day of His life, and hence of time), that it was designed for all men to the end of time, and that Jesus proclaims Himself its perpetual Lord. We find no evidence in the Bible that the seventh day of the week was the Sabbath, except for the Jewish nation, any more sacred than any other day. The fourth commandment, which was designed for all the world, says nothing about the day of the week when the Sabbath should be observed, only that six days of labor should always be followed by a seventh of rest, which is literally obeyed by us all alike, and that such rest day is "the Sabbath of the Lord" that "God blessed."

The Jews unquestionably kept the seventh day of the week from the time the manna was given, but when, at the death of Christ, the Jewish dispensation passed away with all its special days, there remained only the obligation to keep the Sabbath of which Jesus is still Lord, without specifying the day on which it should be observed. We find, however, that from the time of His resurrection on the first day of the week, this first day was observed as Sabbath, thus fulfilling the fourth commandment and celebrating the resurrection of our Risen Lord. For a time both days were observed, but church history shows that from the time of the Apostles onward increasingly as Jewish influence waned, the first day was kept as the sacred day, until finally almost the entire Christian world has accepted it.

If the seventh day of the week, Sabbath, belonged to the Jewish dispensation, there was no occasion for any command substituting the first day, any more than one commanding the change from circumcision to baptism, or the passover to the Lord's Supper.

The Sabbath Observance Manual prepared and sent out by the National superintendent of that department, Mrs. J. C. Bateham, Williamsburg, Ky., devotes a long chapter to the seventh day question, and to this little book we gladly refer any who wish to study further.

A CORRESPONDENT from Stryker, Ohio, J. A. Miles, makes the practical and patriotic suggestion that from the opening of the World's Columbian Exposition, the 1st of May, books and pledges shall be ready at the Temple, for the enrollment of one million signatures for total abstinence, purity and woman's equality as a citizen. Then, indeed, will the Temple be a beacon light for the nation.

Words from Longfellow to Ellery Channing:

"Speak and speak out this bloody tale;
Record this dire eclipse
This day of wrath, this endless wail
This dread apocalypse!"

It has been well said by Lady Henry Somerset in reference to the introduction of nationalizing the liquor traffic as is done in Guttenburg, "That which has failed in Sweden should hardly be substituted for that which has succeeded among Anglo-Saxons." Here she was referring to the prohibitory laws of the United States.

It was wittily observed by a temperance member of Parliament, who presided over the first meeting at which our National president spoke in England (Highgate, November 25,) that "when poverty comes in at the door, love flies out at the window; but when drunkenness comes in at the door, not only love flies out of the window, but the household furniture follows fast, and follows faster."

Madam Willard's devoted and faithful helper, the Swedish maid Eda, during the absence of the family, is making a long visit among relatives in her native land, expecting to return when the deserted Rest Cottage shall be re-occupied in the early summer. Such was her love for the aged saint, whom she delighted to honor and serve, that on a holiday, previous to her departure, she spent the entire day at the grave of Madam Willard in beautiful Rosehill Cemetery.

One of the most curious announcements of divine service on Sunday that I have seen is the following which I clipped from a paper in Toledo, Ohio: "They who live ready to die, these will meet to-morrow; the following are the sermons that the believers in revelation will hear at the churches." So much for "displayed headings." Then follows an announcement of where the various preachers will discuss, preceded by this paragraph: "People who want to live forever, and who believe that, by bringing into operation favorable causes, their aspirations may be satisfied, will meet to-morrow to mutually assist and encourage each other in making progress in this they consider the chief concern of their lives. Toledo ministers are generally attractive and encouraging. Every one should come to church to-morrow at the following places of worship."

Faith is a choice of the will. We choose to believe God's word or we choose to doubt it. Having intelligently chosen to believe, we must fight for our faith. We must hang on to it and stand by it. We must expect to be attacked by doubts on every side. We must regard these doubts as our enemies, and slay them with the sword of the spirit.

The souls of temperance folk are sorely wrung by so-called reform family papers which carry Scripture headings on one side and beer and wine advertisements on the opposite page. But sometimes an incident proving that the dollar is not "almighty" comes to me as follows: The Journal of the Knights of Labor is published in Philadelphia, under the immediate control of Mr. Powderly and his efficient secretary, John W. Hayes. Knowing that the paper wished to raise an extra amount of money, from holiday notices, a Philadelphia brewer offered an advertisement of his beer for which he would pay one thousand dollars cash. The offer was submitted through an advertising agent, and was peremptorily refused on the ground that the journal was published to elevate the moral as well as material condition of the laborer. Again: A neighbor magazine some time ago, as a scheme to increase subscriptions, asked its readers to make a wish, promising to tell them how it could be fulfilled. It was expected that wishes for bicycles, books, dolls, etc., would be at flood tide, but some went beyond the purposes of the announcement, and wished for husbands, wives, presidents of the United States, good crops, and other bewildering impossibilities for the publisher. But the following dropped in and made the editor recall uneasily a column of cooking recipes which he had recently admitted:

I wish that a magazine with the name of Goodform would have good form enough to leave out brandy and whisky recipes at this stage of the temperance reform. How can I get my wish?

Thereupon the gallant editor replied, "Madam, you have your wish." In recounting the mercies of 1892 I remember Goodform and Mr. Powderly and his aids, and take heart for 1893.

ON DUTY.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD

NEW JERSEY.

FLASH LIGHTS.

The irrepressible reporter ought to be everywhere "looking up items." If in this letter items are few, I beg your clemency, for from physical disability, weeks have passed since I have crossed the threshold of my own hearthstone; so, think and write as I may, I cannot be accused of "going beyond my sphere."

Just now Essex county is causing considerable disturbance in the United States senatorial fight, and likewise, but peaceably, the unions are "up and at it." A series of monthly meetings, or "schools of methods," at which trained workers present a paper or address to be followed by discussion is being carried out.

The first subject was the work among the young women; this month the topic is "Social Purity," Dr. Mary Allen to be the principal speaker to the workers in the afternoon, in a church in the evening.

The second all day prayer and meeting for conference was held December 19, under the auspices of the East Orange union. It was the second birthday of our dear Mrs. Downs in heaven, and Mrs. Demorest writes of the day most touchingly, "that all through the hours the benediction of her life work seemed to be present to each, impressing the thought that they must work as if there were no prayer, and pray as if there were no work." Lessons of our utter helplessness and God's willingness and power, if we have the receptive spirit, were forcibly taught those who waited for the enduement of power that day.

Mrs. Ellis had charge of the meeting upon her return from Connecticut, where for a week she had been holding a series of meetings in different parts of the state most successfully.

Paterson has decided to purchase the Jewish synagogue for their work, at a cost of about $8,000.

Our oldest member, dear Mrs. Penfield, who for years has been a "shut in," writes in a most touching manner of the death of Miss West. She knew her and visited her when she was at school in Galesburg, many years before the birth of the W. C. T. U., and in passing, I may say, the whole state mourns her as a "sister beloved."

Mrs. Bourne issues a New Year's call to our women full of good cheer for their activities past and present, and with unbounded faith in their readiness to respond, calls upon them to more than ever endeavor to win the women who are at ease to our cause, to "sow beside all waters," "to give doubt and fear no heed, but broadcast it o'er the land!" She has been attending meetings in Newark, East Orange, Clinton, Jersey City, Elizabeth, South River, Haddenfield, Camden, Irvington, Watsessing, Milburn and Wyoming, and at the latter place spoke in the Presbyterian Church, by invitation of the officials. In that church no woman's voice had ever been heard in a public address. Surely "the world do move."

Burlington county has made an appropriation for the hospital. Florence has a Y organized. Vineland Union held a New Year's reception at the home of their president, Mrs. C. Reighley. About two hundred responded to invitations sent out, and most delightfully were they entertained with music, readings, and a choice collation—served by their hospitable hostess and her bevy of tried and true workers, the guests leaving with their "best wishes for the New Year."

Mrs. Hoffman comes into the state for a series of meetings, beginning with Trenton, January 28 to 31, and from there going up and down the state.

The president of East Orange union, Mrs. Louisa Downs Quigley, writes of her experience in having the best speakers to awaken interest, and that it may help some faltering, timid ones, I pass it on to you. Last October she engaged Colonel Bain for three services, two on Sunday, and one in the Opera House Monday night. It was two weeks before election, everybody afraid, and only one minister with her. A union of six members, it had never had a public meeting and there was not a cent in the treasury. Two thousand invitations were sent through the mail; a quarter column in the weekly paper was kept supplied for several weeks with extracts from other papers about the speaker, paid for at advertising rates. Expenses were $200; receipts, $325. Did it pay? Yea, verily, for this was only the beginning of many more to follow. God is behind all honest effort, but the workers must be willing to launch out into the deep, beyond the breakers which beat the shore, if they ride triumphantly the smooth sea of public opinion.

The Sunday afternoon meetings in Dover, Morris county, are kept up in the churches with increasing interest. The advance along the line of prohibition by a political party is quite marked, for in addition to the reorganization of the Young Men's Prohibition Club since election the young ladies have formed an auxiliary, and are now holding a fair for the financial aid of the club.

Trenton W. C. T. U. No. 1, as has been its custom for several years, sent Christmas baskets, filled with chicken, groceries, vegetables, oranges, etc., to 140 families, numbering 630 people, and many sad cases were found; about fifty of these cases were widows, with little children to care for; in others sickness and lack of work had caused poverty to be their daily companion, but through this visit of the Christ-child, for a time at least, joy and comfort were brought them.

The causes of poverty are many, yet none so prolific as the drink habit, and the end is not yet, for still another brewery is being erected in our city, while the largest company "now turns out 550 barrels per day, and by spring it promises to double the amount." I declare to you it is not whisky so much the nation needs to fight, but beer, with its syndicates and its millions of capital invested! Already the fight has begun over the excise board in our city, and election three months away. The salary is very small, yet no city office is such a bone of contention. Perhaps the brewery interest, which holds mortgages on two-thirds of our three hundred saloons, may be able to give the required answer, we can't.

Last week, a young man in Atlantic county courts pleaded guilty to keeping a gambling place in his cigar store in Atlantic City, and was sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail for twenty days, and to pay a fine of $150. Society fervently "thanks Providence that in Jersey there is justice," while the managers of Monmouth Park, Guttenbergh and Gloucester openly defy and violate the law year in and out; why this discrimination between the punishment of the keeper of this little cigar store and these wholesale violaters? Not because of lack of public sentiment, nor lack of law or courts, or court officials, but it is said, because these officials are in league with the owners of the tracks. Shame on the Christian (?) voter that such a state of iniquity exists!

Thirty-three of the Hudson county "ballot-box stuffers" were released on parole, after only a few months of imprisonment. Why they should so soon be relieved from the penalty of the law, it is difficult to say, unless their experience is needed for future political work, if the way opened for business needing a delicate hand. God help us! vain is the help of man!

But I turn from all this darkness, it is too oppressive, to the thought of the possibilities for good the coming year, and send this beautiful message as a New Year greeting to you all:

"A bright New Year and a sunny track
Along an upward way,
And a song of praise on looking back,
When the year has passed away,
And golden sheaves, nor small nor few,
This is my New Year's wish for you!"

OREGON.

NEW YEAR'S PROMISE.

It seems to me that I have more new work to report than usual, which augurs well for the new year. There have been several organizers in the field, and I will begin with our state president's trip down south in Coos county.

One existing union in a neighborhood, with life as well as existence, should always pave the way for another. This was the case with Myrtle Creek, a forerunner and a preparer for the new union at Coquille City, with Mrs. Laura Boutelle for president. Gardiner, which Mrs. Riggs speaks of as "always aggressive," initiates itself with the mill-hands there by providing for them an occasional Sunday treat, a bouquet tied with white ribbon, which each man finds beside his plate at the mess-house dinner. Nearer home, and visited on a former trip, was Eugene City, with its reading room that Mrs. Bilyen has been untiringly energetic in establishing and fostering. Its visitors range from 700 to 1,000 monthly, including drummers and traveling men as well as the citizens.

It is with much regret that we lose, on account of health, Mrs. Bilyen as state treasurer, which post she has so long and so admirably filled. Mrs. Amos, of Portland, has been appointed to take her place.

The county president of Union, Mrs. H. Ownby, sent me a report which was as follows: "Mrs. Harford came into our county on her way to the National Convention in Denver and rendered services as follows. At La Grande, she lectured to a large audience at night, and the next day held a meeting with the ladies. She gave two lectures at Summerville and held a meeting with the ladies one afternoon. At Elgin she lectured twice and preached; holding a mothers' meeting and a fathers' meeting. At Union, the union had not been meeting for about a year. On short notice they advertised and had a well-filled house at night. The next afternoon she held a mothers' meeting with a lecture the second night. New members were added and the union started out anew. A number of new members were added at each appointment.

On her return from the National Convention, Mrs. Harford held a number of meetings at La Grande, forming an L. T. L.

At the union meeting in which the pastors of the Methodist, Presbyterian and Baptist churches took part, Mrs. Harford occupied the last part of the evening. There was quite a large audience who showed how well they appreciated the speaker by the large collection that was taken up. It is due to Mrs. Harford to say that she gave general satisfaction and is considered a rousing and enthusiastic speaker. She organized at Heppner, a great wool center (for which our Eastern Oregon is famous), with Mrs. C. S. Van Duyn for president. Heppner had a little struggling union once, and has been reported ever since as possessing "no suitable material"; but Mrs. Harford found plenty of that precious commodity, which she believes will make the union "go" this time, as also those of Huntingdon and Antelope with Miss Lucile Stalker and Mrs. W. Mitchell, president and corresponding secretary, respectively.

Afternoon and evening meetings were held all along her line of travel, sometimes diverging from it to reach certain points. She thus visited Pendleton, Baker, Union, Weston, Milton, Summerville, The Dalles, Helix, Wasco, Moro and Hood River. She reconnoitered and lectured at seven other places where they did not seem ripe yet for organization. Most of these places our state president had visited in years gone by.

The indefatigable Maggie Eaton, who has kept saloons out of her county for so long, went with Mrs. Harford from place to place, making the way smooth for her.

Mrs. L. P. Rounds, state superintendent of the mercy department, has been able to revisit unions she had previously organized in Wallowa county, across the Cascade mountains and sixty miles from railroads. She held a week of evangelistic services at Joseph, and then attended a teachers' institute at Enterprise, meeting with great courtesy and appreciation from the county superintendent. Before leaving Enterprise—well named—a union was organized. Mrs. Rounds visited eight schools in La Grande, leaving a Mercy Band in each, as well as at Elgin, and nearer home, at La Fayette.

Thanks to a little help from the National, we are able to enjoy the benefit of some Y's organization work. Never money was better laid out, for Miss Rose Trumbull is "worth her weight in gold" to the Y's. She has been over our mountains organizing at Union with a good round number; at Cornelius with seventy-two; added thirty at Corvallis, and delights her audience always with her addresses. Although so young, she is not afraid to touch on hitherto mute questions, with the greatest delicacy and yet with point.

Be sure the children have not been neglected with Mrs. Ada Unruh for superintendent. She has planted L. T. L's at Sherwood (where they had threatened the tar brush) Whiteson, Sheridan and Airlie; visited and lectured at Monmouth and Falls City, and reports progress from far-away points which she visits through the mail.

In a private letter she says: "I have been brought face to face in an emphatic manner with the overwhelming problem of the hop-yard. It so impressed me that I believe it is to be the problem that is to be met in the near future, the solution of which is to be either victory on our side or defeat of the whole battle in which we are here engaged. The hop-yard (unless something happens to the industry) will be to us what the wine grape is to California."

Mrs. Unruh spoke at Dayton and Vernonia. "The latter place," she says, "is one of the many that we find in Oregon cut off by lack of railroad facilities from communication with the outside world and which we must reach. They gladly hear the word. The dear women, many of whom had not been out beyond the hills in three years, cried for joy when I went in, and we both cried when I came away. It pays (not in dollars, but the coin of heaven) to go to these points." In short, Mrs. Unruh has in the year doubled the number of L. T. L's in Oregon.

A county convention has been held in Umatilla since my last report. Our state president and state evangelist with Miss Trumbull, were present. The meetings were well attended, the attendance increasing to the last. All three did a little visiting in unions within easy distance. Be it known that in Milton, the scene of this convention, saloons have been banished.

Mothers' meetings have been very successful at Astoria, under Mrs. Dr. Owens Adair, and they promise equally well at Corvallis.

Police matrons have been at last placed in the Portland jail, this after repeated requests from the W. C. T. U.

In consequence of the protracted illness of Miss Gottshall, the zealous business manager of our Oregon White Ribbon, Capt. H. M. Riggs is kindly devoting himself to this work, thereby receiving the thanks of us all.

LOUISIANA.

THE INITIAL DISTRICT CONVENTION.

At the last annual Louisiana convention our state was, for the first time, divided into districts, and district presidents were appointed. The first district convention ever held in the state was much enjoyed.

It was held at Crowley, Dec. 9–11, 1892, and it was a success and will result in much good. The sessions of the convention were held in the Methodist Episcopal church south, and were well attended by the citizens of Crowley and vicinity. The church was decorated in pleasing and graceful style, flags were draped from the walls and on the organ, moss hung in graceful festoons from the chandeliers, mottoes spoke from banners and walls, and flowers brightened and beautified all.

Mrs. Kate Wilkins, president of the district, called the convention to order, and devotional exercises were led at the first session by Mrs. B. A. Watkins. Much business was transacted by the convention. The addresses of welcome and response were all good. Mrs. Williams, parish president, gave a welcome on behalf of the parish, Mrs. Alice Roller on behalf of Crowley W. C. T. U., and Mrs. Merrill for the Crowley Y's. Miss Mollie Clifford, of Opelousas, responded to these welcomes.

The address of Mrs. Wilkins, on the first evening of the convention, was full of information in regard to the work of the district and showed throughout a consecration and devotion to the work of the W. C. T. U. She advanced some good and feasible plans to increase the finances of district and state treasuries, and we hope they may be carried out.

Mrs. Goodale spoke on this first evening. Nineteen delegates were present in the convention. Fifteen W. C. T. U's and four Y. W. C. T. U's were reported in the district.

Resolutions passed by the convention were vigorous and up to the need of the times. A spirit of love and of sympathy prevailed among the delegates, and all were united in the determination to do good and active work.

On Saturday night a Demorest gold medal contest was given. Mrs. Olive Merrill, state superintendent of medal contests, took charge, and to her is due great credit for the active and persistent work done in that line in the district. The young girls who took part in the contest all did well. Unfortunately one of the contestants was absent, and according to the rules, the medal could not be awarded. It would have been difficult for judges to decide who most deserved the medal where all did so well. This evening closed with an address by the state president.

Sunday at three in the afternoon a delightful experience meeting was held, led by Mrs. Shepherdson, of Shell Beach. At seven in the evening Mrs. Goodale gave an address, after which she called on the ministers present for short talks. Rev. Mr. Abernethy and Rev. Mr. Frazee gave encouraging words and indorsed heartily the work of the W. C. T. U. These ministers and Rev. Briscoe Carter attended the meetings of the convention and were very helpful.

The Y's of Crowley, led by Mrs. Merrill, furnished delightful music through the entire convention. The people of Crowley, with warm-hearted hospitality, welcomed us to their homes, and though the weather was dark and gloomy, the cheeriness of manner and kind smiles of friends made sunshine in the heart.

I think the Crowley convention a decided success, a good beginning, and we hope to chronicle other district conventions before long. MARY READ GOODALE,

COLORADO NOTES.

"I know not by what methods rare,
But this I know, God answers prayer.
I know not when He sends the word
That tells us fervent prayer is heard,
I know it cometh soon or late;
Therefore we need to pray and wait."

Such has been the experience of the workers all over our state, when all hearts have been turned in loving sympathy to our president, Mrs. Eva Higgins, suffering from a painful illness since the 28th of last October. At the present writing the clouds are lifted, and it is the opinion of her physicians that the danger is past, although it will be many weeks before she will be able to resume her duties.

The unions of Denver united in a prayer service for her recovery the early part of the month, and all who participated pronounced it most helpful. Many earnest petitions have been offered throughout the state, and we were assured,

"Though sundered far, by faith we meet Around one common mercy seat," and "They shall call on my name, and I will hear them."

The Denver Central union has its usual gratifying report. The day nursery has cared for 694 children; of that number there were 200 free of charge. The Kitchen-garden held thirteen regular sessions, attendance 472, an average per lesson of thirty-six. A successful entertainment was given under the direction of the young and talented superintendent, Miss Emily Maginnis. Meetings have been held each week for the railroad men, with an attendance of fifty. This branch of work received an impetus at the time of the National Convention through the efforts of Miss Jennie Smith. Literature has been distributed among the Germans and Italians by Mrs. J. A. Temple, superintendent of English and foreign literature.

The following questions were asked at a recent meeting of Roxanna Brainard W. C. T. U., Denver:

What can this union do for temperance this winter?

Answers:

1. Keep up all departments vigorously; 2. Provide literature for all our members; 3. See that all get and read THE UNION SIGNAL; 4. Pay for The Bulletin; 5. Try to have more gospel temperance meetings; 6. Get more temperance into the Y. P. S. C. E.; 7. Work for a Loyal Temperance Legion in every Sunday-school; 8. Be more prompt about reports and letters; 9. Ask for space in local paper; 10. Push the Great Petition.

What can I, as an individual do? Answers:

1. Wear the white ribbon; 2. Distribute literature; 3. Attend all meetings; 4. Get honorary members; 5. Remember the noon-tide prayer; 6. Report every cent spent for the cause; 7. Buy state minutes, and study them; 8. Watch the drug stores in places where there are no saloons; 9. Ask our friends to join us.

Mr. Crittenton, the millionaire founder of charitable homes for girls, has signified his intention of donating $1,000 to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Colorado, to be used as a fund for the establishment of a midnight mission in Denver. The only conditions are that the home shall be called "The Florence Crittenton Home," in memory of his daughter.

This announcement brings joy to all, particularly those who are so interested in the Cottage Home. In this connection it may be mentioned the Willard union, Mrs. Frances Belford, president, has furnished a room in the home, and although but recently organized, is branching out in various charities.

A history of the W. C. T. U. is being prepared by a competent committee appointed at the state convention. The Leonard union, but six months old, numbers forty-nine active and honorary members. Mrs. A. A. Cameron, wife of the clergyman of Calvary Baptist Church, is the very able president. Meetings are held twice a month, and the willing workers are ready to "do with their might what their hands find to do."

Through the courtesy of the president, a few ladies from other unions were invited guests on the day of their regular meeting and it was a genuine "feast of reason and flow of soul." After the business of the hour remarks were made by the visitors on evangelistic work, scientific temperance instruction, mothers' meetings, the press and city mission. Then delicious refreshments were served by the daughters of the hostess, and a pleasing recitation rendered by Miss Kissie Cameron; before the final adieux, one of our noble workers said she was doubly reminded of "The Ribbon White":

"Seal of service, dissent from sin,
Royal hearts that are beating under it
Wear the color and sign within."

"Oh, the sight of it, oh, the light of it" will be an endless inspiration.

A union has been formed at Brighton of nineteen members through the efforts of Mr. John Hipp, the candidate for governor on the Prohibition ticket,

"For our Prohibition army's marching on."

The Highlands union is wide awake, and they are thankful they have no saloons. Their press superintendent, Mrs. F. G. Farnsworth, has secured a column in the local paper that never suffers from lack of copy. A prize has been offered to the pupils of the district and high schools for the best essay on "Tobacco, its Effects on the Physical, Mental and Moral nature of Mankind."

A New Year's reception was held at the home of the president, Mrs. Lee (daughter of Mrs. Mary F. Shields, our first state president,) when a paper was presented on scientific instruction; several new members were welcomed, and there is a spirit of earnestness, harmony and Christian fellowship that is very encouraging.

The Arapahoe county union held its sixteenth quarterly convention in the Central Christian church, and great interest was manifested in the large attendance. The mission work and equal suffrage were discussed, able papers being read by noted workers in the county. The following letter was sent as a greeting from the sick room of our beloved state president, Mrs. Eva Higgins:

"Beloved Sisters and Co-workers in convention assembled, Greeting:

I am with you in spirit though absent in body, to-day. During these weeks of forced retirement God's promises have not failed me. I have felt His everlasting arms beneath me, and your prayers I could almost hear. The work and the workers were never so dear to me. Soon I believe I will be enabled to take my place again, and help you push this righteous battle to the fore. Until I look into your faces and grasp your hands again, God be with you is my prayer. Read St. John 14: 17, and sing, 'Blest be the tie that binds.'"

UTAH.

TERRITORIAL CONVENTION.

Just before the great National Convention at Denver, was held the second annual W. C. T. U. convention of Utah Territory, in Salt Lake City. There were four day sessions held, filled to the utmost limit with reports of officers and departments, and the necessary business of a convention.

There being no county organizations in Utah, the reports of local unions came direct to the territorial organization, and they were listened to with the greater interest by our women as the unions of the territory are as yet comparative strangers to each other, being organized at widely different points, and only amalgamated at the organization convention called by their officers a year ago in Ogden.

At that time there were only five local unions. Officers and superintendents of departments were elected according to the best judgment of the delegates, but the choice was largely experimental, and of course in many instances resulted in the appointment of women unable or unwilling to undertake the work. So great an ignorance, moreover, of the lines of work and the characteristic ideas dominating the W. C. T. U. prevails, except among those who have come into the territory in recent years from points more closely in touch with this, the great philanthropic woman's movement of the day, that in many cases where the desire to promote temperance work was great, the methods adopted were crude and unproductive of results.

The removal of our able president, Mrs. Lydia M. Bailey, from our territory in the middle of the year, naturally also rendered our work less effective.

The late convention has placed us on a more secure footing and established closer relations among the various members of what we hope to make an efficient working organization. So far as possible the officers who had proved themselves interested and efficient the past year were retained in office or elected to other positions for which they were better fitted. The lists both of superintendents and officers were sent at once to headquarters, but have not, I think, been published in THE UNION SIGNAL. The officers are as follows:

President, Caroline Humphrey Reid, Salt Lake City; vice-president, Mrs. Alice Burnet, Mt. Pleasant; second vice-president, Mrs. G. W. Martin, Nephi: third vice-president, Mrs. Snow, Park City; recording secretary, Miss E. Parsons, Provo; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Ida Day, Salt Lake City.

We were fortunate in having with us at our convention Mrs. Mary Bynon Reese, National organizer, who had then been working for three weeks in the territory, and had effected the organization of two new unions. She conducted the evening service, giving an address which was ably delivered and well received, and also presented the prize of the Demorest medal contest held the following evening under the management of the Salt Lake union.

After the National Convention Mrs. Reese was returned for another month's work in Utah, and has since reported the organization of three more unions, with efficient officers and a good working membership. The work which this energetic white-ribboner has done here has been long needed, and will be of real benefit in a territory which works under more than ordinary disadvantage in any general public movement.

Requests have come from many places where organization is at present impracticable, for public meetings in the interest of our work, and scattered women whose teaching or missionary work holds them isolated in villages or hamlets, are sending in their names to the general organizations, and will at a later day form nucleii for other unions. And so the work widens.

CALIFORNIA.

NEW YEAR MEETING OF THE EXECUTIVE BOARD.

The first meeting of the New Year of the California Woman's Christian Temperance Union, represented by their executive board, was held at the state headquarters, January 3, Mrs. B. Sturtevant-Peet presiding.

Among the pleasant New Year gifts, Mrs. Hoppin, state treasurer, reported the generous contribution of $100 from Evangelist Mr. Charles N. Crittenton, who at the Denver Convention gave Miss Willard $5,000 for founding Florence Crittenton Missions under W. C. T. U. auspices, for the rescue of erring girls. A vote of thanks was tendered Mr. Crittenton for the gift of one hundred dollars to the organizers' fund which will make glad the hearts of our state organizers, Mrs. Henrietta Skelton and Mrs. Emma Pow Smith.

Dr. H. P. Van Kirk resigned as superintendent of non-alcoholic medication and Dr. Anna Booth was elected. Mrs. L. W. Farish resigned as superintendent of social purity and Mrs. Mary E. Teats, formerly National superintendent of prison work, was elected. Mrs. General Bidwell resigned as associate commissioner of the World's Fair W. C. T. U. exhibit, leaving Mrs. S. J. Churchill and Mrs. Jennie Phelps Purvis in charge of that department.

As the state W. C. T. U. have now two houses furnished, by re-renting which quite a little income is made, a house committee was appointed consisting of the officers, Mrs. B. Sturtevant-Peet, Mrs. H. E. Brown, Mrs. D. J. Spencer, Mrs. Emily Hoppin and Mrs. Williams, Mrs. Vaslit and Mrs. Gardiner. The land upon which these houses stand can be bought for $40,000 and Mrs. French thought the state union should take measures to get permanent headquarters.

Mrs. Mary Frank Browne gave a good plan for more thoroughly interesting people in temperance work through drawing-room meetings.

Miss French, formerly associated with the Pacific Ensign, as secretary, resigned to accept a position in an Indian school in San Diego county, and as Mrs. Gove prayed for God's blessing upon her, every heart responded. Mrs. H. E. Brown will fill the position of business manager of the Pacific Ensign.

A letter of condolence was sent Mrs. Sharpstein upon the death of her husband, Chief Justice Sharpstein. Mrs. Mary Hart was reappointed superintendent of work among miners. Miss Helen McLean well presented the work of her department, Demorest medal contests, and pleaded earnestly that this means of reaching the public with temperance truth be vigorously pushed.

Mrs. Eyster, as superintendent of juvenile work, told of the good results of these Demorest medal contests which she has seen in her lecturing among the children of the schools of the state. Mrs. M. E. Congdon urged the coöperation of teachers in securing woman suffrage. Th rest of the meeting was devoted to memorial services for Miss Mary Allen West. [See Memorial Number.—EDS.]

SOUTH DAKOTA.

WINTER WORK.

Twenty-five years of organized Christian work has done much to bind together the hearts of women of al lands in that electric touch which makes the whole world kin.

The women of South Dakota have been and are busy in helping to circulate the great Petition, which memorializes the governments of the world to put away the traffic in alcohol and opium. Every woman who reads these lines should make it her personal business to add to the 2,000,000 names already obtained.

Some one has fitly said that this Petition is "the plea of suffering, sobbing womanhood for the protection of her home and the salvation of her sons and daughters."

The work of petitions against resubmission is being systematically carried on also. Just now they are being read daily in the legislature. So often do they come up for a hearing that the press has called them "chestnuts." Our state president says "the crop is mammoth," and it seems now that the voice of the people expressed in this way is to be heeded. Beadle county leads in the matter, having sent in a petition with nearly eight hundred signatures.

The resubmission bill, introduced by Mr. Fowler, of Lawrence county, has passed the second reading. The temperance committee, which has the bill in charge in the House, has a majority of resubmissionists, and it is expected that the bill will be reported back and put on its passage at an early date.

South Dakota is singularly fortunate in its leader, Mrs. Emma Cramner. Beautiful in person and more beautiful in character, she cannot fail to win and to be a potent factor in crystallizing the sentiment of the good and wise in reference to the evils of alcohol and in influencing legislation on this point. She spoke at Pierre, Sunday evening, January 15, to a crowded house and now praise comes from every quarter. Her discourse was logical, connected, forcible and pleasing. There was profound attention and frequent applause.

The state treasurer, Mrs. Eugene Steen, made such a telling speech that twenty-two dollars was collected for the state work.

The lobbyists, whose names at the opening of the session, were legion, seem to have folded their tents, like the Arabs, and to have stolen away.

A fine looking company of men compose the legislature, and inspire one with the feeling that the best interests of the state are safe in their keeping. Now is the time for earnest prayer, that the consciences of these legislators may be tender.

"The victory is most sure
For him, who, seeking faith by virtue, strives
To yield entire obedience to the law
Of conscience: Conscience reverenced and obeyed
As God's most intimate presence in the soul,
And His most perfect image in the world."

Many of the unions have been enjoying the presence of Mrs. M. L. Wells, of Tennessee, wife of a lawyer, and mother of lawyers. She is well fitted to give efficient aid in properly presenting to state legislatures, the question of the hour.

Jerauld county has been fortunate in securing the services of Mr. Albert, who has delivered a course of lectures, showing intemperance to be a disease. Much interest has been awakened, and quite a sum added to the exchequer of the local unions as well.

Our state superintendent of parlor meetings is awakening much interest in this department. A series of entertainments is being planned at Pierre. There is much local talent here, and the pretty omes will make pleasant rallying places for the friends of temperance.

Mrs. Irene Adams, who was to have accompanied Mrs. Cramner to Pierre, to work against resubmission, has been called out of the state. She will be greatly missed. As state reporter she has rendered very efficient aid to the organization. Mrs. Simmons, her alternate, is expected here soon. Thus far, Mrs. Cramner has "held the fort" alone, and has done excellent work, looking after the presentation of petitions, answering the many personal letters of inquiry, urging the home constituency of weak members to write personal letters, as well as doing personal work, writing articles for the press and speaking publicly.

The state minutes were published within sixty days after the state convention, and nearly all the copies have been sold.

Mrs. Adams has prepared a digest of the Dakota laws which are unjust to women. It is now in the hands of the printers, and copies will be furnished to unions at one cent each. Send to Mrs. E. Wardale, Huron.

It has been intimated by the Pierre press that the W. C. T. U. interests are languishing, and that the women here need pity. Mrs. Cramner says, "The women at Pierre do not need pity. The God of battles is on their side, and they will surely win."

DEPARTMENT OF LOYAL TEMPERANCE LEGION.

OBJECTIONS TO ADVANCED METHODS ANSWERED.

The most earnest and intelligent workers in this department have been forced to the conclusion that only advanced methods, in harmony with this age of progress, will serve to hold the older boys and girls—during those critical years when they are most liable to be overcome by temptation—in ours, or any other, temperance organization. Careful inquiry in one of our states has developed the fact that, in spite of all efforts to the contrary, only twenty-four per cent of the entire membership of the L. T. L. is composed of boys of ten years old and upwards. It is not a question, as some have seemed to think, as to whether we shall push the children out from the simplicity of childhood into some of the methods of work pursued by our W. C. T. U.; but whether they shall become mature in wickedness through our inability to hold them back from the legalized temptation of the streets, or mature along the lines of endeavor which shall work out their own salvation, and that of others through their influence.

Therefore we hail with gratitude the advance step taken by our last National Convention, whereby the L. T. L. companies of each state may be represented in future conventions by one W. C. T. U. delegate, an active L. T. L. worker, for each fifty dollars paid into the National treasury, representing one thousand members.

It will now be necessary for each state desiring to avail itself of this privilege to arrange through its general officers and L. T. L. superintendent such a plan as shall secure this representation in accordance with required conditions. Let the following points be emphasized: (1) The dues must be paid by L. T. L. members individually; (2) that dues must be optional, never being made a requisite for any child's membership in a local L. T. L.; (3) that dues must in all cases pass through the state treasury on their way to the National, being, of course duly accredited by the state treasurer.

By vote of the last National Convention we are now "Department of the Loyal Temperance Legion," instead of "Juvenile Department," as heretofore.

We ask all to unite in pushing, as the other advanced plans for 1893, the Senior Grade Legions and Conferences of L. T. L. Workers.

Senior Grade Legions: The time has come for each L. T. L. company to form all its members of twelve years old and upward into a senior grade division. These divisions may be named, if desired, for noted reformers, philanthropists or poets. It is of vital importance that we shall dignify the Legion in the eyes of the older boys and girls, and give them a hearty respect for it. The state Legions of Wisconsin and Pennsylvania are accomplishing this result in a wonderful degree. The forming of these senior grade divisions is the first step toward the organization of state Legions, which must be composed entirely of L. T. L. graduates. The Juniors will be greatly helped by this advance, as the prospect of being promoted into the senior division at twelve years of age will be a constant stimulus. If your present membership of required age is very small it will at least serve as a beginning, and others will be drawn in by the original members. If you have not even a nucleus for a senior division make haste to gather a few members and make a start, remembering that hereafter no L. T. L. will be considered complete without the two grades.

The seniors should have the diploma course of study widening out into discussions, parliamentary drill, and some special line of work for others. We know our boys and girls are busy with school work, but the study required for graduation is but a very small tax upon those who are accustomed to the mental discipline of the school room, and this is a practical branch of education that they can by no means afford to neglect. I am very glad to announce that the general secretary of the Y Branch, Mrs. Barnes, heartily favors these Senior L. T. L's, as giving more thorough preparation for entering her army of young women than the Junior Y could do. By a mutual understanding she will advocate the formation of Senior L. T. L's wherever the young people will agree to such an organization, and your National superintendent will advise the formation of a Junior Y wherever the young people have a decided preference for that.

The senior grade may meet with the juniors, or separately, as circumstances indicate. In many cases it may be found best to alternate meetings, where only one leader is available.

"Lifting others as we climb," is the motto which has been adopted for our graduates by a conference of State Superintendents.

Conference of L. T. L. Workers: As our senior grade develops we shall need more thoroughly prepared leaders and teachers. Hartford county, Connecticut, has set us the example of a county conference of L. T. L. workers, called and arranged by the county W. C. T. U. president, in consultation with your National superintendent. This conference was very helpful, and is the key-note of my request that we may aim to have as many of these gatherings as possible in each state during the coming year. To any one who contemplates arranging such a conference I will gladly send a program of the one held in Hartford, which will be the best answer to the question, "How shall it be done?"

The advance along the following lines to which your attention was last year called has been gratifying, and it is expected that 1893 will witness far greater progress: (1) The securing of adult honorary members for our Legions; 2) The holding of L. T. L. county conventions, and the organizing of county Legions, full directions for which will be found in National Leaflet, No. 208. Let all who have objected to these conventions please note that they bring together children only from such distances that they can return the same day; that they come either in barges, private conveyances, or by train, under the charge of adult leaders, and spend a few hours of happy time together, as at a Sunday-school picnic, but going home always with deeper impressions of temperance truth, with total abstinence purposes, strengthened by intercourse with those who are pledged as they are; (3) The formation of state Legions, as soon as any considerable number of graduates has been secured. We would call the attention of those who have not favored these organizations to the fact that they are composed exclusively of older boys and girls, who travel to the conventions in company with adult leaders, and that the dignified and business like methods of conducting those conventions cannot fail to develop our young people in ways most to be desired. We are sure that attendance upon one of these gatherings would disarm all prejudice.

Special work for our Legioners: This must be the completion of Miss Gordon's plans for the Columbian Exposition until the time limit for that work is reached. As the Temple has for several years past claimed the largest share of the children's contributions, while we will not cease to encourage their efforts in this direction, it seems only fair that the Temperance Hospital shall be the special object of our contributions for 1893. Money is no doubt the most acceptable gift, and I wish many states might each endow a bed or furnish a room in the children's ward. But contributions of table linen, bed furnishings, towels, pretty fancy and useful articles to brighten the rooms, interesting books for the library, canned fruit and jellies, all will be acceptable.

Our 7 p. m. concert of prayer is not for any one year, but is our perennial source of strength. Let our prayer-text this year be Psalm 62: 5.

Within a few months our comrade, Mrs. Belle Sasser, state superintendent of Tennessee, has rested from her earthly labors. One who knew her well, testifies that no sweeter, more consecrated spirit has ever been counted in Tennessee's white ribbon army. I had always recognized her from her letters, (never having had the pleasure of a personal acquaintance) as one of the most interested and faithful of the state superintendents. When so near death that she could no longer speak above a whisper, she dictated her state L. T. L. report, and her dying message committed to her husband for Tennessee was in regard to the future of the Loyal Temperance Legion. I feel that the soil of that state is hallowed by her life and labors and death. Let her voice come to each one of us from beyond the shadows saying, "Work while the day lasts, for the night cometh."

I greatly regret that my associate, Miss Gordon, is too far away to append her signature to this bugle call; but did I not have reason to believe that she will give heartiest indorsement to its utterances, I should not send them forth. Yours for the best attainable results,

HELEN G. RICE, Nat. Supt.
1597 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

ITEMS FROM THE NATIONAL CORRESPONDING SECRETARY.

Last year the General Officers appropriated fifty dollars of the organizing fund to Oregon and the state president was informed of the action. It seems that the money was not drawn, and that the report given at Denver was wrong in this particular.

ORGANIZATION.

It should be stated that Mrs. Buell resigned from the department of organization at the Denver Convention. This year the National organizers are at liberty to make any arrangements regarding their work that may seem to them wise and best.

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Will all the friends of the department of soldiers and sailors take notice that the address of Mrs. McClees, the National superintendent, is not East Orange, but 22 State Street, New York City. It is very unfortunate for the work that there has been and is still, so much misunderstanding about this matter, but if all will henceforth bear in mind that the address is New York instead of Orange or Brooklyn, it will go far toward helping on the work.

Please also remember that the depot for special department literature and "America's Defenders" is at the same address.

Mrs. Bidwell, of California, has declined to serve as superintendent for sailors, therefore Mrs. McClees has kindly consented to take this part of the work for this year.

WOMAN'S LECTURE BUREAU.

During the last week many new names of lecturers have been added to the bureau and it now includes the following talent:

Susan B. Anthony for February; Rev. Anna Howard Shaw for March and April; Frances E. Willard; Lady Henry Somerset; Messrs. Wolfenbarger and Huckins; Miss I. C. DeVelling; Sarah M. Perkins during March; Anna Gordon, the World's W. C. T. U. superintendent of temperance work among children; Mary Sparkes Wheeler; Carrie Lane Chapman; Clara C. Hoffman, New Jersey, in February; Lydia J. Newcomb, lecturer on vocal and physical culture, in vicinity of Lancaster, Penn., from January 30 to February 7; Lillie Devereaux Blake; Elizabeth U. Yates in vicinity of Washington, D. C., the last week of February.

On account of the postponement of the New York constitutional conventions, because of Columbian year, Rev. Anna Shaw may be engaged for March and April. As the state has cancelled the time, these months are now open for engagements.

SACRED HOURS WITH YOUNG CHRISTIANS, by Bishop James W. Hott, D. D. A book of plain, practical truths on spiritual topics. Its aim is to encourage and strengthen young Christians in their best purposes.

W. J. Shuey, publishers, Dayton, Ohio.

DOWN IN DIXIE, by S. P. Allen, of the first Massachusetts Cavalry, is a volume of personal reminiscences of the war, incidents of life in the army, during encampments, battles, and the long, trying marches. The book has fitting illustrations by H. G. Laskey. It will be read with interest by young and old.

D. Lothrop Company, Boston.

CYCLE INFANTRY DRILL REGULATIONS, prepared by Brig. Gen. Albert Ordway, and CYCLIST'S DRILL REGULATIONS, UNITED STATES ARMY, by Lieut. William T. May. M. A. These are two diminutive volumes whose contents are briefly stated by their respective titles. The bicycle is being more extensively used and its use by militia is being actively considered. These handbooks will doubtless be of wide interest.

Published by Pope Manufacturing Co., Boston.

LETTERS TO A LITTLE GIRL, by Mrs Helen Ekin Starrett consists of a series of letters to "Norma" from a wise, kind friend, who is anxious that she shall attain to the very best of manners and habits. The letters are well written and the ground skilfully covered, and even if the young people for whom the book is designed should fail to give it careful reading, it will prove a good manual in the hands of mothers and older sisters.

Searle & Gorton, 69 Dearborn St., Chicago.

INTERWEAVING, by Lida A. Churchill, is a story for girls. The plot is intense but not overdrawn and the narrative full of pure, uplifting thought. Girl friendships is the central thought of the book, the author investing that ardent love between girls with a sweet dignity that cannot be scoffed at. Another special feature of the story is the power of prayer. It is a book that cannot fail of direct helpfulness to the readers for whom it is manifestly intended—girls.

James H. Earle, publishers, Boston.

THE BEASTS OF EPHESUS, by Rev. James Brand, D. D., Pastor First Congregational church, Oberlin, Ohio. This is a strong book written to aid young people in their mighty war against the world, the flesh and the devil. Francis E. Clark, whose clear understanding of the difficulties which beset the paths of young Christians, makes him an authority on these subjects, writes a most commendatory introduction to this book and the matter of the volume itself bears him out in all he says. Dr. Brand discusses in the several chapters the relations existing between the young Christian and the City, Money, Bad Books, the Theatre, the Card Table, Clubs, the Popular Dance, the Sabbath, Social Purity, Market Infidelity, the Majority, the Weed, and in conclusion, "Christ's Appeal to the Heroism of Young People."

If there is one thing more than another against which a young life rebels, it is arbitrary decisions concerning its conduct of life; it has within it the divine desire of choice and will steer away from limitations the reasons for which are withheld. Dr. Brand anticipates this and talks with his audience from the standpoint of a sweet, serious reasonableness that cannot fail of winning converts to his cause.

SHORT TALKS ON CHARACTER BUILDING, by G. T. Howerton, M. S.

There are many books that offer advice and suggestion on the formation of character, some good, others merely repetitions of the commonly received wisdom of the day regarding duty and goodness, and the essentials of success. Mr. Howerton has taken up his pen as a practical observer and student of life. The reader is impressed on opening the book that the author is in thorough earnest and does not merely deal in words. He analyzes the three fundamental elements of a true individuality—birth, education, regeneration, and transfers their relation to the future of the youth or maiden. The constituents of character and disposition are defined at length, and the influences portrayed that make or mar the noblest attributes. What marriage has to do with us and for us, come in for a good share of consideration, and naturally enough the common habits of society are critically diagnosed for what they are worth. It is a book that we can commend to the parent and teacher, and to young people as a real help toward the understanding of character and toward its improvement in the most desirable lines.

TO OUR READERS.

The January number of Current Topics, whose advent we noticed in a recent issue, is fresh from the press. It appears as a 64-page magazine of the size of the North American Review and is filled brimful of the choicest matter. Miss Harriet Monroe, author of the Columbian Ode, writes a salutatory poem in her characteristic vein. Mrs. Potter Palmer, president of the Board of Lady Managers of the Columbian Exposition, begins in this issue a series of articles upon the great enterprise of which she is head. An article appears in full in this number upon "The Need of Universities in the United States," by the famous historian and philosopher, Hermann Edouard von Holst, Ph. D. It is a clear, practical and most readable statement, the unveiling of a new idea by a recognized authority. The magazine is especially fortunate in presenting an article from the Rev. Josiah Strong, D. D., whose "Our Country" is still fresh with the reading public. Dr. Strong's subject in Current Topics is "The Mission of the Church." A bright thing is the verse Edwin R. Champlin has contributed to this number. Each reading gives an added meaning and to paraphrase the dozen lines would require a dozen more.

Robert Lowry, D. D., is still another contributor world famous. His "Shall We Gather at the River" and "Where is My Wandering Boy To-night?" have been time-tried. Current Topics has provided for all classes of people. Prof. A. Alonzo Stagg, known as Yale's base ball pitcher, end-rush and all-around athlete, writes "Some Observations on Western Foot-ball." Prof. Stagg's article will be appreciated by all, and to many will be worth the year's subscription. Mr. Joseph Jefferson ("Rip Van Winkle") writes most entertainingly under the title, "Stars and Cryptograms." High class fiction also finds a place, "The Wolf's-bane," by Edwin H. Lewis, beginning with the January number. Such is the menu of a single volume.

Current Topics starts out with the plan of equaling the best magazines at a popular price. It itself aims to be popular. It will present the ablest thought in readable rather than technical articles. The best things in poetry and fiction will be offered. The management aims to make any one number worth to its readers the cost of a whole year's subscription. The day of the one cent daily is here. Why not a high-class, popular magazine for $1 per year? Thousands of subscribers are necessary to the success of the venture. We believe they will come. So much is offered for so little that Current Topics needs only be known, then success is certain.

We take pleasure in offering as a special inducement for subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL a club rate—both for one dollar. Sample copies of Current Topics, 15 c.; per year, $1. Address Current Topics, Box 977, Chicago, Ill.

DO YOU WANT A FOUNTAIN PEN?

Always ready, at home or abroad, portable, satisfactory, fountain pens are one of the most desirable of modern inventions. Well, we can help you to get one—one of the best. We have tried them—use one of them daily, and like it better than the Paul E. Wirt pen we have used so long. It is a Rapid Writer Fountain Pen. If you go to a store to buy one they will ask you $2.50 to $2.75. Now we will send you one that will be perfectly satisfactory, and THE UNION SIGNAL one year for $2.25, and guarantee satisfaction. AN OAKVILLE MIRACLE.

THE REMARKABLE CASE OF MR. JOHN W. CONDOR.

A Helpless Cripple For Years—Treated by the Staff of the Toronto General Hospital and Discharged as Incurable—The Story of His Miraculous Recovery as Investigated by an Empire Reporter.

[Toronto Empire.]

For more than a year past the readers of the Empire have been given the particulars of some of the most remarkable cures of the 19th century, all, or nearly all of them, in cases hitherto held by the most advanced medical scientists to be incurable. The particulars of these cases were vouched for by such leading newspapers as The Hamilton Spectator and Times, The Halifax Herald, Toronto Globe, Le Monde, Montreal; Detroit News, Albany, N. Y.; Journal, Albany Express and others, whose reputation placed beyond question the statements made.

Recently rumors have been afloat of a remarkable case in the pretty little town of Oakville, of a young man recovering after years of helplessness and agony. The Empire determined to subject the case to the most rigid investigation, and accordingly detailed one of our best reporters to make a thorough and impartial investigation into the case. Acting upon these instructions our reporter went to Oakville and called upon Mr. John W. Condor (who it was had so miraculously recovered), and had not long been in conversation with him when he was convinced that the statements made were not only true, but that "the half had not been told." The reporter found Mr. Condor at work in one of the heaviest departments of the Oakville Basket Factory, and was surprised, in the face of what he knew of this case, to be confronted by a strapping young fellow of good physique, ruddy countenance and buoyant bearing. This now rugged young man was he who had spent a great part of his days upon a sick-bed, suffering almost untold agony. When the Empire representative announced the purpose of his visit Mr. Condor cheerfully volunteered a statement of his case for the benefit of other sufferers. "I am," said Mr. Condor, "an Englishman by birth, and came to this country with my parents when nine years of age, and at that time was as rugged and healthy as any boy of my age. I am now 29 years of age, and it was when about 14 years old that the first twinges of inflammatory rheumatism came upon me, and during the fifteen years that intervened between that time and my recovery a few months ago, tongue can hardly tell how much I suffered. My trouble was brought on, I think, through too frequent bathing in the cold lake water. The joints of my body began to swell, the cords of my legs to tighten, and the muscles of my limbs to contract. I became a helpless cripple, confined to bed, and for three months did not leave my room. The doctor who was called in administered preparations of iodide of potassium and other remedies without any material beneficial effect. After some months of suffering I became strong enough to leave the bed, but my limbs were stiffened and I was unfitted for any active vocation. I was then hampered more or less for the following nine years, when I was again forced to take to my bed. This attack was in 1886, and was a great deal more severe than the first. My feet, ankles, knees, legs, arms, shoulders, and, in fact, all parts of my frame were affected. My joints and muscles became badly swollen, and the disease even reached my head. My face swelled to a great size. I was unable to open my mouth, my jaws being fixed together. I, of course, could eat nothing. My teeth were pried apart and liquid food poured down my throat. I lost my voice, and could speak only in husky whispers. Really, I am unable to describe the state I was in during these long, weary months. With my swollen limbs drawn by the tightening cords up to my emaciated body, and my whole frame twisted and contorted into indescribable shapes, I was nothing more than deformed skeleton. For three long, weary months I was confined to bed, after which I was able to get up, but was a complete physical wreck, hobbling around on crutches a helpless cripple. My sufferings were continually intense, and frequently when I would be hobbling along the street I would be seized with a paroxysm of pain and would fall unconscious to the ground. During all this time I had the constant attendance of medical men, but their remedies were unavailing. All they could do was to try to build up my system by the use of tonics. In the fall of 1889 and spring of 1890 I again suffered intensely severe attacks, and at last my medical attendant, as a last resort, ordered me to the Toronto General Hospital. I entered the Hospital on June 20th, 1890, and remained there until September 20th of the same year. But, notwithstanding all the care and attention bestowed upon me while in this institution, no improvement was noticeable in my condition. After using almost every available remedy the hospital doctors — of whom there was about a dozen—came to the conclusion that my case was incurable, and I was sent away with the understanding that I might remain an outside patient. Accordingly from September, 1890, to the end of January, 1891, I went to the Hospital once a week for examination and treatment. At this stage I became suddenly worse, and once more gained admission to the Hospital, where I lay in a miserable, suffering condition for two months or more. In the spring of 1891 I returned to Oakville, and made an attempt to do something toward my own support. I was given light work in the basket factory, but had to be conveyed to and from my place of labor in a buggy and carried from the rig to a table in the works, on which I sat and performed my work. In August, 1891, I was again stricken down, and remained in an utterly helpless condition until January, 1892. At this time Mr. James, a local druggist, strongly urged me to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. I was prejudiced against proprietary medicines, as I had spent nearly all I possessed on numerous highly recommended so-called remedies. I had taken into my system large quantities of different family medicines. I had exhausted the list of liniments, but all in vain, and I was therefore reluctant to take Mr. James' advice. I, however, saw strong testimonials as to the value of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills as a blood builder and nerve tonic, and thinking if I could only get my blood in better condition my general state of health might be improved, I resolved to give Pink Pills a trial. With the courage born of despair I bought a box, but there was no noticeable improvement, and I thought this was like the other remedies I had used. But urged on by friends I continued taking Pink Pills, and, after using seven boxes, I was rewarded by noticing a decided change for the better. My appetite returned, my spirits began to rise, and I had a little freer use of my muscles and limbs, the old, troublesome swellings subsiding. I continued the remedy until I had used twenty-five boxes, when I left off. By this time I had taken on considerable flesh, and weighed as much as 160 pounds. This was a gain of 60 pounds in a few weeks. My joints assumed their normal size, my muscles became firmer, and in fact I was a new man. By April I was able to go to work in the basket factory, and now I can work ten hours a day with any man. I often stay on duty overtime without feeling any bad effects. I play baseball in the evenings and can run bases with any of the boys. Why, I feel like dancing for very joy at the relief from abject misery I suffered so long. Many a time I prayed for death to release me from my sufferings, but now that is all gone, and I enjoy health as only he can who suffered agony for years. I have given you a brief outline of my sufferings, but from what I have told you can guess the depth of my gratitude for the great remedy which has restored me to health and strength.

Wishing to substantiate the truth of Mr. Condor's remarkable story the Empire representative called upon Mr. F. W. James, the Oakville druggist referred to above. Mr. James fully corroborated the statements of Mr. Condor. When the latter had first taken Dr. Williams' Pink Pills he was a mere skeleton—a wreck of humanity. The people of the town had long given him up for as good as dead, and would hardly believe the man's recovery until they saw him themselves. The fame of this cure is now spread throughout the section, and the result is an enormous sale of Pink Pills. "I sell a dozen and a half boxes of Pink Pills every day," said Mr. James, "and this is remarkable in a town the size of Oakville. And better still they give perfect satisfaction." Mr. James recalled numerous instances of remarkable cures after other remedies had failed. Mr. John Robertson, who lives midway between Oakville and Milton, who had been troubled with asthma and bronchitis for about 15 years, has been cured by the use of Pink Pills, and this after physicians had told him there was no use doctoring further. Mr. Robertson says his appetite had failed completely, but after taking seven boxes of Pink Pills he was ready and waiting for each meal. He regards his case as a remarkable one. In fact, Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are recognized as one of the greatest modern medicines—a perfect blood builder and nerve restorer—curing such diseases as rheumatism, neuralgia, partial paralysis, locomotor ataxia, St. Vitus' dance, nervous headache, nervous prostration and the tired feeling resulting therefrom, diseases depending upon humors in the blood, such as scrofula, chronic erysipelas, etc., Pink Pills restore pale and sallow complexions to the glow of health, and are a specific for all the troubles peculiar to the female sex, while in the case of men they effect a radical cure in all cases arising from mental worry, overwork or excesses of whatever nature.

The Empire reporter also called upon Mr. J. C. Ford, proprietor of the Oakville Basket Factory, in which Mr. Condor is employed; Mr. Ford said he knew of the pitiable condition Condor had been in for years, and he had thought he would never recover. The cure was evidently a thorough one for Condor worked steadily at heavy labor in the mills and apparently stood it as well as the rest of the employés. Mr. Ford said he thought a great deal of the young man and was pleased at his wondrous deliverance from the grave and his restoration to vigorous health.

In order to still further verify the statements made by Mr. Condor in the above interview, the reporter on his return to Toronto examined the General Hospital records, and found therein the entries fully bearing out all Mr. Condor had said, thus leaving no doubt that his case is one of the most remarkable on record, and all the more remarkable because it had baffled the skill of the best physicians in Toronto.

These pills are manufactured by the Dr. Williams' Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y., and Brockville, Ont., and are sold in boxes (never in loose form by the dozen or hundred, and the public are cautioned against numerous imitations sold in this shape) at 50 cents a box, or six boxes for $2.50, and may be had of all druggists or direct by mail from Dr. Williams' Medicine Company from either address. The price at which these pills are sold make a course of treatment comparatively inexpensive as compared with other remedies or medical treatment.

Publisher's Notes.

EXTENDED.

Realizing that it was not possible for the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL to do all that could be done under our new and unparalleled offer, it has been decided to extend it, and it will hold good until March 1st 1893.

Please give attention to the following statement and proposition:

Fully believing that it would be one of the greatest aids to our cause, as has been said again and again in these columns, if THE UNION SIGNAL were more generally read, and being unable to personally canvass all the territory of all the local unions, nearly 10,000 of which are scattered over this country, and desiring your help in this direction, the proposition here outlined is made to all ages and sexes.

NOTE.—To any one, young or old, readers of "Aunt Jane's Cozy Corner" included, who will send us a club of eight new subscribers at one dollar each, we will forward promptly one of our beautiful W. C. T. U. solid silver after-dinner coffee souvenir spoons. These spoons have the die of the Crusade Church at Hillsboro, Ohio, imprinted in the bowl; Miss Willard's picture embowered in the National floral emblem, the trailing arbutus on the handle, while the top of the handle is surmounted by the world belted with the white ribbon. The back of the handle has the World's floral emblem, the water lily, and the initials of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association. These spoons are both beautiful and valuable, being of solid sterling silver.

REMEMBER, we will send an after-dinner coffee spoon, polished or oxidized, for eight NEW subscribers at one dollar a year.

FOR TEN NEW subscribers at one dollar each, we will send a similar spoon with gilded bowl.

FOR TWELVE NEW subscribers we will send a tea spoon of the same design, or with the Temple in the bowl, instead of the Crusade Church.

FOR FIFTEEN NEW subscribers at one dollar each, we will send a teaspoon with gilded bowl.

FOR EIGHTEEN NEW subscribers at one dollar each we will send an orange spoon, polished or oxidized, with the Temple or the Crusade Church in the bowl.

FOR TWENTY NEW subscribers at one dollar each, we will send an orange spoon, gilded bowl.

This offer is open until March 1st, 1893.

Signal Notes.

"WHATEVER makes men happier makes them better."—Ruskin.

IN ten years the schools in India increased one thousand nine hundred and six, while the attendance increased seventy-three thousand.

ALCOHOLISM may with good reason be termed the phylloxera of humanity in this nineteenth century, so says one of the leading newspapers of Geneva, Switzerland.

THE first lady of England has granted permission to a firm of whisky directors to advertise themselves as "by royal grant, purveyors of Irish whisky to Her Majesty."

THE correspondent of a Bombay paper states that he has it on good authority that there is a movement on foot among educated Hindu gentlemen which will ameliorate the condition of Hindu girls and do away by law with child-widows.

THE annual statement of the bureau of education has some interesting statistics. For the year 1891–92, there were 13,203,170 pupils enrolled in the public schools with an average daily attendance of over eight million. Of the three hundred and sixty-three thousand teachers, over two hundred and forty thousand were women.

IT is stated that quite recently the standard height required for military service in France has been lowered in order to escape the necessity of reducing the numbers of the army. It is no secret that physical as well as moral degeneracy follows in the train of the pestilence of modern society, viz: The drinking habits of the people.

IMAGINE the happy country where the law forbids the sale of liquor in the rural district and for the first and second transgression imposes a fine, and for the third, imprisonment. Such a country is Finland and the result is, according to those who know, a nearer approach to a total abstinence people than any other country can present.

A NOVEL race can be seen in a Connecticut city, a school-house running after a hotel. A wealthy citizen and liquor dealer built a large hotel with bar attached. The temperance men put a little school-house on wheels and run it near the hotel to stop the license under the church and school-house law. The owner says he can put his hotel on wheels too. Education driving off the liquor traffic!

OWING to outside pressure, the Art Museum of New York was opened on Sunday. This experiment has not paid in dollars and cents even, for the committee reports a loss of four hundred and six annual members and the four thousand and six dollars from them. They know of large bequests revoked, because of Sunday opening. They will also be in debt several thousand dollars, because of Sunday expenses. There are two sides to the dollar and cent question, even.

A CONVERTED anarchist's confession is as follows: "I was an anarchist because I loved beer. I loved beer because I was an anarchist. My wife loved me and ours, but I loved my anarchy and beer. She went to work to support my beer and my anarchy. I abused the capitalists for making me poor. Finally, I abused my wife. . . . I became a Salvationist and stopped abusing my wife and the capitalists who didn't care for my abuse, and stopped drinking beer."

Changing Diseases.

In that delightful book, "Rudder Grange," the husband of Pomona gives as his reason for not removing from a malarial neighborhood, that it don't do for a man at his time of life to go about changing his diseases, and adding, that there are diseases incident to almost every locality, and he likes a disease he is used to.

Now, in case of malarial diseases, aside from the unwillingness of patients to "change diseases," it is generally not convenient to change their residences. If this were done in every case, some of our most thriving communities would be depopulated.

Nothing is left to do, therefore, but to fortify one's self against malarial influences. For this purpose Drs. Starkey & Palen's Compound Oxygen has proved itself in the past 23 years, the most efficient thing in the world. Witness a single letter among hundreds:

"DRS. STARKEY & PALEN:—We are situated in the midst of one of the worst malarial regions, where microbes wait you at every breath, and low typhus fevers and that dread enemy, La Grippe, reign supreme. Unfortunately this winter, being out of Compound Oxygen, La Grippe seized me in full force, with its most excruciating sciatic pain, symptoms of paralysis, and all the discomforts of influenza.

"Immediately we requested a supply of Compound Oxygen, and in three days after its reception I was bounding upward like a gazelle, Grippe free, whilst many were dying in our neighboring towns and the country about us. Others dragged through weeks of suffering to be more dead than alive when pronounced out of danger by the physicians. The first inhalation removed the sciatic pain, also paralytic symptoms. Equipped with a supply of Compound Oxygen, I would not fear a trip through African swamps or Indian jungles. Let me urge each victim of any disease whatsoever to try it thoroughly. JENNIE M. HARRISON, Folsom's Find, near Buckland, Ohio."

Any person desiring to change disease for good health should write us a plain statement of their case, when, if possible, the way will be pointed out. The consultation is without charge. Address DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch St., Philadelphia, or Chicago, San Francisco, New York, and Toronto, Ont.

A Pretty Surprise.

Our new, beautifully illustrated and charmingly bound edition of Longfellow's "Evangeline," is a pretty surprise to book-lovers. It is in good type, with 45 illustrations by Birket Foster and other eminent artists, printed on very fine and heavy paper, gilt edges, remarkably handsome cloth binding, combining the delicate colors, blue and white and silver and gold. No illustrated edition has ever before been published at less than $1.50, and that is about what you might "guess" the price of this to be, but it isn't—we sell it for 19 cents! plus 6c. for postage, if by mail. This covers only about the cost of manufacture by the 100,000, our object being, not profit, but to show the book-loving public what can be done for a little money. Every home ought to have a copy, so charmingly beautiful, as a poem, as a collection of artistic illustrations, and a product of the book-making art.

Great Offer. Samples of the books being our best advertisements we offer: J. Fenimore Cooper's "The Pilot," cloth 20c., postage 9c. Scott's "Ivanhoe," half-morocco, gilt top, 35c., postage 9c. —only about the cost of manufacture by the 100,000 copies—our profits must come on future orders which these samples induce you to send.

Any Book supplied; the Britannica at one-sixth its former price is a fair illustration of what we are doing for book-buyers all along the line; 128-page Catalogue sent for two-cent stamp.

Please mention this paper when you write.

IN MEMORIAM.

Via Japan.

BY REV. J. P. HUTCHINSON.

["I did not wish to come to Japan, but now I feel that the hand of God was in it."—Letter from Miss Mary Allen West.]

Oft we are led to go,
Whether we will or no,
Whether for weal or woe,
Out of the light;
Leaving the fireside cheer,
Leaving the friends so dear,
Turning with t-embling tear,
Into the night.

Not in the light alone
Is God's good guidance known,
But in the dark is shown
More of His grace;
Sometimes He takes us out,
Where are no friends about,
And to remove each doubt
Shows us His face.

Sometimes He has to wean
Us from the sweet and seen,
That we on Him may lean
And strength be given;
Yielding the joys of yore,
We see the bliss before;
God shows the Evermore,
And takes to heaven.

God's ways are higher far,
Than our poor projects are;
'Tis not for us to mar
His loving plan;
We thought in light she'd roam,
Back with rejoicing come;
God meant to take her home
Via Japan.

Mary Allen West.

Childhood and Educational Period.

BY PROF. GEO. CHURCHILL.

In 1835 Rev. Geo. W. Gale, of Whitesboro, N. Y., drew up a plan and issued a circular for the founding of a Christian colony, a Christian church and a Christian college in the then "new, far-away, wild West." He soon surrounded himself with a band of earnest, intelligent Christian men and women who were imbued with a true missionary spirit, and were willing to leave their pleasant homes in the East for the purpose of planting Christian institutions in the "far West." Among these men was Nehemiah West, of Ira, N. Y., who, a born leader, became at once an influential man in this band of colonists, and led the pioneer company to the location which he had helped to select, in Knox county, Illinois, reaching there on June 2, 1836. The colony had purchased a small farm with a log house or two upon it in the edge of the beautiful grove, about two and one half miles north of their village site. Soon a number of log houses were added and a meeting and school-house of "Shakes" and the village was christened "Log City." In this "Log City" the first child of the colony, Mary Allen West, was born on July 31, 1837.

The summer of 1838 found most of the colonists in their new homes on the beautiful prairie, and all earnestly at work in carrying their great plan into execution. This young girl, as soon as she could hear and understand, listened at morning, noon and night to the conversation relative to the founding and building up of a Christian community and Christian college. Living continually in such an atmosphere it would have been passing strange had she not been filled with a missionary zeal that increased with her years and became the ruling motive of her entire life.

As a school-girl she was as happy and frolicsome as a girl could be, was fond of school, learned most easily and rapidly, and at the early age of thirteen years was fitted to enter the freshman class in the college which had grown up with her growth. As she was younger than the prescribed age for entrance she taught a country school for a term or two, much to the satisfaction of pupils and patrons. Her school was not a particularly quiet one, for her ever-bubbling enthusiasm created a kindred bubbling in her pupils, very business-like if not very quiet.

She entered upon her collegiate course as soon as she was old enough, and was graduated in 1855, at the age of eighteen. Her natural enthusiasm and conscientious devotion to whatever she undertook characterized her as a scholar, as it has characterized her subsequent life.

After graduation she was an assistant in the preparatory department of Knox College for some time, and then was employed in the city schools of Galesburg more or less for several years.

Early in the Civil War there was a great influx of contrabands into the abolition town of Galesburg, all filled with a desire to learn to read and write. A colored school, composed of pupils from seven to thirty or more years of age, was organized, and Miss West was unanimously selected by the School Board as the teacher. In this school she found a field of labor in which her life-long anti-slavery principles, her missionary zeal, her consuming desire to improve and elevate all with whom she came in contact, found full scope for activity, and her eminent success in this work gave an indication of the career in store for her in the future.

After the colored school was merged into the other city schools, because the grown-up pupils had left the schools, Miss West became a teacher in the High School of the city. During all of her years of teaching she was engaged in good works in all of the great charitable movements of the day, and also in the still better work of tenderly caring for an invalid mother and an invalid sister.

In 1873 much to her disgust as well as surprise, Miss West was nominated for the office of county superintendent of public schools, and was elected by a handsome majority. While she shrank from the publicity to which the office called her, her desire to do all in her power to improve the schools of the county led her to accept the place.

She carried her natural enthusiasm into the administration of her office, and soon began to show her power of organization and bringing order into what had been heretofore done in a haphazard way. She so performed the arduous duties of her office during her first term of four years as to receive by acclamation her nomination to the second term of office, and was elected by a large majority. This term was as successful as the previous one, and at its close she had, by her never-flagging enthusiasm, her unwearied and persistent labors to build up the schools, won the good will and encomiums of the great majority of the citizens of the county. True it is that she made some enemies, for she would not condone wrong practices in any officer connected with the schools.

The close of her official duties as superintendent of county schools proved to be the close of her distinctively school educational career, as she was soon called into a much wider field of activities, where her natural characteristics, developed, improved and strengthened by her previous labors, have made her a power for good, such as she had never dared even to dream of in her early days.

"Give her of the fruit of her hands and let her own works praise her in the gates."

What Means It?

["Mary Allen West died Thursday."—Cablegram from Japan.]

BY ALICE M. GUERNSEY.

What means it, O comrades? Beside the blue waters,
Scarce a twelvemonth ago flashed the Azrael sword.
And hands that grew weary in flush of life's dawning
We folded to rest, while the Angel of morning
Whispered low to our hearts, "'Tis the touch of the Lord."

The days of the year, in their fulness of glory
Rounded on to its golden and perfected noon.
And out on the waves, with its prow to Life's portals,
A bark speeded onward to join the Immortals,
And we whispered, "At even the Pilot guides home."

And now in the fields of the harvest eternal,
With her arms full of sheaves for the Master she loved,
The Lord of the harvest calls homeward the reaper,—
And still to our hearts is the mystery deeper,
And we question, "Why, thus, must His workers be proved?"

What means it, O comrades? The clouds gather darkly,
And our eyes see but dimly the pathway we tread.
The onset of foemen sounds clearer and clearer,
Our captains are falling, and nearer and nearer
Flash the lightnings of God in the darkness o'erhead.

O comrades, tried comrades, the faithful and tested,
From the Land of the Sunrise a message I hear.
It rings through the midnight of pain and disaster,
It echoes, as erstwhile, the voice of the Master,
"Hold you steadfast, brave hearts, be ye still of good cheer.

"Let ranks be unbroken! Come closer together!
Be still, that ye lose not the Master's commands.
We watch you, beloved, we linger beside you,
We know of the dangers that daily betide you,
We hear the glad chorus that circles the lands.

"'What means it?' you question—the isles give you answer,
Echoes back the glad word Fujiyama's fair hill.
The kingdoms of earth to our Christ have been given.
His will shall be done upon earth as in heaven,
And the work of the Lord—He will care for it still."

The Church and Missionary Work of Miss West.

BY REV. A. R. THAIN.

Mary Allen West is best known to the large public as a zealous worker in the cause of temperance reform, but to those who knew her most intimately she was first, last and always a Christian, and all else that she was or did was but the abundant fruitage of a life which drew its vitality from Him who came to heal the hurt of sin. Her Christian character was so sweet, strong and symmetrical that she was loved and honored most in the "Old First Church," which she loved so well that she never removed her membership from it, and in the work and fellowship of which she came to be,

"A perfect woman, nobly planned,
To warn, to comfort and command;
And yet a spirit still, and bright
With something of angelic light."

Having been her pastor for nearly a decade while she resided at Galesburg, Ill., I desire to contribute to the memorial number of THE UNION SIGNAL a wreath of forget-me-nots gathered from the rich garden of her religious life.

I have not space to speak particularly of her early religious life. She was the first-born of the Galesburg colony in a double sense, for not only was she the first child who saw the light in "Log City," near the prairie site of the proposed college town which her parents with others had come to establish, but among all the noble sons and daughters who owe their birth and training to Galesburg, the name of Mary Allen West stands first in merit, as well as in order.

Her father was a man of strong religious character, whose death at a somewhat early day was greatly deplored; and her mother was an "elect lady," shut in by invalidism while I knew her, but so spiritual in the tone of her daily life that to visit her seemed to bring one

"Close upon the shining table-lands
To which our God Himself is moon and sun."

Miss West united with the church when she was quite young, and there is not a line of Christian activity in which she was not interested. Her sympathies were so catholic that they included everything which gave promise of helping struggling humanity, and the sphere of her activity widened to take in so many departments of gospel work that her eager zeal made her the overtaxed woman who recently lost her life for Christ's sake and the gospel's. To her might well be applied the words:

"Because the woeful cry
Of life and all flesh living cometh up
Into my ears, and all my soul is full
Of pity for the sickness of the world,
Which I would heal, if healing may be found
By uttermost renouncing and strong strife."

It was altogether in keeping with the fitness of things that the first child of the Galesburg Colony should be animated with a zeal for reforms. The air of the place was rich in moral ozone, and she heard the language of reform from pulpit and platform, in the family and in society, until to sympathize with all who are in any way oppressed became as natural as breathing, and as "deep almost as life." After the abolition of slavery, the temperance reform engaged her attention more and more until it became her main vocation; but God gave her "largeness of heart exceeding much, even as the sand that is on the sea-shore," so that every true reform found in her an advocate and helper.

She was eminently successful as a teacher in the Sunday-school. It seemed to be foreordained from the foundation of the world that no young lady could long listen to her instruction without becoming a Christian. But conversion was only the first step in the spiritual culture of those who enjoyed her instruction. It was not safe to sit before her Sabbath after Sabbath unless one was ready to follow Jesus wherever He might go. It was more than whispered that mothers who were not willing to have their daughters go to the ends of the earth as missionaries would better keep them from entering that class. Miss West would gladly have gone to foreign lands herself had not an invalid mother required her care; but the foreign field gained recruits not a few from her faithful instructions, and the bread which she cast on the waters came back after many days, for when in far-away Japan she fell asleep in Jesus, it is one of God's beautiful providences that she finished her course in the missionary home of Mrs. Lila Willard Winn, ministered to in her last moments by the loving hands of her former pupil.

I will not take time to speak of Miss West's work in connection with a select band called the "Prairie Gleaners," a society the wonderful esprit de corps of which is seen in the eloquent fact that during its existence nearly one half of its members became missionaries, neither shall I speak of her missionary work through other channels, but when the Books are opened it will be found that her prayers, her gifts, and especially the inspiration of her evangelical zeal, have done much to forward the command: "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature."

And when I turn to speak of her daily Christian walk, like the sailor of the Arabian story when he stood in the "Valley of Diamonds," I find myself in the midst of such a wealth of good deeds that I can select only a few of the gems.

Who that knew her can forget that kindly face, which could pass from smiles to tears more swiftly than the changes of an April day; that brave, cheerful disposition, which made her a walking benediction; that genial humor, untinctured with the bitterness of satire; that charity so broad and inclusive that it ministered even to the prisoners in the county jail; that unselfish spirit which led her to fill every waking hour with helpful ministries; that strong common sense which so readily winnowed the chaff of sophistry from the wheat of fact; her readiness to champion every good cause to the full limit of her time and strength; her clear spiritual vision which never permitted the splendor of unseen things to "fade into the light of common day"; her victorious faith which would accept no lesser motto than "The World for Christ"; her warm and constant affection which won her troops of friends wherever she went; her genuine humility, which was never lessened by the increase of her world-wide honors; and all of those unnumbered deeds of love which made every day of her life a fair page of a convincing treatise on the evidences of Christianity.

It is fitting that such a life should receive due honor on earth; and Christ's words in the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew leave us in no doubt as to her reward in heaven.

In that dread day when all mankind shall stand
To answer for their deeds in the body done,
Who then shall win the favor of God's Son,
And on His right hand form that happy band?
Shall kings stand first? Shall conquest's sworded hand
Take heaven by force? Or shall any one
By wealth or learning, rank or power, so run
As to obtain, and Christ's "Well done," command?
Ah, no! but they who give the hungry meat;
Who slake hot thirst; who take the stranger in;
Who clothe the naked, and by service win
Health for the sick, or shall set captives free;
These, bowing low before the Judge's feet,
Wondering, shall hear Him say, "Ye did it unto Me."

Good-Bye.

BY LOUISE S. ROUNDS.

Say not "farewell" to friends who fall asleep
In Jesus, for the word is cold and dreary;
But say "good-bye," it is so warm and cheery;
A Presence that abides the while we weep.
May "God be with you," that is what we cry,
When our poor lips can only frame "good-bye."
Oh, touch his hand, lift up thine eyes and see,
He goes with them and yet abides with thee!

Mary Allen West as an Editor and Philanthropist.

BY FRANCES E. WILLARD.

From the earliest days of my association with the modern temperance movement as represented by white-ribboners, I have known, trusted and loved Mary Allen West. According to my recollection she was one of the leaders at the first W. C. T. U. convention of Illinois in October of 1874, when we rallied to the call of Mrs. Jane Fowler Willing, and organized one of the earliest state branches of the National W. C. T. U., our object being to preserve the fruits of victories won by the Woman's Temperance Crusade of the preceding winter.

Miss West was accompanied by her devoted friend and comrade, Mrs. Wait, of Galesburg, which was the native town of our strong-hearted editor. Mrs. Wait subsequently became president of the Illinois W. C. T. U., while Mary Allen West continued for some years in her responsible office of superintendent of the public schools of Knox county. At every large meeting in Illinois, these two faithful and true leaders, who had a development of brain altogether uncommon among either men or women, and a devotion that was practically limitless, were to be seen side by side and well nigh hand in hand. They always agreed, which is something most uncommon when individualities are so pronounced as theirs. Mrs. Wait's calm, motherly face and character contrasted well with Miss West's splendid energy and remarkable quickness of mind and rapidity of execution. Mrs. Wait was a woman of the people; she had little college education, but a great soul. Miss West was also a woman of the people, built up and out by thorough college training, having graduated with honor from Knox College, the chief institution of its kind pertaining to the Congregational church in Illinois. The Rev. Dr. Gulliver, now for many years professor in the famous Theological Seminary of Andover, Mass., was president of Knox College, and Hon. Newton Bateman, one of the ablest men that Illinois has produced, was another; but by all means the most celebrated graduate was Miss West. She took her diploma at eighteen years of age, and entered at once upon the work of teaching, for which, as has been well said, "she was doubly qualified by love of learning and love of learners." Her success in this line was one of the upbuilding forces in Galesburg, and later throughout Knox county, where for nine years she filled an elective office, although she and her fellow women could not cast the vote for the incumbent of that or any other office.

THE LOG HOUSE IN WHICH MISS WEST WAS BORN.

I well remember when she declared herself in favor of the ballot for women. It was at the annual meeting of the Illinois W. C. T. U., held at Lake Bluff in 1881.

Our women were then in a transition state of mind on this great subject; the theme had been presented to them and they were taking sides. A resolution in favor was pending in the convention when Miss West, at that time, as from the very first, a great power in the W. C. T. U., came forward to speak. I can see her now as she stood there, a strong, sturdy figure, with intellectual head well set on her broad shoulders, and her face lighted up with thought, feeling and indomitable purpose. Whenever Miss West spoke she had the attention of her hearers, for her own earnestness was so great, and the clearness with which she presented her arguments was so attractive to the mind, that we could not do other than listen. She now declared that although born of New England stock, her father and mother coming from New York state with a colony founded in the interest of universal brotherhood and prohibition, she never, up to this time, had seen her way clear to declare in favor of Woman's Rights; but to-day it came to her as a voice from on high that she must stand with the radicals in the convention on this decisive issue. She said she felt as she did when she was converted to Christianity; although reared in a Christian home, there was a time when she personally gave her allegiance to Christ, and now, although born on an Illinois prairie, in the midst of a colony of progressive people, she felt that personally she was entering into an experience not only of quickened perception, but of profound religious conviction. She believed that it was borne in upon her spirit from above to take sides in favor of this unpopular cause; "to sink or swim with it: survive or perish."

Her impassioned words made a deep impression on the convention, and were perhaps the determining force in the decision then and there made, and ever since bravely adhered to, that the ballot for women is one of the ways out of the whisky wilderness, and should be worked for and welcomed by the women of the prairies.

Later on when the women of Illinois felt it to be their duty to declare that they could not stand in relations of equal friendliness with one political party that ignored, another that opposed, and a third that declared for prohibition, Miss West experienced a deeper sense of her duty to stand boldly forward in favor of such action, and her considerate, womanly but heroic handling of THE UNION SIGNAL—a Gatling gun that she trained upon the enemy "without haste, without rest"—gave the best possible proof that she had "come into the kingdom for such a time as this."

But from the time that she consecrated her remarkable talents to the W. C. T. U., she gave up the career that had opened so brightly before her as a teacher, and traveled over her great state, organizing, systematizing and drilling the workers until she brought an administrative force into the field that has not been excelled. Eleven years after she became a white ribbon soldier she was called to the editorship of THE UNION SIGNAL, now the organ of white-ribboners in all parts of the world. It was not an easy matter to follow an editor of such calibre and culture as Mary Bannister Willard, who, in the five years of her work had built up the paper to a high standard in literature as well as reform; but Miss West had a practiced pen and was able to turn off editorials, paragraphs, stories, articles and talks with the children with unequaled rapidity and credit. As a "general utility" actor on the stage of journalism, I have never met her superior; fertile in resource, tireless in industry, devoted in purpose, she dignified the editorial chair, and polished to a brighter hue the editorial pen, so that women in journalism gained incalculably from the quiet work, she wrought. Besides her editorial achievements, Miss West wrote leaflets, pamphlets, gospel talks, responsive readings, a book on the W. C. T. U. school of methods, and finally—her magnum opus—"Childhood; Its Care and Culture," a volume of divinity on that theme divine. I venture to say that her book will do more good if placed in the hands of young mothers, and studied in the nurseries of America, than all the other work accomplished by this throbbing, tireless steam-engine of a pen; for, great as she was in administration and as a journalist, this book will be her most enduring monument, and I hope every mother who reads these lines of affection and appreciation will make it her business to see that the book is introduced into every local union of the nation.

It was Miss West who originated the expression that has gone to the world's end in our work: "In order to succeed a white-ribboner must have grit, grace and gumption."

and if it is possible to love "a soulless corporation," she certainly loved the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association as if it had been human. She had great delight in showing visitors through and over all the departments of the office, from the humming presses in the basement to the editor's sanctum in the upper story; hundreds will testify to the genial courtesy with which she acted the part of cicerone to our visitors from all parts of the world. What she sacrificed for this cause words cannot adequately tell; she was a most generous woman. not only in ideas, but in matters of finance, never seeking to build up her own fortunes but willing to invest her salary to the last dollar, almost, in taking stock in the W. T. P. A., to help it along when it was in the earlier years; and in its later giving unstintedly the labor of hand and brain to advance its best interests. The same was true of her relations to the Woman's Temple, of which from the beginning she was a director, and which she forwarded to the utmost of her power from first to last. We all regret that she never saw that stately pile in its completion, and it was a memory of unutterable pathos to her comrades who on the tenth of December conducted her memorial services in Willard Hall.

Miss West was also from the first a director in the Woman's National Temperance Hospital, which more than any one else she helped to build up by the click of her untiring pen; indeed, there is no branch of our great work which has not felt the touch of her warm and kindly hand. She was for years, and until the last, at the head of our school of methods, the object of which was to give systematic instruction to all our workers, and to indoctrinate new-comers in the principles, plans and philosophy of the movement, which none understood or had helped to formulate better than she. I remember going to the Deaconess Home on the north side (presided over by Mrs. Lucy Ryder Meyer, in her way a woman as indomitable as Miss West herself); here the young women were gathered in the chapel, and our Union Signal editor was stirring up their pure minds by way of remembrance of their duty and pleasure as temperance reformers. She had every eye and ear, and the good she did in those lectures was incalculable. Besides all this, Miss West was president of the Woman's Press Association of Illinois, and did not content herself with being a mere figure-head; this was not according to her nature and temperament, but she was really the president and contributed of thought, time and work to the advancement of that helpful and noble association among women. With all her other cares she frequently visited Bethesda, a mission of the Central W. C. T. U., of which she was long chairman, and it is lamentably safe to say that probably no call upon her for coöperation and help in any society was ever altogether pushed aside.

It was her one fault (who, although not free from foibles, as none of us are, yet had so many virtues that faults fail of remembrance) that she would every day work harder than she was able; for although she had a splendid physique, it was noticeable in these later years that the wheels worked with more of friction than in the earlier, and her comrades were wont to beseech of her to drop some of her responsibilities, to take longer vacations, to do anything, in fact, that would give her more variety and opportunity for recuperation. But her "rest was not quitting the busy career"; it was only going from one line of exhaustive care on to another, so that though she was persuaded to take the year 1889, she held her schools of methods in Florida, North Carolina, Tennessee, Maine, Illinois and Washington. By means of correspondence she had organized these schools in every part of the nation and was their steadily inspiring force. Going out on this work she left The Union Signal in charge of Miss Julia Ames, her beloved associate, who conducted the paper most ably, as its readers testified. It was characteristic of Miss West's generous nature that, on her return, in writing a sketch of Miss Ames for The Union Signal, she went so far as to say that it had been not only as well, but in some respects better edited in her absence than when she was there. How very few would ever have made an admission of that kind. To do so was a royal action and revealed what I regard as the crowning trait of her character, namely, a certain greatness of soul, which, when I think of it, crowds any momentary impatience, chiefly, if not entirely, the result of overwear, out of memory altogether.

My relations with Miss West were always pleasant. Both of us keyed up mentally and often overworn by work, we never had a word that was not sisterly and kind, as I remember now with profound thankfulness. She was a frequent visitor at Rest Cottage, and I think my blessed mother had no more devoted friend. Miss West had greatly suffered from the loss of her own mother, and she seemed to turn to my mother as to one who could in some measure console her great, aching heart for such immeasurable loss. I remember the last time that they were together, only a few weeks before Miss West started on the journey from which she never returned. Several of us went to church and left them in the pleasant family parlor of Rest Cottage on a sunny Sunday morning. Coming home, they both turned to us their bright, inspiring faces and said, "We have had a splendid morning talking of the things of God." How little they dreamed they were so soon to be with Him in the upper and brighter home!

When mother went away she left a little remembrance for Miss West, a book that I sent to her in Oregon with a letter of tender memory and affection, to which she replied in her usual frank, warm words. She wrote me also from the ship. She was well, courageous, full of plans for the systematizing of white ribbon work among the bright, warm-hearted people of Japan, and she was making acquaintance with many whom she thought would be of service. She said that perhaps she should wish to stay long enough to go on to China as she had been strongly urged to do so by the missionaries among her fellow passengers. I wrote her that, as she was one of our leaders, we wished her to do exactly what she thought best when she should be on the ground to see for herself. These were the last letters we exchanged.

Miss West had a talent of discerning talent in others; it was she who nominated Miss Julia Ames to be her associate in editing The Union Signal, and it was through her invitation that Miss Margaret Sudduth, now our managing editor, became connected, first with the Oak and Ivy Leaf, then with The Union Signal. It was Miss West who mentioned Miss Alice Briggs (now World's W. C. T. U. office secretary) to me, as a desirable incumbent of that position, saying that she had observed her work as a district president in Illinois, and knew that Miss Briggs was capable no less than faithful.

If the minutes of the National W. C. T. U. were studied, as I hope they will be by her future biographer, it will be seen that Miss West was the trusty counselor of all those who helped to mould the National W. C. T. U., and that her advocacy caused many a measure to be carried that might otherwise have failed. The times are innumerable when I have sought a moment with her, asking her to defend from the floor some proposition of my annual address, or to speak for a pending motion or resolution that I felt to be important; I do not remember an instance in which we ever disagreed, and so ready was her appreciation that a single sentence in her ear was worth more than a long explanation to many others of equally excellent intention.

Her last letter to me has the following characteristic paragraph which I quoted in my annual address: "Now for a plan I have for a session of the World's School of Methods. It is that we should hold a methods school in Chicago and have it include the time of the World's Temperance Convention It seems to me that each would be a valuable object lesson to the other. We should, I think, have half-day sessions in which the departments should be brought out each by a specialist in attendance for that purpose."

We had expected her to be with us, and that her school of methods would be one of the most attractive and helpful features of the World's W. C. T. U. Convention, to be held in connection with the Columbian Exposition, June 8 and 9, 1893. Alas, who shall take up the splendid work that has so suddenly fallen from those faithful hands?

On the 12th of December, 1891, Miss Julia Ames, perhaps the closest and most beloved friend of Miss West, was suddenly called away from her side into the world unseen. Three days later, at Rest Cottage, we had an informal loving service in memory of Yolande, whose casket lay in the bay window of our busy office. Miss West came up from the city, and I remember how heart-broken she seemed as I put into her hand the Bible of the young editor, which I had found in her room, and wherein were marked her favorite passages. I asked her to read selections, which she tearfully promised to do, and her voice almost broke with emotion as she performed a duty so sacred and sad. We went together to the funeral at Streator, fifty miles away, the strain of which, with the grief I felt and the exposure, brought to me a severe attack of la grippe, from which I have not, perhaps, yet recovered. Miss West did not thus break down, but went back to her office, for an editor's duties are inexorable, and she had no choice, unless severe illness should drive her from her sanctum. Her friends at Headquarters noticed the growing tokens of great fatigue and nervous wear. About three weeks later the International Press Association passed through Chicago on an excursion to California. Miss West was heard to say how much she wished she could go with them, for she had a very dear niece in Southern California whom she wished to visit, and all felt that the change of scene would do her good, but she did not see how she could leave. Then her comrades at Headquarters combined to urge that she must go. The board of directors of The Union Signal met that day and lent their influence to the plan, making up a purse that should help defray expenses. In this wholly unlooked-for emergency Lady Henry Somerset and I agreed to stand as best we could in the position of editors during Miss West's absence; this helped to clear the way in her own mind, and she agreed to go. I remember her coming over to see Lady Henry and myself in the lodgings of the former only a few hours before her departure with the excursion; she seemed distressed to go, and as much distressed to stay. Her grief for Yolande, the loss of that tender sympathy and capable companionship were overwhelming. She felt the kindness of her friends, and yet did not like to leave so suddenly. We three talked the whole subject over, and she suggested that we should kneel in prayer. I remember how earnestly we all prayed, and she the most so of all, with strong crying and tears; when we rose from our knees she embraced us both, saying, "I feel that it is best and right; I will go away and try to build up; change of scene is the best medicine." So we said good-by, expecting to see her again within six months or a year, just as she might determine on looking over the field when she was less wearied and worn.

The Union Signal has chronicled the exploits of Miss West on the Pacific Coast; the demands upon her time were of course great; it is not often that an expert of her power and experience goes to the more distant parts of the world. She held many schools of methods in centers of interest and power, addressed many audiences from Los Angeles, California, to Seattle, Washington. We corresponded extensively concerning her embassy to other countries; she at first intended going to the Sandwich Islands and afterwards to Japan, but changed her plans and set out for the Flowery Kingdom from Vancouver on August 31, 1892, as a passenger on the steamship Empress, making the voyage in thirteen days and arriving well and in good heart.

Of the heroic efforts she put forth in the eleven weeks between the time of her landing and the date of her departure for heaven, her own paper, The Union Signal, has told at length. No woman was ever received in Japan with greater honor; the welcome to the Prince of Russia alone equaling that accorded to our white ribbon chief. Perhaps no soldier on a moral battlefield ever wrought with greater diligence and valor; and then, in the rich maturity of her great powers, in the Christian home of a school-mate long loved in the home land, she grew weary; the quick hand dropped, the kind face paled, the weary body "fell on sleep" and the victorious spirit returned to God who gave it.

BY WARNER SNOAD.

Friend whom I never saw! and yet whose soul
Lay clearer to my soul than some at hand,
Between us now the eternal waters roll,
Gone to your home in Heaven's far distant land.
Distant, oh, no! just where the sunset lies,
Fringing its crimson with an edge of gold;
Some day my eyes will look into your eyes
With joy and welcome, fathomless, untold.
Farewell till then! beyond death's chilling tide
We'll meet where life is bliss and memory glorified.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

Looking backward is not a state of mind that is desirable to be cultivated, but there are times in every life when the path we tread with swiftly moving feet becomes hedged up with some great calamity, and the objects we have been pursuing with such avidity sink into insignificance. For sheer relief we turn to the past and think of days when our sun seemed unclouded.

The pitiless cablegram that reached Chicago from Japan, December 3, announcing the death of Mary Allen West, came with blinding force. Could it be that that great unselfish soul had passed so suddenly from her work of love and marvelous activities for the Japanese, into the hush of death and the peace of heaven? Was it possible that our eyes should behold her no more on earth?

Her last letter was looked up—what a new and tender meaning every word in it put on since the great heart that wrote it was still. With tear-dimmed eyes the writer looked back upon the sweet comradeship of years. How vivid it all became! All flaws in the character of the loved friend seemed to be swept away by the sacred and awful hand of death, and only that which was noble and worthy of imitation remained.

MISS WEST'S LAST HOME IN GALESBURG.

For thirteen years I had been intimately acquainted with Mary Allen West. This close intimacy came about at the time of the incorporation of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association. She was one of the seven historic women that were selected as a committee to consider the advisability of starting a weekly temperance paper for the W. C. T. U. The first meeting was held at the home of Mrs. Zerelda Wallace, of Indianapolis, Indiana, November 1, 1879; during the meeting of the National Convention of the W. C. T. U., was the time. The first meeting was one of waiting upon God on our knees asking His direction. At the next meeting we decided to start THE UNION SIGNAL and incorporate the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association.

Mary Allen West was made secretary, and from that time until the present she has been yearly elected to the position which she filled with great ability. She was one of the most potent factors in building up our publishing house. Her love and interest in the W. T. P. A. was unbounded, she was always ready to fill any gap, no matter at what cost or inconvenience to herself. In 1883 while superintendent of schools for Knox county, she gave up her summer vacation and came to Chicago to edit THE UNION SIGNAL in order that Mrs. Mary B. Willard, then editor, might go to Europe on a much needed vacation. Miss West could not be prevailed on to take any remuneration for these labors.

Again in 1885 she performed the same service when Mrs. Willard went to Berlin, and when Mrs. Willard decided not to return Miss West became editor-in-chief of THE UNION SIGNAL. She was greatly beloved by the entire force (which numbered about a hundred and twenty-five persons). She was, in fact, a mother to them all. Their need was her opportunity. No matter what form of wrong-doing brought them sorrow and suffering, her heart was moved with sympathy and pity, and her hands went out in helpfulness; indeed, the poor and unfortunate of whatever class or character ever found in her a sympathizing and generous friend.

She had pity on every one but herself. She was a merciless worker. I have often seen her when half sick get up in the morning and write as many letters before breakfast as the average woman would turn off in a whole day. She knew not how to care for herself nor what rest meant. The Japanese aroused all her sympathy and love. It made her utterly forget the needs of her own body, and through self-forgetfulness and a desire to be helpful our great-hearted Miss West became a self-immolated martyr for the cause of Christian temperance in Japan.

THE STORY OF HER ILLNESS.

To the Editor of The Union Signal:

MY DEAR MISS WILLARD:—The cable has informed you of the great bereavement which has befallen you and your associates. It is my sorrowful duty to give you some account of Miss Mary Allen West's last illness and death.

She had planned to come to Kanazawa on November 16, and remain till the 21st. But for reasons not necessary to explain here those plans were changed, and she came one week later. Instead of coming to Kanazawa from Nagoya, she went from there to Yokkaichi. While waiting for a steamer to go to the latter place she was in some way, we do not know just how, so exposed that she got wet, and, not having sufficient wraps with her, caught cold, she said. After this, she went to Kyoto and Osaka, and worked very hard in those cities, speaking three to five times per day to such large audiences that it must have been a very severe nervous strain upon her.

When she left Osaka for this place she was not feeling well, but gave the subject no special thought. She had a half-day's journey by rail, and then two full days by jinrikisha to reach us. The end of the first day's jinrikisha ride brought her to Fukui. There she was welcomed by Rev. and Mrs. Fulton, of the American Presbyterian (North) Mission. An audience was awaiting her at the missionary's house, and so she ate her supper very hastily. After that she addressed the people who had come to hear her, talking till ten o'clock. This so wearied her that sleep was impossible that night.

On arising the next morning she was ill, so ill that she said it seemed impossible for her to make the journey which was before her in order to meet her appointment for the next day. In spite of the urgent invitation of the Fultons to remain a day for rest she started out to travel fifty-five miles that day by jinrikisha! She was so ill by the way that her Japanese attendant was greatly alarmed. He took her into the wayside tea-houses two or three times to lie down and rest. It was only through her strong determination to do so that she was enabled to get here.

As our custom is in the interior cities of Japan, Mrs. Winn and a large number of Japanese ladies went "to the end of the town" to meet and welcome Miss West to Kanazawa. After greeting each other Miss West said, "Oh! Lila, I am so sick. Get me to your house as soon as possible." On reaching the house she went at once to her room, and, with Mrs. Winn's aid, retired. She never left that room alive.

There for a week she battled against an insidious disease, hoping and wishing to live that she might finish the great work in which she was engaged. She earnestly begged us not to let her die, saying, "Oh, save me; don't let me die." This we understood to mean she wanted to live for her work's sake.

Many times she showed her thoughtfulness for those who were caring for her. Though in greatest distress, she said, "I am afraid you are hurting yourself." "I want you to go and get some rest," and many such expressions. Even the children in the house were thought of and she asked to have her chart (manikin) taken out and shown them. She was a most patient sufferer. No complaint was uttered though she could not understand why this illness had befallen her, just at this time.

Until the eighth day (December 1st) her intense desire was to live and continue the service of her Master. On that day the lady watcher said, "Don't you want to go and be with Jesus?"

"Oh, yes! so much."

"Then you will see your mother and sister too."

To this she exclaimed, "Oh, mother, mother!"

At about two o'clock in the afternoon there came a Japanese telegram saying that there would be a special prayer-meeting for Miss West in Yokohama at three o'clock. Just about that hour, she said, "I am going." A little later, "I want to go." Up to this hour she had evidently clung to the hope of recovering. But now she was made willing to have God's will done. When told a little afterwards that she would soon be at home, she said cheerfully and unhesitatingly, "All right."

From that time she rapidly failed till at a few minutes before seven o'clock her breathing ceased. It was so perfectly peaceful and quiet an ending of her life that we scarcely knew when the last heaving of the breast took place. We who were gathered around her had just commended her soul to God, when He took her unto Himself.

Miss West was Mrs. Winn's teacher in school and Sabbath-school for many years. They were also long and intimately associated in both city and foreign missionary work. Her visit to our house was therefore especially anticipated. It was almost like having a mother come to see us. On arriving at Yokohama, Miss West wrote saying that her first thought and wish was to get out to Kanazawa. At a later date when it seemed likely that she could not come, she wrote expressing herself as desirous of seeing our faces once more this side of heaven! I mention this intimate love which had long existed between Miss West and Mrs. Winn to assure you that everything possible was done for the comfort and restoration of the sick one. We are but a small missionary company out here, but among the members there are some excellent nurses. Everybody was willing and eager to render all possible aid.

We are far away from European physicians. This city is on the west coast, a little north of west from Tokio. It was some time before Miss West would consent to our calling a native doctor. When we did call on them for help they did all they could for her. They were most willing and kind. The governor of our prefecture, Mr. Luzuki, sent special messengers several times to inquire about Miss West, and to offer any assistance we might call for. It was through his prompt response to my request that the Secretary of State sent a special permit to Dr. Miller to come out to attend Miss West. I don't know that such a thing was ever done before, but so great was the interest which Miss West had awakened throughout the country in her work, and herself, too, that anything possible was gladly done for her.

At her funeral in this place, on the 4th inst., many of the highest officials, both civic and military, were present. The church was full to overflowing, so that a great crowd who could not get in was in the yard and street. There were three addresses, all, of course, in Japanese. Rev. K. Banno, pastor of the First Presbyterian church, spoke first. I followed him and was followed by Rev. T. Todo, evangelist. The hymns sung were, "My Jesus, as Thou Wilt," and "Asleep in Jesus." These two were in Japanese by a quartette of missionaries. "Safe in the Arms of Jesus," and a chant. "Beyond the Smiling and the Weeping," were sung in English. "Asleep in Jesus" was sung by the pupils of the Kanazawa girls' school. The Scriptures read were Psalms 90 and John 14. This chapter in John was the last passage from the Bible which she asked to have read to her.

It seems a mysterious providence which brought Miss West out to this distant city to die at the house of an old pupil and friend. Many were the prayers we offered to Him who was able to raise her up from that illness. While we pleaded for her life we prayed that His will should be done. And we are dumb before Him, for we know that He has done this and dare not murmur against it.

The first thought of every one is that perhaps her death will accomplish more than she could have done had she lived to carry out her purposes more fully. In a note of sympathy received to-day, the writer says, "God grant that her death be a strong appeal to Japan for temperance and purer morals." By this providence God has strangely and strongly called the attention of all your readers to Kanazawa. Miss West came here to speak to the people, but God's will was that she should lay down her life without a single utterance to them.

We are praying for you in your hour of sad loss and affliction. Will you not pray for this city that God's Spirit may use this sad event to bring souls into a knowledge of His glorious salvation, into which Mary Allen West entered from this place! Yours in sadness and hope of the gospel,

THOS. C. WINN.

Kanazawa, Kaga, Japan, December 6, 1892.

HER DEVOTED FRIEND'S ACCOUNT.

KANAZAWA, JAPAN, Dec. 6, 1892.

MY DEAR MISS WILLARD:—Mr. Winn has written an article for THE UNION SIGNAL in regard to the last days of our beloved Miss West, but I think I must send you a few more particulars concerning her illness.

From the very first her symptoms were very grave, I thought, and when I found that she would not respond to any treatment that I could give her I became thoroughly alarmed. Of course, I did not let her know how anxious I was, but I think she knew very well that she was seriously ill. She had been overexerting herself for some time past and had no reserve force with which to resist disease.

We are far away from all medical aid except native physicians and we have no great confidence in them, so we yielded to her request and took care of her without other help.

On Sunday we sent a telegram to Kyoto, asking a foreign doctor there to prescribe. Word came back to use a medicine we had already tried without success, but recommended a Japanese physician. We called him at once.

At about this time Miss West began to say, whenever we tried something new, "If this fails, what next?" and that was just what I could not answer. I think she began to realize that it was doubtful if she could recover, though she seemed determined to do so. It was very difficult for her to speak toward the last as her tongue was so swollen, but she said she had no special messages to leave if she should be taken.

On Monday afternoon she consented to have us wire for a foreign doctor, but owing to difficulty about getting a passport, he could not start until Thursday morning when it was too late to help her. He arrived two days after her death, but it was a great comfort to see him and talk the case all over and the treatment we had given. He assured us in strong language that he thought nothing could have saved her from the first. He says that at her age, congestion of the kidneys is almost certain death. He is a very fine physician but said that quite recently he had lost two cases exactly similar in symptoms. He had given active treatment from the first, but they grew gradually worse and died within a week.

The coffin was mostly made at our house, as of course no one here knew how to make it. We had black broadcloth put outside and puffed white silk inside.

Mr. Nemoto, of Tokio, has come to take the remains with him. He will start to-morrow and probably a large procession will follow the remains to the end of the city.

If we did not know that this most unexpected sorrow was permitted by our Heavenly Father, it would indeed be hard to bear, but as it is, we can only pray that His name may be glorified in it all.

You have our sincere sympathy in this great loss, but I trust the Lord will raise up many more workers to carry on the work that has been dropped by our dear Miss West. Yours in sorrow, LILA C. WINN.

December 7.—This morning we accompanied the remains to the end of the city and all the last sad rites are ended with us. Surely our "joy was turned into sorrow and our laughter into mourning."

A TESTIMONY TO MRS. WINN'S DEVOTION.

KANAZAWA, Dec. 4, 1892.

MY DEAR FRIENDS:—I wanted to testify concerning the loving devotion with which Mrs. Winn ministered to Miss West during her severe illness. No daughter could have done more for a mother than she did for her. You know I presume, that Mrs. Winn was a pupil of Miss West's in Knox College for several years, and their affection for one another seemed very tender indeed. Mrs. Winn had looked forward with such pleasant anticipations to this visit from her and we had all prayed that her coming might be a great blessing in every way to the Kanazawa work. It does indeed seem a strange providence that called her so suddenly from her work, but He who doeth all things well knows why it was best.

Mrs. Winn was quite alarmed on her arrival to hear of her suffering by the way from Fukui, but she insisted it was only fatigue from the journey and perhaps a little overwork. But when she was still unable to get out of bed the following morning, and the next, and one trouble and another began to develop, Mr. and Mrs. Winn grew very anxious indeed, but Miss West insisted she was perfectly content with the medicines and treatment Mrs. Winn gave and no physician was needed, that she was only a little run down and would soon be her usual self again. They seem to regret now that they did not insist more on calling a physician sooner, but I think they have no reason whatever to reproach themselves for doing as they did, for they were carrying out her wishes exactly. The three Japanese physicians did what they could but we all feel that the disease was beyond the reach of human aid. I do not believe any physician could have helped her. The foreign ladies here did what they could to assist Mrs. Winn in watching with her during those days and nights of suffering, but there seemed to be something in Mrs. Winn's voice and touch that comforted and pleased her in a way that those of us who were strangers could not do, and it was such a joy to Mrs. Winn to do everything that was in her power to do. She was beside her almost constantly day and night. I wish Miss West's friends in Japan and America could all know how tenderly and lovingly she was cared for by both Mr. and Mrs. Winn in her last days. I thought it would comfort them to know she lacked for nothing that it was in their power to provide.

The funeral services were held this afternoon at our largest church, which was filled to overflowing. They were very impressive and beautiful, I thought, and I trust may prove a blessing to all who were there. The Governor and many of the highest officials were in attendance and many who perhaps have never attended a Christian service before. God grant that great good may follow this sad, mysterious providence.

Dr. Miller arrived here last night. Mrs. Winn has been greatly comforted since her talk with him. He says the most skillful attendance from the very first could not have saved her life. I am glad for Mrs. Winn's sake that her mind is thus relieved of the fear that possibly something more could have been done but was not.

Yours in love and sympathy,

MRS. LAURA M. NAYLOR.

THE CONSUL'S LETTER.

UNITED STATES LEGATION, TOKIO, Dec. 7, 1892.

Miss Frances E. Willard, Chicago:

DEAR MADAM:—You have learned by cable of the sad death of Miss Mary Allen West, of Chicago. At the time she was at Kanazawa, a remote city on the western coast of this country. As yet I have only communicated with Mr. Winn (at whose house she was staying) by telegraph and cannot therefore give you such particulars as you probably desire; others will, I presume, however, write you before this mail leaves.

At the time of her death she was staying with her old friend, Mrs. Winn, and had every attention possible both from Mrs. Winn and the other ladies of the city and from the physicians who were summoned to attend her. Upon hearing of her death I telegraphed to have the body embalmed, in anticipation of the wishes of her family and friends to have the remains sent to the United States.

The road from Kanazawa to Tsuruga, the nearest point on the railway line to Tokio, is about one hundred miles long, and rendered hard and difficult by reason of recent heavy falls of snow. It will take some days before the body which will probably have to be borne on the shoulders of men, will reach Tokio, which is about three hundred miles further from Tsuruga.

I called upon Mr. Mutsu, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, who kindly permitted Mr. Sho Nemoto, an attaché of the Foreign Office, to proceed with Mr. Miyama, sent by Japanese friends to Kanazawa to bring the remains to Tokio. Both of these gentlemen have taken great interest in Miss West's work, and have coöperated with her. The Japanese people have been more than kind and sympathetic, and are desirous of having funeral services here in order that they may show respect to her memory. Owing to the time that it will take to bring the remains to Tokio and for the services here, they cannot be sent to America before the steamer leaving here on the 20th inst. Upon the arrival of the body at Tokio a committee of Japanese and foreign friends will take charge of it, and leave nothing undone which is proper and appropriate upon such occasions. I understand also that it is proposed that some foreigners shall accompany the Japanese who have gone to Kanazawa to bring hither the remains upon their return journey.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANK L. COOMBS.

SHO NEMOTO'S ACCOUNT.

HOTEL KOMESHICHI, TSURUGA, JAPAN,
6 A. M., December 4, 1892.

Miss Frances E. Willard:

MY DEAR PRESIDENT:—By the cable of the death of dear Miss West you are shaken. I can here not write just what I wish as I am on the way to go to Kanazawa to bring her remains (body) from Kanazawa to Tokio, nearly four hundred miles, partly by rail, partly by foot.

Mr. and Mrs. Winn, of Kanazawa, and others, wrote you the event so I will not write. However, Miss West has done the work in Japan almost all, with one exception, of Nagasaki, before she went to Kanazawa. We did not put the name of Kanazawa on the program, but her dear old pupil, Mrs. Winn, invited her most cordially, and though she once decided not to go to Kanazawa, as many said very cold, bad weather in the season, but Miss West bravely changed her plan to accept the invitation and went.

As I wrote you Miss West went and put the temperance seed where no temperance worker went before, or never visited. Her life is living here in Japan in the spirit and truth more than you can possibly imagine. I got the first information of her visit was:

KANAZAWA, Nov. 26, 1892.

Dear Mr. Sho Nemoto:—Miss West arrived in Kanazawa Wednesday evening. Has been very ill ever since, is still in bed. She is with a dear old friend and former pupil, consequently she is well taken care of. She hopes to be in Tokio for the Conference.

Very sincerely yours,

CORA B. LAFFERTY.

So you see Miss West had the very best care can be taken in Japan. Since we Tokio people had pray-meetings and sent telegrams all over to the temperance friends in Japan. I was running to friends and American Legation. Minister Coombs and Dr. Whitney in the Legation are so kind to us.

JAPANESE TELEGRAM ANNOUNCING MISS WEST'S DEATH.

Mr. Ando, the president of Tokio temperance society, and Mrs. Yashima, of Tokio W. C. T. U., and all workers are busy in this sudden information and we took every step we need.

The last telegram was:

KANAZAWA, Dec. 1, 9:56 P. M.

Sho Nemoto, Tokio:—Miss West has slept (died). WINN.

Since we have telegraphed many to the Japanese government gave special facility, given order to the governor of Kanazawa prefecture, and I was specially sent to the place by foreign office. So I am going to Kanazawa with Rev. K. Miyama, my dear friend, the M. E. pastor in Tokio. We left Tokio by the night train (9:50 p. m.) the 2d inst., and three hundred miles reached here the termination of railroad. We have snow here one foot, some places are two feet, so the road is very bad. From this place, Tsuruga, to Kanazawa, the distance is eighty miles but takes two days' trip as we have jinrikisha (two or three men). Some places cannot ride but walk. We sent telegrams to Tokio, American Minister and Mr. Winn, of Kanazawa. We shall reach Kanazawa to-morrow night—the 5th of December.

The principal telegrams:

KANAZAWA, 6:30 P. M., Dec. 2, 1892.

American Minister, Tokio:—We desire Kanazawa burial. Do you object? Embalming, transportation very difficult and expensive. Answer speedily.

WINN.

TOKIO, 7:30 P. M., Dec. 2, 1892.

Winn, Kanazawa:—Friends here earnestly desire body preserved. They defray expenses. Sho Nemoto goes to Kanazawa to assist in bringing body back.

COOMBS,
Ambassador from United States.

I am just leaving this place for Kanazawa. Yours most sincerely,

SHO NEMOTO.

THE LITTLE JAPANESE GIRL'S PRAYERS.

13 TSUKIJI, TOKIO, JAPAN, Dec. 8, 1892.

MY DEAR MISS WILLARD:—The prayers of the Japanese for Miss West's recovery, even the little girls in our school, were extremely touching, as they plead for her life. They prayed, "Oh, Lord, she came to Japan to work a little while for us and our people; as we see things her work here is not finished. She has not visited all the cities where she was to work for Thee and as then there are her friends in America, the women of the W. C. T. U. with whom she has labored, oh, dear Lord, Thou knowest how sad and stricken will be their hearts if she is taken away; now, Lord, if in Thy great wisdom Thou canst spare her, do we beseech Thee, but help us to say from our hearts, 'Thy will be done.'"

It seemed not only to the Japanese, but to the foreigners here that her work was not yet done here. She had been received so heartily by all classes of people that we were hoping on her return to have our W. C. T. U. organized and united in work as never before, and now we are saying who will finish what has been planned and begun. No one has ever come to Japan who, in so short a time, gained such a hold on the hearts of these people. The Japanese said: "How well she understands just what we need; how does she know so quickly?"

Her home was with us during the few weeks she was in Tokio, and all learned to love her and many times the other teachers of our school said to me: "How anxious Miss West is that what she does should accomplish good. She does not care for praise or honor, only that her mission here shall not be fruitless." This was the secret of her power; eager to help others into a purer life and near to Christ. I went with her one afternoon when she was to speak before "the woman's club" of Tokio. This club is composed of the ladies of the nobility, Princess Mori being president. They had invited her to speak before them, an honor never granted any foreign lady before. Her subject was to be the work of the women in connection with the World's Fair. I can tell you there was as much temperance and purity in this as in any address I heard her give; and I heard many of those given in Tokio. She spoke before the pupils of the Peeresses School, illustrating her talks with the physiological charts, also before the Board of Managers of the Red Cross Hospital, among them being many princesses, Princess Komatsu being president.

They decorated her with the medal of their society. It seemed wonderful the way their doors opened to her, and yet never once was there an uncertain sound, but all heard of the evil effects of drink and tobacco. But you who have known and loved her so long do not need to have all these things told to you. Her firmness, her adherence to truth and principle are known to all, and I who had known her in the early days of my teacher's life, still found the same kind, motherly heart that made her the beloved of all who were teachers under her gentle rule when she was county superintendent of schools in Knox county, Illinois, which office she held for nine years.

It was not possible to get her body from Kanazawa in time to send on the steamer that sailed December 10. Mr. Nemoto and Mr. Miyama went from Tokio to superintend the removal thither. The nearest railroad station is about eighty miles from Kanazawa and there is no means of transportation only on the shoulders of men, and there is now much snow on that side of the island, so travel is very tedious and difficult; then there are seventeen hours by rail. We expect them Tuesday or Wednesday, December 14 or 15, then we are to have memorial services in Tokio, Saturday, December 17, at ten o'clock. The body will then be taken to Yokohama where memorial services will be held that afternoon when the body will be placed in a vault until the sailing of the steamer, December 20. Two ladies who are going to America on that steamer have offered to have it in charge and general oversight, and I have written some of our W. C. T. U. workers in San Francisco so they can arrange to take charge of it from there.

The American Minister has been exceedingly kind and thoughtful; also, Dr. Whitney, interpreter of the Legation, has given valuable assistance, so, too, has the Japanese Minister of Foreign Affairs, and the Japanese, as a people, take this as though she was one of their own, and have done all that is possible to aid in every way. I am sure others will write you, and I will send another letter when the gentlemen have returned from Kanazawa and given us all concerning the illness and death. May God comfort and sustain and bless all who mourn for her to-day.

Yours for God and Home and Humanity,

REBECCA J. WILSON.

THE SACRIFICE NOT IN VAIN.

TSU ISE, JAPAN, Dec. 5, 1892.

MY DEAR MISS WILLARD:—I was much shocked to learn two days ago through Mr. Tsuda and other friends of the death of Miss West. It was my privilege to see much of her and her work in Sapporo, and though having known her for only a short time, I learned to love her and to hope for grand results from her work in Japan. I can but feel sure that her loss will be a great blow to the work of the W. C. T. U., which she had so much at heart. As I think of her work in Sapporo and of all the excitement she has been under since she landed in Japan I know the nervous strain must have been intense. She seemed so well and full of enthusiasm that she overworked probably without her friends knowing how worn she was.

On leaving Sapporo we were traveling companions for a part of the journey home (only a day), and she seemed so happy over the reception she had met with in Hokkaido and the prospects before her that I gained courage to try to do something for temperance in this place.

Her name has been heard throughout Japan, and her life has not been sacrificed in vain. Her words, whether spoken or written, will have added weight since she has given so much for Japan. There is much more that I might say in her praise, but I will not write more now. May I, through you, convey to her friends my heartfelt sympathy for them in this deep sorrow. My own heart knows the trial of having loved ones go home with no word of farewell, because an ocean was between us. She has gone from the heat of battle to receive the crown of victory. May the workers who remain have added strength given them from the Great Leader.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANCES A. GARDNER,
Missionary A. B. C. F. M.

THE JAPANESE MEMORIAL.

217 HON MURO MOCHA, TOKIO, Dec. 7, 1892.

MY DEAR MISS WILLARD:—I cannot tell you how deeply we are sorrowing over the sad news which has been telegraphed to us from Kanazawa of the sudden death of our sister and fellow-worker, Miss West. We are as yet ignorant of the details and have only heard the mere facts of the sudden illness and quick summons. You will have heard of this sad affliction before this, and sudden and overwhelming as the news is to you who thought of her in her strength and vigor, it is no less sudden to us. As perhaps you may know, I was with her during her journeyings in Hokkaido, and daily I learned to admire her character, ability, tact and energy. How little did I think when seeing her untiring work for the Master, how soon she would be called to lay it down! Her work in the Hokkaido and Tokio was wonderful and inspiring, and our little band rejoiced at the new life which seemed to come to the cause, and we saw her leave Tokio for other fields, hoping to welcome her back soon. One can hardly imagine how much respect and love Miss West won in her short stay with us, and how deep the sorrow there is with each one of us. We cannot understand God's ways, but He saw it fit to call her right from the heat of the work, just after arriving at a new field of labor.

I cannot tell you of the details of her illness beyond that she was taken ill between Fukui and Kanazawa, and that after arriving at the latter place she did not leave her bed. She was at the house of Mrs. Winn, a friend and former pupil of Miss West, and from what I have heard of Mrs. Winn, I feel sure that Miss West had every care and attention that could be given. A doctor and nurse were to be sent from the Red Cross hospital here in Tokio, but it was too late.

We expect the remains to reach here in four or five days from now and you may well believe that everything will be done that can be done to show our respect for one, who, in the short time she was with us, has done so much for us.

On the day of Miss West's funeral, I have made arrangements to have cast, the bell of which I have written you, made of the metal from the pipes given up by those who no longer need them. Many of these pipes were collected by Miss West herself in her last journeyings when I was with her. The bell will have a suitable inscription, and will, I hope, be a memorial of her as well as of the temperance cause. It will be sent to you in the same ship that carries all that is left on earth of one of God's most faithful workers.

All the details I hope to write you later. At present we can only think of the sad loss to us and to America which this is—and I know how deeply you will feel it. Only faith in God's wisdom can assure us that it is best.

With heartful sympathy for Miss West's friends, and co-workers, and those who knew and loved her, I am,

Very sincerely yours, S. TSUDA.

THE INTERNATIONAL CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR PRESIDENT'S TRIBUTE.

IMPERIAL JAPANESE RAILWAY,
NEAR NAGOYA, JAPAN, Dec. 6, 1892.

MY DEAR MISS WILLARD:—I am now in that part of Japan where Miss West did her last brave work for "God and Home and Every Land." Not many miles from here her body is to-day being reverently borne from the city where she spoke for the last time to the nearest railway station, a hundred miles distant. I have just visited and spoken in several cities where she had recently addressed large audiences, and everywhere I have found that she inspired the utmost love and respect. Large audiences thronged to hear her in Tokio, Yokohama, Nagoya and other places where I have been, and I am assured by the missionaries and the Japanese themselves that few foreigners ever won in so short a time so completely the confidence and love of this people.

Her sudden death has impressed them most profoundly. At a meeting which I was addressing in Yokohama last Friday evening, near the conclusion of the services the sad news which had just come by telegraph was announced. The audience was visibly affected, and I could see on the intelligent faces about me expressions of deepest grief, though, of course, I could not understand a word that was said by the Japanese pastor who led the meeting. At once the meeting resolved itself into a prayer-meeting, in which I was told the burden of prayer was that the Christian Endeavor cause, of which the audience had just heard, might be advanced, and that Miss West's death and the lesson of her noble life might be blessed to all Japan.

She wore herself out for the cause. The strain of continuous speaking and traveling and visiting "between whiles" in this climate is very great. Who knows, however, but God has more to accomplish for Japan by her death than even by her life. Being dead, she will yet speak for many years to this people. "Miss West may be dead, but the seed she has sown in this land will never die," said an old Japanese lady to a friend of mine.

So believes, most profoundly, your sincere friend,

F. E. CLARK.

FROM A PERSONAL FRIEND.

221 BLUFF, YOKOHAMA, Dec. 7, 1892.

MY DEAR MISS WILLARD:—We hesitated about sending that terrible cablegram, knowing how shocked and grieved you would be to receive it, but it seemed best to do so. We grieve over the death of our dear Miss West. We had been planning to come home together—she and I—and I could scarcely believe it was really true as the telegram from Kanazawa stated, that she had "nemurimeshita," "gone to sleep," she seemed so strong and well except for a little weariness, when here. She has done a great work here. I accompanied her to Hakodadi, and know something of her abundant labors and wonderful success.

I hope to leave for home in January, on a vacation, when I will bring full reports of the work done and societies organized; also the names signed to the great Petition, besides her personal belongings, unless they have been sent before with the precious remains. She left us in good health apparently and good spirits for a month's trip in Southern Japan. I heard through the Japanese of her crowded meetings and did not expect letters. She is mourned all over the Empire, short as her stay has been.

Affectionately yours,

CAROLINE VAN PETTEN.

THE TEMPERANCE WORK SEALED WITH HER LIFE.

YOKKAICHI, Dec. 6, 1892.

DEAR SISTERS:—We sympathize with you deeply about Miss West's death. How sad you must be to lose such an earnest worker, especially in a strange land. We who have known her only a few days feel as if we had lost our dear mother. Indeed she is our mother, for by her motherly kindness and suffering this Yokkaichi W. C. T. U. is left as her first-born in Japan, for it is the first W. C. T. U. she organized in Japan. When we Japanese sign the pledge we first write our name, then put our seal on that to make it sure, so it looks to us like God has called her to rest and thus sealed the temperance work in our hearts with her life. We cannot forget her and the great good she has done for us, as long as we live. We shall record her name and work in Yokkaichi W. C. T. U. history; first for our own inspiration, because we love her; second, for the inspiration of others who come in hereafter. Yokkaichi is a very hard place, and the suffering of women caused by drinking and impurity cannot be expressed. Our society is only a month old babe; it must be educated and trained. We expected Miss West to do this, but as you know she has gone to her rest. Now, sisters, please help us in every way. Last night one of our members who went to Nagoya to meet her said with tears: "Every time I eat rice I cannot keep back my tears when I think how Miss West ate cold, hard rice in the boat on the way here." Another of the Christian members said: "Heaven seems nearer when I think of her smiling face."

Yours with sympathy,

TOMIYE KOMAI,
Sec. Yokkaichi W. C. T. U.

LAID DOWN HER LIFE FOR JAPAN.

MOYEBASHI, JOSHIN, JAPAN, Dec. 3, 1892.

MISS FRANCES E. WILLARD:—Now comes this sad telegram, "she sleeps" not to wake again; and once more THE UNION SIGNAL must put on the ashes of mourning because one more brave worker is taken away. But dear Miss West, how glad a surprise it must be for her to know no waiting time with folded hands, but to be taken immediately from the midst of work to rest and glory.

She must have been with a former pupil in Kanazawa, whom she was hoping to meet when she was here, and I know she must have had all done for her that needed to be done.

So it is, the work calls loudly the world over, while one after another the workers fall, and we can scarcely pause to cry out with pain and grief and loneliness, for the work must be done and we must press on to keep the ranks full.

I think there can be no question but that Miss West has done a noble work in Japan, and I am sure the Japanese will not be tardy in their expression of regret and gratitude for her work, and I think even her death will not be in vain, for they can but feel that she has laid down her life for Japan and her Master's cause.

Yours sincerely, H. FRANCES PARMELEE.

A JAPANESE MINISTER'S TRIBUTE.

No. 2, YURAKUCHO SAUCHOME,
KOJIMACHIKU, TOKIO, JAPAN, Dec. 7, 1892.

Miss Frances E. Willard, President of W. C. T. U.:

DEAR FRIEND:—This mail will no doubt carry you many letters containing the particulars of Miss West's sudden death written by her friends here. Thinking that a few lines concerning the same from me may not be altogether useless, I write the following brief account:

Miss Mary A. West arrived in Yokohama about the 13th of last September and went on a trip in company with Mrs. Van Petten of our mission to Hokkaido, the northernmost island of our Empire, working and lecturing at nearly all the important towns on the way, and came back to Tokio on the 17th of October. From that time up to the 8th of November she constantly worked in Tokio and Yokohama, giving lectures and addresses two or three times each day. Besides delivering public addresses in churches and halls, she was honored to have the opportunity of addressing the Ladies' Educational Society of Japan, composed of the ladies of the nobility alone, and Duchess of Mori at its head; and also the Red Cross society of Japan, at whose head is the Princess Komatsu. On the latter occasion Miss West was made an honorary member of the society and Princess Komatsu, herself, presented to Miss West a badge and certificate of membership.

On the 8th of November we went to the Shinbashi station to see her off for the trip south. She looked tired, but left in good, cheerful spirit promising to return to Tokio by the middle of December to see us once more prior to her expected departure to America. It was not in Miss West's original plan to go to Kanazawa at all, but Mrs. Winn, who was her pupil in America, and is now engaged in work in Kanazawa, wrote, urgently requesting her to come to that interior town and render a helping hand where it is so much more needed than the towns along the line of railroad where workers can be had always without difficulty. Miss West's self-sacrificing spirit yielded to the request of her friend and former pupil, and decided to undertake that difficult and toilsome trip.

Kanazawa is situated near the northwestern coast of the main island of the Empire, about one hundred miles from Tsuruga, one of the termini of the Hokkaido railway. The journey of this hundred miles in jinrikisha must have been very trying to her and brought sickness before she arrived in Kanazawa. It is deeply regretted here by us all that no one accompanied her from Tsuruga to Kanazawa. Had some one accompanied her the hardship of the journey might have been lessened, and the sickness which resulted in her death might have been checked.

The United States Minister, his interpreter, good Dr. Whitney, Brothers T. Ando, S. Tsuda and several others are making arrangements to hold a funeral service in the largest church in Tokio on the 15th inst. Brothers Nemoto and Miyama, the former a member of Tokio temperance society, and the latter one of our ministers, left here on the 2d inst. for Kanazawa, and they will bring the remains of Miss West by the 14th inst. Her funeral will be largely attended, without doubt, and will leave a lasting effect upon the minds of all who will attend. After the funeral we will follow her remains to Yokohama from whence they will be shipped home by the same steamer on which she had expected to sail for America. Her work has strengthened the temperance cause here but her death will solidify and perpetuate it, and her memory will remain in the hearts of grateful people here for whose sake she has sacrificed her precious life.

I remain yours truly in Christ, S. OGATA.

YOKKAICHI, JAPAN, Dec. 5, 1892.

"Write the things which thou hast seen."

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—As soon as I heard that Miss West was in Japan I wrote, asking her to come here to Yokkaichi and help us to more fully organize the temperance work. She complied with my request, and on November 11 she reached our house, together with the three Japanese who went to accompany her from Nagoya. She had waited and traveled for six hours on a coast steamer. She was cold, sea-sick and hungry. By some means the steamer was delayed three hours, and that, together with the three hours' ride, threw her late. We had arranged for a mothers' meeting at three p. m., so, after hastily eating her dinner, she went at once to the place of meeting, where about forty were awaiting her coming. She spoke about an hour, and to show you how true and loyal to our Master she was and how He blessed her work I wish to say that of the number assembled only six were Christians; the others were all Buddhist believers and had resisted every effort to interest them in Christianity. But humanity suffers. The evils of drink are found in all lands, and even among believers of all religions, so a common suffering drew all to hear her. As she spoke chiefly of the neglect of mothers in not training their children to shun the drink habit, the evil effects it has upon heart, head and hand, the effect on the soul, the certain destruction of a nation addicted to drink, and above all the unhappy homes it creates, I saw many heads bowed low, while the distress on the faces, the silent tears that fell unbrushed, told of the heart-breakings. As she urged them to awake and throw off the yoke that is oppressing them, she seemed to realize how helpless they are to do that without a living helper always near, so she urged them to ask the mothers' best friend to help them. Every woman listened with all eagerness, and seemed to drink in every word she spoke.

As we came away, an old lady seventy-five years of age said: "Oh, what shall I do! What shall I do! I did not teach my boy as I ought to have done." Another mother said: "From this time I shall live only to teach my children."

Twenty signed the pledge then. But from some home influence ten withdrew their signatures; ten are still faithful. Miss West then came home and talked some with the young man who was to interpret for her at the night meeting. Then saying she wished to rest, lay down for an hour.

At seven our meeting at the theatre began. About fifteen hundred were present. She spoke for two hours using her chart. Not a disturbance, not a disrespectful word from all that crowd; but all listened quietly, often applauding. The meeting over, she came home and retired.

Before she came to Yokkaichi I received a letter from Mr. Nemoto, who arranged her appointments for her, asking us to keep her until Monday, because she was very tired. So we, Mr. and Mrs. Hudson, Japanese Christians and myself, begged her to stay and rest, which she decided to do; and then proposed to have the following meetings: A workers' meeting, children's meeting and a meeting to organize a local W. C. T. U.

Saturday morning she rested and wrote to the Inter Ocean. In the afternoon we made a few calls. At night we had a workers' meeting (men's) and a short talk on how to work. Sunday morning she rested; in the afternoon she talked to the children for half an hour. At night there was a communion service at the church, after which Miss West talked from Romans 12:1. As far as I can learn, this was her first and last communion with Japanese Christians, and she seemed to enjoy it very much. While partaking of the emblems, the silent tears spoke the deep feelings of the heart. In her talk afterwards she said, "This is the first time I have had a chance to commune with Japanese Christians since I came to Japan and it draws me so close to you all; we are all children of the same God." Her earnest words spoken that night reached many hearts.

One man decided then to be a Christian and to sign the temperance pledge. In talking to him afterwards Miss West said: "I am going away tomorrow and will not see you again in this world, but will wait for you in heaven." When he heard of her death he immediately remarked: "She has gone and is waiting for me as she said."

Some of the men in this city sent a request for something from her pen; so she wrote in large letters, "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise." This they had framed and hung over their doors as is the Japanese custom.

Monday morning at nine o'clock eleven Japanese women assembled for the purpose of organizing a W. C. T. U. The constitution was read and approved and a society organized.

The husband of the president said at the close, "You women have organized a crusade against us men."

Miss West replied, "No, not against you but for you." Just here the secretary, in behalf of the society, handed her five yen (four dollars), saying, "This is only a small amount, but it is all we can do. We have heard you and you have helped us greatly. Please use this in traveling to places where they are not able to bear your expenses."

Miss West replied: "I thank you very much for this for two reasons. It shows you are in earnest and it is the first money I have received from any society in Japan." It was now time for her to take the train on her way to Kioto. The president of this branch road had fixed a special car for her with warm rugs and cans of hot water for the feet. Many loving hearts followed her to the train, bade her good-by and she was taken from us.

As a visible result of her work in this place, we have an organized society of sixteen male members, a local W. C. T. U. of ten members, a children's band of eight members and a general awakening on the subject of Christian temperance. Eternity alone can reveal all the good which Miss West did here. She said on the day she left, "I have never worked so hard as I have since I came to Japan," which fact recalls the words, "These are they which came out of great tribulation and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

Therefore are they before the throne of God and serve Him day and night in His temple. Yes, she still serves but has been promoted by her Master.

Yours in sympathy, RENA REZNER.

A WORD FROM DR. WHITNEY.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
TOKIO, Dec. 19, 1892.

DEAR MISS WILLARD:—I cannot close this letter without an expression of my own personal sympathy for your noble organization in the loss of so efficient a worker. I believe that her mission to Japan has been a successful one, and if one may judge from the great kindness and consideration shown by the Japanese government and the people, her visit has left a lasting impression for good upon the nation, and has given the cause in Japan so near her heart, a wonderful impetus.

Very truly yours,
W. N. WHITNEY.

TOKIO, JAPAN, Dec. 20, 1892.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Being unable to send the bell, of which I have written to you before, with the remains of Miss West, I wish to inform you that it shall be forwarded when Mrs. Van Petten is going to America. The bell was cast here on the 10th inst. It weighs about eighty-five pounds. We had occasion to use it for the first time in the funeral of Miss West. I hope the bell is not only the token of those that have given up tobacco, but also for the memory of Miss West's work in Japan.

Yours very truly,
SEN TSUDA.

A LATER LETTER FROM SHO NEMOTO.

3 KOTOHIRA ST., TOKIO, JAPAN, Dec. 19, 1892.

Miss Frances E. Willard:

MY DEAR PRESIDENT:—I most deeply felt of the great loss, Miss West. Her name and work are growing daily and shines every heart in Japan.

Miss West asked Mrs. Winn every day to read the Bible. On the 27th, the Sabbath, she wished to hear sweet song in English, so Mrs. Winn opened the doors in the house and sung the song. She was much pleased, then rejoiced. She asked to read the ninetieth Psalm. On the 28th inst. she said to have physician if it is the best to have.

During her illness Miss West spoke some when she awakes. Mrs. Winn asked Miss West, "Do you not think the Heaven is near?" "I do not know, do you think so?" was the reply.

She slept and said again, "Let me not die, why is this?" Till this time Miss West was thinking to perform the great work more.

On the 30th Mrs. Winn said to Miss West, "Do you want to be with Christ?" "Oh, yes, oh, yes, so much, so much." And Mrs. Winn said, "Do you wish to see your mother? If you go to heaven you will meet your dear mother." (When Miss West was young she kindly took care of her mother, who was long in sick bed.)

"Oh, yes," said Miss West, and slept a little while. When she awoke she said: "My dear mother, my dear mother."

On the 1st Miss West's last wishes to read the Scriptures was the fourteenth of St. John. Mrs. Winn read it whole.

This same day at two p. m. Mr. Hayashi, of Yokohama, sent a telegram, saying: "Our temperance people are praying at three p. m. throughout the Empire." But Mrs. Winn did not tell about the telegram. Solemnly, at 3 p. m., in perfect peace, Miss West said: "I am going home." Miss Lafferty was with Miss West in the same evening. Miss West said: "It is all right." These were her last words, and she passed to the glory of Christ's kingdom at seven p. m. on the 1st of December, 1892.

I got a telegram in the very early morning, and left the same evening for Kanazawa. When I left Tokio we thought to have burial in Tokio, though Mrs. Winn wished it in Kanazawa. Afterward Mr. Coombs, the American Minister, got telegrams to send the remains to America. The body was embalmed by Japanese Christian doctor, Mr. Tanaka, assisted by Rev. Toda. No American, no Japanese touched Miss West's body, except these two Japanese Christian doctors. Mr. Toda, of Kanazawa, did very kindly all he could.

The embalming costs only $40, that is real medicines. They do not accept any money as other doctors. I told this kindness to Dr. Whitney, of the American Legation, and he will send letters to them, thanking for their kindness.

When the dispatches from Mr. Winn came to Minister Coombs he kindly called the Secretary of State and asked him to give some instruction to the governor, so the Japanese government took special attention. The Governor Suzuki and General Okamoto and other high officials were many of them present at the funeral on the 4th of December. The remains in the church were guarded by many church members and two policemen day and night On the 6th we had made all preparation to go back to Tokio. With the remains Mr. Miyama and I left Kanazawa on the 7th, at nine a. m. We had a short service before we left the church.

We had a very long procession and by eight police officers we were led. One policeman was all the way throughout from Kanazawa to Tsuruga, eighty miles. Each place where Miss West had spoken the crowds of people came to the station and paid high respect very touchingly, such as Fukui, Nagoya and Shizuoka.

Dr. Worden, of Nagoya, came to Tsuruga and met us, and Mr. Cassiday from Shizuoka to Nagoya, and Mr. Ballagh, of Yokohama, to Shizuoka, and Dr. Whitney, of Tokio. The first night we stopped at Komatsu and the next in Maruoka, the 9th, at Takabu, 10th and 13th in Tsuruga, where we stayed two days in order to pass Sunday and to meet those who had come to join us. We reached Tokio on the 13th, at twelve p. m., and many temperance people came and met us at Shinbashi station in the midnight. Miss M. B. Griffiths was the representative of American ladies. Her loving spirit moves us. The body was taken to Dr. Whitney's hospital where it remained two nights.

On the 15th we moved it to Azabu church where we had the Tokio funeral service. Minister Coombs and Governor Tomita, of Tokio, and many distinguished people were present; the church was full with the most sympathizing people. The service was held from ten to eleven, when we marched to the station guarded by police officers so carefully. By 1:10 p. m. train the remains were taken to Yokohama, where at 2:30 p. m. the service was held. Yesterday, the 18th of December, we Tokio people had the memorial service at the largest hall in Tokio.

The large number of people witnessed the Lord's work. Miss West speaks with increasing power after her death. The Tokio W. C. T. U. draped the hall with pure Japanese silk goods worked with our hand only, one side black the other white with golden letters: "They rest from their labors and their works do follow them." "W. C. T. U." The embalming I told all about to Dr. Whitney who will write you. He is indeed a good gentleman, and a most earnest Christian. He so much helped me to do all for Miss West's remains, and Minister Coombs who paid the expense of transportation and embalming has also done most kindly. Japan did her best energy and deepest sympathy as her own mother passed to heaven. We expect to build a memorial monument in Kanazawa; if possible temple in Tokio.

Please do pray for us. We earnestly trust the Lord knows the work. Miss West is living and speaking in Japan most powerfully in many ways. To-morrow the remains will leave for dear America from the sweet land of Japan.

Please much love and deepest sympathy to the family and friends of the great worker deceased. Yours most sincerely,

SHO NEMOTO.

A MARTYR TO THE CAUSE.

HOJO, MURA, PROVINCE OF AWA, JAPAN, Dec. 7, 1892.

TO THE EDITORS UNION SIGNAL:—I am glad her life was prolonged to see her work here nearly accomplished, and now her death, we must hope, is to be overruled for the greatest possible good to the cause in Japan. It is like laying down her life a martyr to the cause so dear to her heart.

A very kind Providence is seen also in sending her to the home of a former pupil to die. A new emphasis comes to the text, Psalms 116:15, "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints."

The kingdom of our God is gradually coming, though having the usual difficulties of weak faith, the lusts of the flesh, and long seated and wide-spread vices to contend with. Still, here as everywhere, there is an election according to grace. All are not true Israelites who are called Israel. And God's thought to the Japanese people are thoughts of mercy. Having seen His marvelous works for thirty and one years now I cannot doubt of His final triumph.

Most sympathetically yours,

JAS. H. BALLAGH,
Minister of the Reformed Church of America.

Tributes.

I recognized in Miss West a remarkable variety of powers, trained to their varied work. It would have been enough to rank her rare gifts high had she excelled with her pen only, but in point of organization, in fertility of resource, in fearless initiative, she had the elements of a great leader. I wish it had been my pleasure to know her better, she who was so keen of brain, so warm of heart.

While every state has felt the shock, to Illinois the death of Miss West has been a crushing blow. Her long years of patient and royal service for our state, before the wider field of National work demanded her disciplined powers, endeared her to the Illinois white ribbon constituency in many tender ways. Her devotion and self-sacrificing labors placed her name at the head of the list whom we delighted to honor.

But words of love and praise, poised as they are on our trembling lips to-day, seem wholly inadequate to express our appreciation of her worth, or our sense of the great loss we have sustained. Our sorrow is too deep to be measured by words, too profound our grief for us to fully understand all her death means to us. We must sit in silence before Him. The one "rift in the cloud" that has so suddenly overcast our sky is the fact that our Heavenly Father does not willingly afflict His children, and this mysterious providence will some day stand out in a clear light, and we shall then know what now we but faintly comprehend, that "He always doeth all things well!"

I first knew Miss West in 1879, the beginning of my work in Illinois as a white-ribboner. I have ever found in her a true, loyal friend, one whom, as the years rolled on, became a trusted, loved comrade. I admired always in Miss West the generous appreciation which she gave to all who were trying to win in life's work; her hand was always outstretched, her purse always open to those needing these. She was genuine, consecrated to a great work, heroic in her labors. She fell, as all of us who are in the work desire to fall, at her post. Together she and Yolande are rejoicing, and watching us who are left with great interest that we each perform well the tasks given us.

I cannot express my sense of personal loss in the death of Miss West, nor can I say what I feel it is to the organization. Her long experience, her large-heartedness, her keen sympathy, her humility, her versatility and adaptability, her Christian life made such a strong combination as is rarely found in one person, lifted her out of ruts and enabled her to fill many places. A gap is left which no one person, perhaps, can fill.

ESTHER PUGH.

In the death of Miss West our official organ has lost an able editor, the W. T. P. A. a deeply interested stockholder, and the cause of temperance and prohibition a tireless worker. Miss West was one of the busiest women I ever knew and seemed to have a kindly thought for every good cause. Some one has said and truly, that "she was a natural mother" and no one who has read her "Childhood; its Care and Culture," could for a moment doubt this. Her observation of years did more for her on this line than years of experience has done for many a real mother. She is missed, she will be missed as the years roll away.

Miss West's labors in the school of methods in California were greatly blessed. She loved us much, and has left us a sweet remembrance. The Father's doors were wide open and warm the welcome she has received, where a place was prepared for her. EMILY PITT STEVENS.

For nearly fifteen years I knew and loved Miss West.

I always felt her warm sympathy in our work for the Loyal Temperance Legion, for she dearly loved the little ones, and as "Captain Mary" in the juvenile department of THE UNION SIGNAL she became a great favorite among them. Her ready pen was ever at their service, and our "Temperance Lesson Manuals" owe much to her faithful devotion, for she found time to assist in preparing the series beginning with "The Houses We Live In," books studied by our young people from one end of the nation to the other.

With all her arduous work in the distant Empire that so warmly welcomed her, she held many meetings for the boys and girls, and one of her last home letters to THE UNION SIGNAL was written while surrounded by a group of Japanese children.

Our Loyal Temperance Legions have lost one of their best friends, and I believe that many childish hands helped to beckon her to the heavenly places and Christ Jesus. ANNA A. GORDON.

London, Eng.

Miss West spent two of her last three weeks in the United States as my guest at our seaside cottage in Oregon. During the first week of her visit she conducted an hour's daily "school of methods," in connection with the Oregon State Chautauqua. In her work she was her own bright, energetic self, and in our social hours together talked often of her prospective trip to Japan and of her feeling that it was "the Lord's call."

I remember my husband asking her one day, "Who pays your expenses to Japan, Miss West?"

"I do," she quickly answered. "The National W. C. T. U. has not the money to do so, and therefore in order to go, I had to dispose of some property that I wished to keep for my old age." But after a pause she added, softly, "Oh, well, the Lord seems to have opened the way for my work in Japan just now, and I may not live to have an old age." Was this prophetic?

The night we received the telegram of Madam Willard's death both of us felt very sad, and as she and I sat opposite each other at the table writing our letters of sympathy to Miss Willard, the tears kept rolling down Miss West's cheeks, and suddenly looking up, she exclaimed: "I believe Madam Willard and my mother have now found each other out in Heaven and are talking about their respective daughters on earth. For why shouldn't they seek each other out when I have known and loved both Miss Willard and her mother so well?" Dear Miss West! she herself has now solved the secrets of the invisible world. "They are gathering homeward from every land,
One by one;
As their weary feet touch the shining strand,
One by one,
They rest with the Saviour, they wait their crown,
Their travel-stained garments are all laid down."

Another of our loved ones called home, another promoted! It was but yesterday we read Miss West's charming letter from Tokio telling of her cordial welcome. How our hearts thrilled with pleasure to know that she was there, the long, perilous voyage over, and her work begun. Well might they have accorded her a welcome, for her pure spirit and her strong presence in their midst was a benediction. We little thought her work would be over so soon, and we were confident of her rich harvests. But our Father knew, and He took her, and she is really nearer to us now than when she was in Japan. Can we not almost see through the thin veil that separates us from those we love so well who have been taken up in these past few months; and will not we be drawn nearer to that heavenly shore as the shouts of welcome come back from all who have been called to lay down the cross and take the crown of life? Surely they are the ones to be envied.

Louisville, Ky. JENNIE CASSEDAY.

I feel personally afflicted, for I deeply loved the dear one who has gone so suddenly to her heavenly rest. How blessed it will be to her! I could find it in my heart to envy her the change. May we all be ready when called.

MRS. J. K. BARNEY.

Providence, R. I.

When I was pastor at Oneida, Ill., from 1868 to 1870 I knew Miss West well, often met her and worked with her in Christian conventions and in Sunday-school conventions and institutes. Her two brothers were members of my congregation at Oneida. Her services in such gatherings were always eagerly sought after, always timely, able, appropriate and acceptable; at a time when Knox county, Ill., was probably the best organized for Sunday-school and Christian work, of any county in the United States. It has fallen to the lot of but few women to leave behind them such a record of usefulness in the cause of Christ and humanity, as she has left. Well may we cherish and revere her memory, for "the memory of such is blessed."

We rejoiced in the uplift Miss West brought to us last summer. It seemed as if one of our own had been taken. As one by one they go yonder into the "Beautiful Beyond," there comes to my heart the thought of the host that will await us as we near the "other side." There comes along with this thought such a sweet reminder: "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers they shall not overflow thee."

Newberg, Ore. HELEN B. HARFORD.

And so that royal spirit has gone on
To join that "innumerable host" who praise our God
At shrines not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.
And those who follow on to heal the hurt of this great land,
Must toil without her strength
And bear the banner high,
That every eye that mourns may see and know
Of the great balm that brings deliverance.
She gave no stinted part of her great soul for human needs,
Nor did she mete her hours out one by one,
But as the boundless ocean flings its largess to the land
So did she give her life blood to the latest drop.
Come, let us build a rich, rare place for her most precious dust,
That like a hand may heavenward point, and set it
Where the healed may come and pray
That not one soldier in this army grand
May fail to clasp hand with hand,
Till over all one signet may proclaim,
"A world set free."

Austin, Ill. MRS. M. O. PAGE.

It was meet that she should go to Heaven from the Sunrise Kingdom, where she had, it seems, somewhat entered upon her reward, in the enthusiastic appreciation of the Japanese for her unselfish devotion to their Christianization and elevation. May God sanctify her death to the good of the W. C. T. U. she has so nobly and efficiently served as editor and evangelist.

Dear, brave, solid, true Miss West! How we of California had learned to love her! It seems such a very short time, since—accompanied by a committee of our Woman's Press Association—I met her upon the ferry boat as it neared our city and welcomed her to our homes. She had long had our hearts. What splendid work she accomplished here and in Southern California, during this summer just ended! How she inspired and educated our women at the summer school of methods! What a model of refined patience, plodding energy and practical common sense she was!

San Francisco, Cal. NELLIE BLESSING EYSTER.

Must that eloquent pen lie forever silent? Has that wonderful energy, that unbounded sympathy, and that adamantine firmness, that ever opposed the wrong, been removed to fairer fields? Then may God pity us, as with breaking hearts we bow our heads and ponder over her burning words, that have so thrilled our souls from the pages of the past.

Our W. C. T. U. has just held impressive memorial services for our beloved Mary Allen West. Surely hers is, and ever will be, a "blessed memory." Her unselfish devotion was wonderful, indeed Christlike. One special occasion so endeared her to me, I mourn her loss as of a sister. In May, 1882, Miss Willard sent her and myself from a joint convention of the tenth and eleventh districts (now eleventh and twelfth) to represent the W. C. T. U. at a state Sabbath-school convention at Champaign, and, if practicable, gain recognition, by a resolution of indorsement, from that noble, august body of Christian workers. Upon arrival we found our way to the church, and later were sent for entertainment to a family where under the circumstances it seemed to us burdensome for them, although received most hospitably. But she made it so pleasant, leaving a kindly token and loving words of appreciation. When a special meeting was called at an early hour at another church Miss West was called forward to explain methods, etc. (We were not so well known a decade ago.) She modestly stepped to the front, but some one called out, "Go up higher; we want to see you." She smilingly said, "I will; I wanted you to go up there and you wouldn't." After this, the resolution was heartily indorsed and passed. Some years ago, at another Sabbath-school convention held in Galesburg, Miss West lined her house, or rooms, with beds to entertain the crowds. To "do good and communicate" she seemed never to "forget." Her beautiful life is ended; so noble, so useful. May her mantle fall on many another of the white ribbon host, and her death be sanctified to us all. IRENE H. SMITH.

Jacksonville, Ill.

Miss West had spent several weeks in Oregon just before sailing on the voyage, which, all unknown to her, was to be her last journey on the pilgrimage of life. Many of our women had long known and loved the senior editor of THE UNION SIGNAL, and her visit cemented this bond still more closely and endeared her to others to whom her name had been familiar.

The tenderest expressions of sympathy and regret are voiced by the state executive.

A blessed rest is our friend's and a glorious welcome is hers from the Master she has loved and served so faithfully.

JENNIE CAVERS,
President Ontario W. C. T. U.

At its business meeting January 4, the New England Woman's Press Association unanimously passed a hearty vote of sympathy for the Illinois Woman's Press Association on the recent death of its president, Miss Mary Allen West.

EVELYN GREENLEAF SUTHERLAND.

Boston, Mass.

To the thousands of readers of THE UNION SIGNAL who have known Miss West only in name, and as editor of the paper which has brought courage and inspiration in its leaves from week to week, there has come a sense of loss and bereavement with the intelligence of her death.

To those who knew her before THE UNION SIGNAL was, who know better what the growth of the W. C. T. U. and its exponent, THE UNION SIGNAL, has cost, there comes possibly a deeper shade of sorrow.

My first meeting with Miss West was in her home in Galesburg, Ill., soon after the Crusade. Without constitutions to guide us, save of domestic manufacture, without literature to aid, without a paper through which to communicate or gather news from the field, scattered workers were doing each the best she knew. Under those circumstances, meeting personally with workers gave a sense of comfort in comradeship which would be hard to realize in these days of frequent conventions.

I was impressed with her sterling character from statements she then gave me. She was at that time superintendent of public schools, and among her duties was that of examining applicants and granting certificates to teach.

She said, "I have refused certificates to men who were, so far as education is concerned, well qualified to teach, yet who were not total abstainers and had been known to be under the influence of strong drink." She added, "I did not know but it would cost me my official head, but I believed I was right." To my gratification a lawyer and a judge, who were far from being temperance men said: "You are right, Miss West, and we will stand by you."

As I read in the Christmas UNION SIGNAL of her wonderful work, of the wishing "for one hour's rest which was not to be," of four meetings daily, then at cost of needed rest, such a letter to her thousands of readers, giving the broad outlook she had received from the very opening skies, I said, "She that is faithful over a few things shall indeed rule over many things."

Let us repeat a few sentences from the one who has entered into the joy of her Lord:

"Human nature equals itself in all cases. Japan does not differ much from America." "Japan without the gospel is just what all lands are without it; the beautiful traits of character we find indigenous here only make darker by contrast the fearful immorality lurking beneath the æsthetic surface." "Christ in the life, shining out in the heart, can alone lift the shadow from Japan." "The most precious testimony that has come to me of the fruit of these labors is that some have decided to give themselves to Christ because of appeals made to them."

As I think of these words, of the pen laid down, of the folded hands, the sealed lips, and the weary form being borne to the home where first I met her, were I permitted to place a motto there above the pulseless breast, it should be this: "Well done, good and faithful servant," and "He giveth His beloved sleep."

Resolutions.

The following resolution was adopted by the World's W. C. T. U. committee for Great Britain at its regular quarterly meeting in its offices, 47 Victoria St., Dec. 6, 1892:

Resolved, That we have learned with sincere regret and sympathy of the departure from this world of Miss Mary Allen West, for many years editor of THE UNION SIGNAL and a leader in the white ribbon movement of America. On a temperance trip to Japan, where she had been received with the warmth and appreciation to which she was entitled by remarkable services, and at the outset of an educational trip in the interest of the World's W. C. T. U. that promised great advantages to our cause, she, whose day's work had been thoroughly well done, fell asleep. We tender our affectionate condolence to our American sisters, and pray that the management of the official organ of the World's W. C. T. U., which in less than one year has lost two of its editors, may be guided in the present emergency to fill this large vacancy with wisdom and to follow out the broad lines of enlightened policy laid down by the veteran editor who has passed "beyond our sight, above our ken."

ISABEL SOMERSET, President.
G. F. MORGAN, Cor. Sec.
HELEN L. HOOD, Rec. Sec.

WHEREAS, Death has again entered our ranks and taken from our number Miss Mary Allen West, who has been identified with the W. T. P. A. from its inception; who was one of its largest and most deeply interested stockholders; who has from the first been its efficient secretary, and who for years has been the editor of THE UNION SIGNAL. And

WHEREAS, In all these positions she has served the cause and the Association with tireless energy and unchanging faithfulness, therefore,

Resolved, That we deeply mourn her sudden death, and realize that this association has lost one of its most earnest members; THE UNION SIGNAL its oldest and most efficient editor; the W. C. T. U. a most devoted member, and the temperance reform an earnest and tireless advocate.

That we tender our deepest sympathy to the brothers and other relatives of our sister, and commend them to Him "who doeth all things well," and whose grace is sufficient for every time of need.

DIRECTORS.

WHEREAS, Miss Mary Allen West, editor of THE UNION SIGNAL and beloved worker in the World's W. C. T. U., heard our Father calling while laboring in His vineyard and went home, therefore,

Resolved, That the San Bernardino, Cal., W. C. T. U. mourns her loss as that of a dear friend, a beloved sister.

That they keenly appreciate the loss of her able pen, her untiring industry and unselfish devotion to the temperance cause.

That motherhood found in her boundless love for children, her purity of character, steadfastness of purpose and loyalty to purity its highest type.

That the blessing of her memory will rest upon all who knew her.

W. H. B. GOODSELL, Secretary.

WHEREAS, God in His providence has called from among the leaders of our great organization, Miss Mary Allen West, a beloved sister and co-worker in the temperance cause,

May we bow submissively to the Divine will of our Heavenly Father and thank Him for the life and work of our departed sister. A good and noble woman has been called to her reward. "Well done, good and faithful servant."

Miss West was a moral reformer of whole consecration and consuming zeal; she was endowed with a strong and comprehensive intellect and sound judgment, beloved and respected by all who knew her.

We extend to the editorial staff of THE UNION SIGNAL, of which she was a valuable member, our heartfelt sympathy.

MRS. WETMORE,
MRS. PARKER.

Ann Arbor, Mich.

At the quarterly convention of the W. C. T. U. of Alleghany county, Pennsylvania, December 13, 1892, a resolution was passed tendering our heartfelt love and sympathy in the sudden death of our beloved co-worker and editor of THE UNION SIGNAL, Miss Mary Allen West. Twice God has thus laid His loving yet mysterious hand upon us. The overwhelming loss of our lamented Miss Ames is still fresh in memory. It seems to us like the extinguishing of two beautiful lives, so perfect, so needed, just now in the Master's service. It is difficult for us to understand there is still a higher service, a broader field, even in the "Celestial City," but God knows the work and the laborers. These life lessons with their darkened shadows (oft repeated the past year) mean more of earnest service, more of prevailing prayer, by those still "waiting." May her example, her ardent devotion for the Master stir us to greater zeal and devotion.

May our lives that have been strengthened and uplifted by her earnest thoughts through THE UNION SIGNAL be made more perfect through her death.

May it be said of us as of her, "her works do follow." God's hand was at the helm. He saw how her influence and prayers were needed in Japan to remove the curse, so hindering Christ Kingdom. As a fervent foreign missionary-worker, she felt it was life—even in death—to sow the seed that shall bring life everlasting. How rich and full of significance is such a rounded out life—at home or abroad, in sickness or health, her hands and heart were full of Christly service. What a rich legacy to leave the host of white-ribboners who mourn her loss to-day. May those associated in the close bond of friendship and good works, who so sorely miss her; who was in life so willing to share the burden and pressure ever resting upon editorial life, find God's spirit abiding constantly upon them, giving strength and wisdom, through the faith and blessed promises of Him who will never leave or forsake them. It seems like God's gentle voice speaking "around the world," carrying His message, that must relieve the nations of the earth of sin and misery.

MRS. WM. B. RHOADES, State Supt. Y. W. Work.

CALIFORNIA'S MEMORIAL MEETING.

With sad hearts the mention of the name of Mary Allen West brought a hush to all business proceedings of the executive meeting on January 3.

The following resolution of respect and love was passed by a rising vote:

WHEREAS, Miss Mary Allen West, senior editor of THE UNION SIGNAL, and one of the most active, efficient and loved of the workers of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, has been called from active life on earth to her higher one above; therefore

Resolved, That we, the members of the Executive Board of the California Woman's Christian Temperance Union, with a deep sense of our persona loss, and with a deep appreciation of her services, desire to express our sympathy to our National and state organizations, and especially do we offer our sympathy to her family, but we rejoice with them that her work, so complete on earth, will bear fruit not only here but in eternity.

Resolved, That we hereby express our grateful appreciation of the kindness and attention shown to Miss West by the people of Japan while she traveled among them, and the respect shown her memory by them after her death.

The entire evening was devoted to a memorial service. In the same parlors where a few months since these same sisters had gathered to honor her by a reception, they were now gathering to talk to each other and to God of their loss and her gain. Mrs. Sturtevant-Peet, with tear-dimmed eyes, spoke of the courage and devotion and ability, and best of all, the rare unselfishness of Miss West. All voices joined in trembling tones in the hymn, "Nearer, my God, to Thee." Rev. Ada C. Bowles, of Boston, visiting in Alameda, voiced the thought of every heart by her prayer.

Mrs. H. E. Brown read the letters in THE UNION SIGNAL from Miss Willard and Sho Nemoto, as to the cause of Miss West's death being overwork. Mrs. D. J. Spencer spoke of her impressions of her, saying her figure and mind both gave the idea of strength. She had a world-wide reputation as the editor of THE UNION SIGNAL. Her prayers hallowed these headquarters.

Mrs. Van Pelt read a touching letter from Rev. B. F. Rattray, a former school-mate. He referred to her gifts and graces as a child, a youth and a woman, and recited her noble qualities. Mrs. Eyster, as a journalist, spoke of her as president of the Illinois Woman's Press Association and representative of the International Press League, and read the following resolution passed by the P. C. W. P. A.:

WHEREAS, In the death of Mary Allen West we realize a loss to the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union and Illinois Press Association,

Resolved, That the Pacific Coast Woman's Press Association extend to the Illinois Woman's Press Association our profound sympathy with their grief for the loss of their beloved and efficient president, assuring them that the memory of her noble life and worthy deeds will incite us to higher endeavor, and that her name and fame we will never let willingly die.

Mr. J. K. Inazawa, a Japanese gentleman, spoke of the great good Miss West had done his country and especially the Japanese women.

Mrs. Emily Pitt Stevens, with voice choked with emotion, told of the sweetness of Miss West's disposition which she had known when she honored herself and Mr. Stevens by becoming their guest. Miss West often said, "The California women have been so good to me, I love them so much." Speaking of Madam Willard's death she said, "Earth will be darker but heaven brighter," and now she too has joined her in that glorious world.

Mrs. Henrietta Skelton, with tears running down her cheeks, told of the years of comradeship in the early days of the W. C. T. U. work, and eloquently pleaded that every white-ribboner should treat lovingly every one as they would wish they had done in the presence of death. Let no word or action of ours bring tears to each other's eyes. "She and Saint Courageous may be looking on us to-night from heaven."

M. G. C. Edholm paid a tribute of love of one working woman to another and referred to the journalistic kindnesses done her by Miss West.

Mrs. Friar in whose home Miss West was a guest, spoke of her humble, Christ-like nature. All joined in singing softly, "Blest be the tie that binds" —the white-ribbon song, and like a bereaved family felt that by that very bereavement they had been drawn closer together.

M. G. C. EDHOLM.

The Tokio Funeral.

13 TSUKIJI, TOKIO, JAPAN, Dec. 17, 1892.

To the Relatives and Friends of Miss Mary Allen West:

DEAR FRIENDS:—At a little prayer meeting held November 30th, the day before Miss West died, where a few of us had met together to pray that her life might be spared, and where tears were freely mingled with the earnest petitions that went up to the throne of God, Mrs. Yajima, the sweet Christian lady, who is president of the Tokio W. C. T. U., in a brief testimony to Miss West's worth and work, remarked, "When I met her soon after she landed in Yokohama and looked upon her face, I said to myself, 'Ah, she is our mother, and we all are but children;' and that impression deepened as I came to know her better. Miss West is about my own age and yet how different we are! How little I can do! Yes, she was like our mother, and we all are but children before her." Yes, it was Miss West's motherliness, her womanliness, her large-hearted sympathy, her abounding and untiring zeal for the firm establishment here in Japan of the blessed and Christ-like cause, in working for which she spared neither time nor strength, that won all hearts.

"I don't want to go around just to make a show," she said so often and so emphatically when looking over the long list of places here in Tokio where she was expected to speak; "I don't pretend to be a lecturer, anyway, I have no gift in that line. I just want the workers to gather around me that I may give them methods of work, and may be able to feel that when I leave them and return to America the work will go right straight on." And we believe it will. We believe that God will use this death to clinch, as it were, the bolts which Miss West has well and faithfully driven into the temperance temple of Japan. Every one has been deeply grieved over this mysterious dispensation of God's providence.

I wish you could have seen the large and representative assemblage gathered together yesterday in Azabu church (Azabu is one district of Tokio) to pay the last honors to the one whom we had so fully expected to welcome back to Tokio about this time to finish organizing the National Temperance Union of Japan. Governor Tomita and the American Minister, Mr. Coombs, were present, besides a large number of "foreign" and Japanese friends. Many white-haired old Japanese ladies were there, a few Christian temperance soldiers, a few nurses from the Red Cross hospital, and many others. The service was half in English and half in Japanese. Dr. Cochran, of the Canadian Methodist church, was the English speaker. In English we sang, "Rock of Ages," and in Japanese, "In the Sweet By-and-By." A large procession followed the remains from the church to the station and some of us accompanied them to Yokohama, where we were met by many friends. The girls from the various Christian schools were drawn up in line on either side of the road and fell into the procession as the hearse moved from the station towards the church. The latter was simply but tastefully decorated. Down the sides of the church and on the wall, were the words in evergreens, "She hath done what she could." On either side of the pipe-organ we read, "It is all right," taken from Miss West's own words when asked if she had any final preparations to make, "Everything is all right." The stars and stripes and the Japanese national flag adorned the face of the organ, and two Japanese banners completed the simple decorations. The pall was laid the white side uppermost over the coffin, and wreaths of flowers upon it. The service was again conducted in both languages, the Rev. W. H. Daniels, in whose church in Chicago the Illinois W. C. T. U. was organized, being the English speaker.

Yesterday (Sunday, for I am now writing December 19) afternoon a memorial service was held in a large public hall here in Tokio, a meeting in behalf of the temperance cause having been appointed for that time, Miss West herself to be the principal speaker. All the addresses were in Japanese, and every speaker spoke in terms of highest admiration of Miss West's faithful and self-sacrificing labors in Japan and for the Japanese. It is pleasant to know, too, that these expressions of esteem have not been called forth only since Miss West's death, but were freely accorded her while she was among us.

The American Minister has been exceedingly kind in doing everything within his power towards lessening the difficulties arising from the remains having to be prepared so far from the capital and carried so far. Dr. Whitney, too, interpreter at the American Legation, an English gentleman, and a devoted Christian full of good works, has been indefatigable in rendering every assistance. And all the Japanese gentlemen and ladies associated with Miss West in her work in this country have spared neither time nor strength in their loving services.

A representative party was at the railway station at midnight of Tuesday, December 13, to meet the party returning from Kanazawa. The head officials of the various police stations were also present, and escorted the coffin from the railway car to the door of the station, whence it was conveyed to Dr. Whitney's hospital, there to remain till the funeral services of last Friday (December 16). Since then the remains have lain in the vestry of the Union chapel in Yokohama (where the service was held), and will to-day be conveyed to the steamer which is to bear you all that now remains—for such is the mysterious will of God—of the dear friend whom we had thought to return to you as full of life and energy as when she touched these shores.

Here in our home we greatly enjoyed Miss West's presence. She always spoke affectionately of the loved ones in America, showed us their photographs, and the little things she had received from her Japanese friends that were to be given to this and that one. "My girls," too, as she called her associates in the work, were often lovingly mentioned.

Praying that eternal good may result from this sudden translation of dear Miss West, and earnestly requesting your prayers and loving sympathy in behalf of these for whom she laid down her life,

Yours in deep sympathy,

MARY BELL GRIFFITHS.

Reception of the Body in San Francisco.

DEAR FRIENDS OF MARY ALLEN WEST:—It is 7:30 p. m.; since 2:30 I have been at the Pacific Mail Dock sitting beside the box containing the casket in which the body of our beloved friend lies. Two delegations of loving-hearted women have come and gone; the one representing the Press Association, the other, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. The body had been consigned by Mr. West to Mr. Sanborn, agent of C., B. & Q. R. R., who is a native of Galesburg, and who knew Miss West from childhood. News came to us that the body would be removed to the S. P. depot and started upon its journey across the continent at five o'clock of to-day. Those of the committee living in Oakland went ahead to be at the depot to receive it, I remained to accompany it and waited until starlight, but no hearse arrived. I then returned to the city, found Mr. Sanborn, and heard from him that the delay was owing to the impossibility of having certain formulas connected with the transfer of the body to the undertaker attended to in time. This will be done to-morrow, and it will leave us in the evening overland train.

Knowing your natural interest in every and anything connected with her precious remains, I will give you the details. The box containing the casket is massive and carefully put together. The inscription upon it is as follows:

"Containing the casket of Miss Mary Allen West, to Frances E. Willard, W. C. T. U., Temperance Temple, Chicago. From F. Stanland, Missionaries' Agent, Yokohama, Japan."

Directions for the careful opening of the box, the position of the body, etc., are written in small characters upon the side.

The purser of the Rio Janeiro informed me that an acquaintance of Miss West, a missionary from Japan, was at the Occidental Hotel, having come over with them, and to him I hastened. He is Rev. John W. Saunby, of Canada, and has been in Japan six years. He represents the Canadian Methodist Church. His address for this year is: "Rev. J. W. Saunby, care James Lund, Esq., Woodstock, Ontario county, Canada." From him I obtained a few items of interest. Kanazawa, where Miss West died, is on the west coast and is a city of 100,000 inhabitants. "The funeral of Miss West," said he, "was attended by all the leading officials, Governor Suzuki doing all in his power to show honor and respect to the illustrious woman who had come among them only to do them good."

After the ceremonies her body was borne by twelve Japanese policemen, headed by faithful Sho Nemoto, on foot thirty-seven ri, or one hundred miles to Tsuruga, the railway terminus. Kanazawa is three hundred miles from Tokio.

The body was received at Tsuruga by Rev. Dr. Worden of the M. E. Church, who conducted it by railroad to Nagoya. There it was met by Rev. F. A. Cassidy and brought to Shidzuoka, who, in turn, consigned it to the loving care of Rev. James Ballagh, one of the oldest and most revered Presbyterian missionaries in Japan. He accompanied it to Tokio where it was placed in the hospital under charge of Dr. Whitney, a skillful surgeon and physician and interpreter of the United States Legation. "A dear, good man," emphasized Mr. Saunby, "who carefully prepared it for shipment."

The memorial services which were held in Azabu previous to their departure, were in the Canadian Methodist church. There were two addresses; the first in English, by Rev. George Cochrane, D. D., and the second in Japanese by Rev. Hiraiwa.

During the progress of these services a bell was tolled by a Japanese woman. "It was the most mournful sound to which I ever listened," said Mrs. Saunby. The bell has a peculiar history which is well worth telling. All classes of Japanese women (as well as men) are addicted to smoking a very mild tobacco which grows in Japan. The bowl of each pipe is tiny and contains a little of the weed about the size of a pea. Each pipe has a metal stem and bowl cover. Mr. Sen Tsuda, an enthusiast upon the subject of temperance, had collected hundreds of these pipes from his converts, melted the metal and converted it into a large bell according to Miss West's suggestion, which is to be presented by him to the Temple at Chicago. The bell is tongueless; the sound is produced by striking it upon the outside. It had been completed when Miss West's body arrived in Azabu and was tolled for the first and last time on that mournful occasion. Azabu means flax growing. Miss West's last address was given at Fukui, at the house of Rev. Mr. Fulton, a Presbyterian missionary.

Yours in tenderest sympathy,

San Francisco, Cal. NELLIE B. EYSTER.

The Home Coming and Burial.

The long journey of thousands of miles across Japan, the trackless Pacific and her native land, terminated at Galesburg, Ill., at three o'clock on Sunday morning, January 15. Mary Allen West's body was once more among relatives and life-long friends, and reverently was it received and cared for. The inconvenient hour of the belated train prevented the gathering of the large number of friends who had waited patiently at the station during the day.

The ponderous boxes which enclosed the remains were four in number, two being wooden and two zinc, and weighed nine hundred pounds. These fitted nicely into each other and were filled with sawdust. They were all carefully removed and the body placed in a metallic coffin, covered with black cloth. This casket was sealed and carried to the home of her nephew, Mr. Fred West, and there it was tastefully draped with flowers and smilax by a committee from the local W. C. T. U. On Monday many friends called for a look at the last earthly tenement of the precious body, which was never more to be seen by mortal eye.

On Monday afternoon at half-past one the special mourners, consisting of Miss West's two brothers, Byron and Carlton, with the family of the former and the visiting W. C. T. U. and other friends, passed out from this saddened home to the dear old "First Church," where had assembled the local W. C. T. U., missionary society, members of her Sunday-school class, Woman's Relief Corps and the band of the Grand Army. The church was beautifully decorated with flowers and Japanese and American flags and banners; chiefly conspicuous was a Japanese "pall," six by eight feet, made of black velvet and lined with white silk, the gift of the Tokio W. C. T. U. Embroidered with gold thread were Miss West's full name, the letters of our union and the verse, "They rest from their labors and their works do follow them." There was also an inscription in Japanese. An accompanying note explained that the pall was used with the white side out at the funeral in Tokio, so as to better represent the white-ribbon movement. Other Japanese offerings were a large floral star, made of native moss and artificial flowers, and two linen banners, containing scriptural texts, Rev. 14 : 13 and I Cor. 15 : 58. The pall undoubtedly has a large intrinsic value as well as being priceless from its historic and sacred connection, and is to be sent to the Temperance Temple in Chicago.

The floral tributes were many and very beautiful, the larger pieces being a pillow from the family, a Roman wreath from the W. T. P. A. and a handsome scroll from the Woman's Press Association. Many other beautiful flowers from personal friends, a rich silk flag and a portrait of Miss West adorned the large platform.

"Give to the Winds thy Fears," the Crusade hymn, was well rendered by the choir, then the pastor, Dr. Sturtevant, read from Revelations and offered a brief but touching prayer, the first sentence of which was: "We thank Thee, O God, for the long and safe journey that this precious dust has taken and that it is not to lie in a foreign land, but is to rest in the same soil in which mingles the dust of her parents and other dear ones." This thankfulness was voiced by every heart present.

After the singing of "One Sweetly Solemn Thought," Dr. A. R. Thain, of Omaha, Miss West's former pastor, delivered the following beautiful

SERMON.

When Mary Allen West died the multitude of her good deeds had won her so many friends that if her body had been carried around the circumference of the earth before burial the tribute of sincere grief would have followed its sad progress around the circle well known to the sun, for it is not too much to say that a band of mourning encompasses the entire globe, because the tenant of this tabernacle has passed into the unseen.

If I should select a motto to represent the spirit of her fruitful life it would be these words, which fell from the lips of Him whom she loved so well and followed so closely: "Whosoever shall lose his life for my sake and the gospel's the same shall save it."

According to the estimate of Jesus there is such a thing as unprofitable gain, even though the gain should be represented by the whole world; and there is such a thing as profitable loss. This latter fact has been demonstrated many times, and seldom more convincingly than by the life which we to-day commemorate. She lost her life for Christ's sake and the gospel's, but it has proved a profitable loss to many, yes, and to herself, no doubt.

What does Jesus mean when He says that one may lose his life in a profitable way?

He means, first of all, that the high ends of God's kingdom should always be chosen rather than the lower ends of seeming self-interest.

Presumptuous Peter had undertaken to rebuke Jesus, because He had foretold "that the Son of man must suffer many things and be rejected by the elders and the chief priests and the scribes and be killed, and after three days arise again." But Jesus sharply rebuked Peter for entertaining thoughts of carnal policy which were satanic in their spirit, and then said to the disciples and to the multitude, "If any man would come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me." High ends should be chosen, even though darling self may have to suffer, even though the way to them should be marked by daily self-denial, and should lead at last under the cross.

The loss of the lower self is a great gain, for then we find the higher self —the true self—which is centered in Christ. While Lady Huntingdon was riding in her carriage one evening towards a brilliant assembly, there darted through her mind the thought, learned from the catechism in earlier years, "Man's chief end is to glorify God and enjoy Him forever." Pleasure had been her chief end in life, but from that night she lost her life in Christ, and it became a "living sacrifice, acceptable unto God" and helpful to man.

But there are so many in this world who choose the lower ends, that the average of living is reduced much below par. A philosopher once asked a man which of these two he had rather be—Crœsus, one of the richest, but most self-seeking and luxurious among men, or Socrates, one of the poorest, but one of the most virtuous men in the world—and the answer returned was, that, in his life, he would be a Crœsus, but in his death a Socrates. So there are many who would wish to be Dives in life, but Lazarus in death; with gain-loving Balaam, they would die the death of the righteous, but live the life of the wicked.

Miss West early in life deliberately chose the highest ends, and she never faltered in the upward path. She might have lived a life of comparative ease. She might have grown old in the midst of her friends. By following her natural tastes she might have lived a life of quiet study and literary activity, and in such a life she no doubt would have attained a good measure of success, neither could she have been accused of selfishness had she elected to spend her days in studious seclusion. Many of you know that she expected, at one time, to put the best work of her life into a history of Illinois, and that through years she had spent the leisure hours of a very busy life in collecting materials for such a work.

That history will never appear bearing her name as author; but the history of her life, and the history of our race will be all the richer because of that lost book. "My book! My book! I shall never finish my book!" exclaimed Buckle, the historian, when he was dying. No doubt there was selfishness in the cry. But no such thoughts troubled the dying hours of Miss West. She turned aside from pleasant paths, proper enough in themselves, to paths which were more difficult, because she saw in them the fresher imprints of her Leader's feet. She deliberately turned her back on the historical materials which she had collected—materials which would have taken noble form under her skillful hand—that she might make history by working "For God and Home and Native Land."

She lost her life—the life which she might have lived—that she might minister to the interests of higher ends—even the highest. But such loss is unspeakable gain. It lifts her from being a pleasant home light to be a star in the firmament of regenerated society, where her clear shining will gladden millions of hearts. Her buried self has burst into bloom so rich and sweet that all of earth's continents claim some part in her, and the winds of the Pacific bear the fragrance of her life to distant islands of the sea.

A noble way to lose one's life is to merge his individuality in some worthy cause. So Moses lost his life when he refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter that he might suffer affliction with the people of God. So again he lost his quiet shepherd life when he consented somewhat reluctantly to become the leader of God's people. But which is nobler, think you, Moses the shepherd, or Moses the Leader and Lawgiver? He no doubt had great gifts, but it was his cause—or rather God's cause with which he allied himself—which made him great. So Florence Nightingale "threw herself away," as some of her friends said, when she went to the Crimea to nurse sick and wounded soldiers; but she found a greater and more enduring name than any officer of the three armies who there sought "the bubble reputation even in the cannon's mouth." So Livingstone deliberately "got lost" from civilization in the heart of Africa; but the whole of civilization became greatly interested in finding him, and accomplished it only to learn that it was Africa that he wanted them to find—not Livingstone. He preferred to remain in Africa, and by dying there he made that continent his monument.

So Miss West lost her will in the will of Christ; merged her individuality in His cause; took hold of God's strength, and by Him was lifted into places of influence and power; allied herself with the great reforms which have the push of the centuries and the power of the Almighty behind them; and thus by giving herself entirely to be used of God, she received so liberally from Him whom she loved and served, that she grew into the nobly dowered woman who gave herself to the world so unsparingly, and whom the world can spare so ill.

A great cause is greater than its most illustrious advocates, and it helps to make them great. Was Christ unkind when He said to the Galilean fishermen, "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men"? Separate existence is weakness. Association under a plan is strength. So drops of water become a Niagara. So men become an army, and win a Waterloo. So God permits us to connect ourselves with the onward sweep of great providential movements, and He shapes us while we serve Him, doing for us more than we can possibly do for Him. Would that men might learn this celestial economy; give, and it shall be given unto you; spend, and ye shall have; lose self for Christ's sake and God will find you—not on the low plains of selfishness—but He will place you on the hills from whence cometh our help; forget self in the advancement of some noble cause, and in the end you will find yourself in God's chariot riding on to certain victory and eternal reward.

And, in the service of Christ, we should be willing to risk physical life.

Men give vitality and life liberally for the advancement of secular ends, and some of them, by no means, of the highest. We are told that it cost thirty thousand lives to build the Great Pyramid. Science asks for life, and never has to plead for volunteers. How many brave hearts have been chilled into silence amid the ice which guards the approaches to the North Pole; but with every new expedition, life stands ready to hurl itself against those awful barriers which are strewn with the timbers of ships and the bones of men. Commerce asks for life, and gets it to the full extent of the demand. Our railroads kill an army of men every year. The switch-yards of Galesburg are soaked with the blood of men who died beneath the wheels. But when a man is killed by the necessities or by the selfish carelessness of commerce, is it hard to get some one to take his place? Conquerers ask for life, and walk to glory (if you call it such) over graves. Civil government asks for life, and sends men by the million into the thick of the battle, where thousands fall in a single day.

And is Christ unreasonable when He says, "Except a man hate his life he cannot be my disciple"?

Those of you who knew Miss West ten years ago remember her superb vitality, her great capacity for work, and the readiness with which she rallied from the frequent and severe demands even then made on her strength.

But you know how it has been during the past ten years. The demands upon her vitality were incessant. Her capacity for work became enormous. Articles, editorials, speeches, conferences, conventions, journeys, and taxing efforts of all sorts crowded after each other in close succession, or marched abreast in files. She was not careless of her health, but she was not careful to save herself. She forgot herself in caring for others. She yielded fully to the master passion of Him whose sacrificial death turned a sneer into the highest praise: "He saved others; himself he cannot save." Had she been less Christlike and more self-regardful she would have lived longer, but would she have lived more, and would we admire her as we do to-day? She loved not her life unto the death. No Leonidas, seeking to bar the gateway of his country with his own body; no Winkelreid, making a way for liberty by gathering opposing spears into his patriotic heart; no Cid, or Bayard, crowning a knightly life with a knightly death; no Warren, dying on Bunker Hill for the cause of American Independence, died more certainly on the field of honor than she did. She carried her white ribbon half around the globe; and then having fought a good fight, having finished her course, having kept the faith, she departed to receive the crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give unto all them that love His appearing.

Let us now consider the motive which should prompt one to lose his life.

Life is very valuable. To cast it away is culpable folly. To take it is a crime. What motive does Christ present sufficiently strong to make the giving of one's life a profitable loss?

"For my sake and the gospel's." Christ could not have presented a higher motive. Men will do much for self, but they will do more for others. What is it that nerves the arm of toil? The desire to provide for one's loved ones. What keeps the engineer in his cab when death is staring him in the face? He stays there at the risk of mutilation or death for the sake of those who are in the train behind him. What was it that enlisted over two million men during the war of the rebellion? It was done for the sake of that which our flag represents.

And it was this motive—for Christ's sake—that enabled Paul to endure his multiplied labors and afflictions; and cheered John when he was on the isle of Patmos; and comforted Peter when he was led forth to suffer the death which Christ had foretold; and strengthened Polycarp to rejoice that Christ had considered him worthy to taste the cup of martyrdom; and caused the maiden, Perpetua, to sing Psalms when she was exposed to the fury of beasts in the arena; and sent Judson to India, and Livingstone to Africa, and Brainerd to the Indians.

And this motive shaped the life of Mary Allen West. She could not lead an easy life for her own sake, but she could do anything for Christ's sake. If I had time I would like to tell what she did for this church while she was a member of it. This old First Church has an honorable history, but it may well reckon as chief among its honors the fact that it welcomed Miss West to membership when she was a child and that her love for its fellowship was so great that she retained her membership in it until she passed to the church triumphant. Some of you remember her prayers, as simple, direct and trustful as the home speech of children; her labors with the Band of Hope in yonder chapel; her missionary activity in a number of societies; her Sunday-school in yonder corner of the church, which sent representatives to various parts of the world; her zeal for temperance, which was always according to knowledge; her sympathy for the oppressed, which extended to all colors, kinds and conditions of men; her pity for the fallen, which would not permit her to pass by on the other side; her charity, which moved her to give all that she was and all that she had to the Lord and to his children; her many lovable qualities, which drew hundreds of friends to her, and her constancy which held them as with hooks of steel, and her consecration, which held back nothing which could honor her Master or benefit His cause. All of this, and much more, she put into deeds, far beyond any power that I possess to tell it in words.

And for Christ's sake she took up those more public duties which called her away from this home church and this college town. It was no dream of personal ambition which led her to Chicago. She edited THE UNION SIGNAL for Christ's sake, and performed all the other duties of her public station for His sake and the gospel's.

And could there be a higher motive? For the sake of Him who for our salvation laid aside the form of God, and was made in the likeness of men; who took upon Him the form of a servant; who went about doing good; who healed the sick, fed the hungry, comforted the sorrowful and pardoned the penitent; who wept over us, prayed for us, died for us, conquered death for us, and ever liveth to intercede for us. Oh, let it thrill and inspire you!

For this motive ennobles all true service. Christ came to establish a new order of nobility. He made known its principles to His disciples once when they were showing evident ambition for place and power. After calling attention to the ambitious desires of Gentile princes he said: "But it shall not be so among you; but whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister; and whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant; even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many."

The founder of this order of nobility showed no fondness for external decorations. The only gold, silver, and precious stones that He cares for are those which adorn character. He did not decorate His disciples with gem-set stars and jeweled crosses, but He told them to carry crosses of self-denial, and incited them to win stars which will shine with undimmed brightness when the gems of earth shall have lost their luster.

And if you ask for other parallels in this new order of nobility which has Christ for its King Arthur—wearing as none save He ever did—the white flower of a blameless life—its coat of arms is a helping hand; its motto is, "In His Name"; and there is room for the whole human race to sit down at its "Table Round."

"The old order changeth, yielding place to new."

What a change is taking place in the world through the rise of this new order of nobility. Slavery is gone, or is doomed where it lingers; for how can there be slaves in a world into which Christ came to make men free indeed. War also is doomed, for God "hath made of one blood all nations of men, for to dwell on all the face of the earth." Knight errantry now is not imitation of the mail-clad heroes of old, but it is imitation of Him who went about doing good. Not the mailed hand is mighty, but the ministering hand. Not thrust of spear and stroke of sword and braining battle ax make a Bayard; but to lift up the fallen, to recover the erring, and to minister to the least of Christ's brethren. And the truly great ones of the earth are not conquerors who have left a track of blood across ravaged lands; but the men who build and endow charitable institutions, who found colleges, who establish libraries and museums, who lead "Salvation armies," who go down into the slums and find souls; and women, who devote their lives to nursing the sick, or who give themselves, for the sake of Christ and humanity, to the multiform activities of philanthropic reform.

In the truly great order of nobility, Mary Allen West was an "elect Lady." By loving service she had become great. She had risen to the peerage of that noble circle of women whose names I need not speak, for they are well known, —a peerage of worth, into which Lady Henry Somerset won her way, and which she prizes more highly than her place in the British peerage. Plain Miss West is more noble than any titled dame who may show half a score of quarterings on her coat of arms, but does not possess the moral worth of this lady who sleeps in the Lord. Her body will not be honored by resting beneath the pavement of Westminster Abbey; but she has a higher honor than many a one whose dust there awaits the resurrection; she is enshrined in the hearts of the people.

"Howe'er it be, it seems to me,
'Tis only noble to be good.
Kind hearts are more than coronets,
And simple faith than Norman blood."

And now in what sense does one save life by losing it for Christ's sake? I answer, such a life is not lost, but profitably invested. It is well to save money, but it is better to invest it where it will bring the largest possible returns consistent with honesty. Save life selfishly and you lose it, as appears in the parable of the talents; invest life and you save it, as appears in the same parable.

All that is glorious in history and all that is glorious in the social, economic, civil and religious life of our day is the result of invested lives. One pours forth his life in song, another puts it into science, or discovery, or education, or philanthropy, or invention, and so the world grows richer because of invested lives—invested often with great toil and suffering and risk—even to the limit of loss, physically.

Christianity to-day represents lost, or invested lives. There is a truth in the doctrine that the holy lives of saints and martyrs form a sacred deposit, which may be drawn on for the good of humanity. Every worthy life forms a part of that deposit, and it is guarded, not by St. Peter's keys, but it belongs to the whole world, and every such life, by its immediate helpfulness, or by its remoter influences, makes it easier for struggling men and women to live worthily.

I cannot tell you how much richer the world is because our sister lost her life for Christ's sake, but I know that in her generation not many invested life more wisely than she did. Her life is not lost. It is a wise deposit, a large investment, and what the sum total of the returns will be no one can tell until the books are opened at the day of final accounts.

And then, to lose one's life for Christ's sake increases capacity for life. Life is a relative term. It means much or little not in proportion to length, but in proportion to great or little capacity. An hour for Milton is worth more than three score years of some lives.

"We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths;
In feelings, not in figures on a dial.
We should count time by heart-throbs.
He most lives
Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best."

THE FIRST CHURCH OF CHRIST, GALESBURG.

Judged by such a standard, Miss West lived much in her fifty-five years. Her capacity for life in thought, feeling and action was great and it was all the time growing. We are sorry that her life was so short in years, but we rejoice that it was so large in capacity. Deep and wide and rich and strong was that life when it flowed into eternity.

And this brings me to the last thought which I will take time to mention. He who loses his life for Christ's sake, saves it unto life eternal.

When we contrast the temporal and spiritual worlds as to duration and worth, it shows, indeed, the most miserable lack of economy, that for the sake of grasping a few sinful pleasures during a brief earthly life, one should cast away an eternity of joy.

During the persecution under Licinius, the Emperor, A. D. 300, his chief governor, Agricolaus, endeavored to turn forty Christians, who were under arrest, from following Christ by offering them money and preferments; but they cried out with one consent: "Oh, eternity, eternity! Give money that may last forever, and glory that may never fade away." As Agricolaus and the Emperor were too poor to pay such a price as that, those forty martyrs accepted violent death, and at God's right hand they found what they were searching for.

I am persuaded that it is a good thing to live for eternity. Apelles said that he painted "for eternity." He was mistaken after all—though his purpose was admirable—for not a stroke of his brush remains at the present day.

Miss West lived for eternity, and what she has done will never perish. She lived for eternity by living the present life worthily. I will not attempt to set the events of her life in orderly array, for the time will not permit, and some one will doubtless give her life to the world in biographical form. But many of us remember how she lived, and we know that the more her life is studied the more clearly it will be seen that she lived a singularly high, noble, unselfish, spiritual life. That life is now forever safe. It is not lost; it is hid with Christ in God.

This faithful servant, having followed Jesus closely during life, is now with Him in glory, to find that a life lost for Christ's sake is unspeakable gain

I am a better man for having known her intimately, and it is high praise to say of her that no one could be with her long without being bettered thereby, unless he persistently put from him that strong influence for good which was as native to her personality as effluent light is to the sun.

Such a life as this which has come to its earthly close furnishes us with a good human standard with which to estimate the value of life. Well might the great Persian poet write:

"I doubt whether those who through every clime
Have wandered and sought, in peace and in strife,
For gold and for treasure, have ever found time
To study the genuine value of life."

Her life, if studied, will show clearly the genuine value of life.

I know also that if she could speak to you to-day out of the unseen she would say something in keeping with these lines, which came from the pen of a woman, Frances Anne Kemble:

"A sacred burden is this life ye bear,
Look on it, lift it, bear it solemnly,
Stand up and walk beneath it steadfastly
Fail not for sorrow, falter not for sin,
But onward, upward, till the goal ye win."

At the close of Dr. Thain's address, Mrs. Sarah Wilder Pratt spoke as follows, for the Illinois Woman's Press Association:

Some one said this morning that "few people were willing to be used by the Divine Spirit as Mary Allen West was," and turning to the Bible I read these words, II Cor. 4 : 6: "For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." That light has shone clearly in all the life of our friend. I speak as a member of the Illinois Woman's Press Association. Miss West was elected in 1885 as our first president. An incident occurring by which she was called to the chair in a meeting of some kind where confusion was running high, it was discovered by a mutual friend that when her gavel came down it was so charged with decision and love that quiet was then restored. "That is our president to be for the I. W. P. A." said my friend, and so it was and has been ever since.

She believed in rotation of office and insisted upon it, but was not listened to. Her constant communion with the Divine Love and acknowledgment of its presence in all our meetings gave her the power to harmonize all differences and her continual ignoring of all appearance of evil was a powerful protest against it. What shall we do without her who has held us to peace and pleasantness and active duty? She had learned that the great secret of love is serving, and so everywhere rendered loving servie. It was felt that except for the wear to her, who was overburdened, she must still fill the pesidential chair for the "Fair" year, and we were all looking forward with joyous hopes to her return to us, when the sad tidings struck so sharp upon our ears.

Where is there another! Yet who can think of her as dead since her influence is a living presence that girdles the earth. Her creed was the Divine Love, her church humanity, her home the world. "Blessed among women" shall be written everywhere for her.

Miss Margaret A. Sudduth spoke for THE UNION SIGNAL, outlining Miss West's connection with the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association and characterizing her rare editorial qualities, also her love for the workers as well as the work. She closed by telling of the voluntary contributions for a memorial drinking fountain, to be plaeed near the Temple, which started in THE UNION SIGNAL composing room, and has now reached the sum of $160.

Mrs. E. G. Hibben, of Peoria, for two years president of the Illinois W. C. T. U., and for sixteen years a personal friend of Miss West, gave the closing address which inspired all to better living. She took for her text, "How are the mighty fallen in their high places," and said: "We stand to-day by the casket of that friend who was one of the mighty in the white ribbon ranks. The women of forty-four states are to-day mourning a mighty leader fallen, but Illinois, her native state, rightly counts herself among the chief mourners. Miss West's life was made up of self-sacrifices. It was fitting that she should have taken this long journey to a foreign land to carry this pure temperance Gospel. It was a mysterious leading of Providence, but we believe it to be His leading. A great leader has fallen; may God raise up a hundred women to take her place. 'Be thou (also) faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life.'"

After the closing song and prayer by the pastor, the audience filed slowly out of the old historic church and proceeded to beautiful Hope cemetery, only a short distance away, and laid to rest beside the graves of her father, mother and sister, the "great leader," so beloved by her own townsfolks as well as by tens of thousands of white-ribboners.

SELF-DENIAL WEEK, APRIL 3-10.

Each white-ribboner the world over is asked to deny herself something to which she is accustomed, and give the money that would have been used in its purchase to the treasury of the World's W. C. T. U., sending the same directly to Mrs. Ella F. M. Williams, 26 Chomedy St., Montreal, Canada.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

The Panama Canal cases are nearing the close.

Arizona is knocking for admission into the United States.

A new extradition treaty with Sweden has been sent by the President for ratification by the Senate.

The thirty-fourth birthday of Emperor William was celebrated with great rejoicing in Berlin, January 27.

The contents of the new Irish home rule bill which is to be introduced at the opening of Parliament in February, are made public.

Princess Margaret, the youngest sister of Emperor William of Germany, was wedded last week to Prince Frederick Charles of Hesse.

At a meeting in New York Saturday, the Whisky Trust combine reduced its price on whisky eighteen cents per gallon, thus ending the great speculation.

At a caucus of Republican senators in Washington last week it was decided to take favorable action upon the admission of the territories of Oklahoma, Utah and New Mexico to the Union.

A memorial to Congress requesting the United States government to take absolute possession of all anthracite coal lands and operate them in the interests of coal consumers was passed in the Minnesota senate last week.

A resolution was offered in the Senate by Senator Chandler last Thursday and referred to the Committee on Finance, instructing that committee to inquire into the existence and purposes of the Whisky Trust and to report by December 1.

James G. Blaine passed away January 27, and was buried at Oak Hill on the 30th. President Harrison ordered all the executive departments at Washington to be closed on the day of the funeral, and the State department to be draped in mourning for thirty days.

Dispatches received at San Francisco, January 28, bear the important news of the overthrow of the Hawaiian monarchy, the establishment of a provisional government under two Hawaiians of American parentage, an American and a Scotchman, and the departure of an embassy to Washington requesting annexation to the United States.

THE time is flying and April will soon be here when the returns of our Great Petition should all be sent in to Miss Alice E. Briggs, the Temple, Chicago. Representatives of thirty-four countries will unite in this greatest of all petitions, our own among them, we hope with at least a relative number of signatures to voice our country's protest against the liquor traffic.

A NEW idea and especially a good one is always hailed with interest. One comes from the Manitoba W. C. T. U., originated by the Provincial superintendent of organization, and it is to hold a Mock Parliament, February 9th, in the Opera House at Winnipeg. The women in the Province have municipal and school suffrage and are now petitioning for full franchise. The object of the gathering is to enthuse and educate the members. They will conduct the proceedings strictly in accordance with the rules of the legislature. The second reading of the bill to giv women the right to sit in the legislative assembly and vote for members thereof, will be the question under discussion. We wish success to all such educative and progressive efforts.

POLICE station and police matron work is a department which appeals to our practical and earnest women everywhere. Its claims and suggestions for its workings are admirably set forth in an article by our National superintendent of police station and police matron work, Mrs. Margaret A. Watts, of Louisville, Ky., on page twelve.

FOR twenty years the temperance people of this country have gone to the United States Congress and asked for a commission to inquire into the relation which the liquor traffic bears to pauperism and crime. The latest of these untiring efforts, January 26, only gave an opportunity for a saloon-sustaining Congressman to pour out an invective against such "pseudo-philanthropists who want to use the powers of Congress to advance some especial hobby to which they are devoting their otherwise useless lives." Yet these "pseudo-philanthropists" will not "down," and some day they will find the entrance so long denied. Then our craven legislators and politicians may find themselves forced to face the real vital issue of the day, and the protecting veil of government will be lifted from the unrighteous traffic in liquor.

ALL good people must rejoice that General Booth comes off with flying colors in the report of the committee appointed to look into the great charges of which the Salvation Army is almoner. Lord Onslow reports that speaking in general terms he has made most satisfactory reports on ninety-five per cent of the money invested. The committee has held twenty-three sittings, and has been most thorough in its work. An expert accountant, who gave his services to the committee, has had a dozen clerks at work going through books. The General has been repeatedly cross-examined, and so have the leading officials of the Army. Any adverse comment on the part of the committee takes the form of an expression of opinion to the effect that the General has perhaps cut out too broadly for the amount of his cloth; in other words, it is to be regretted that quite so much cash should have been invested in buildings. One member of the committee thinks it is important to provide against the General's decease by appointing a trustee, but even this committee-man has frankly declared that he would be sorry if anything should prevent the Darkest England experiment being pushed forward and thoroughly tested.

"WARSHIPS for Hawaii," "Annexation a red-hot question," were some of the ominous headlines in the American dailies of January 30. The Saturday previous five commissioners reached San Francisco from Honolulu, bringing the news of a revolution on the islands of Hawaii January 14 and the proposition of annexation to the United States government. The next morning the flagship Mohican left San Francisco for Honolulu, and other ships are being prepared for the same voyage. The deposition of Queen Liliuokalani and the overthrow of the monarchical government are the immediate causes for the annexation appeal, but the desire for this has long existed among a large class of Hawaiians. It should be favorably noticed that the quiet acquiescence of the queen in her own deposition alone saved a bloody war. She appeals to the United States to reinstate her authority, asserting that she yielded only to the superior strength of our naval force. The press of San Francisco either favors annexation or such a belligerent attitude as will prevent any other foreign power from gaining possession of the islands. The opinion at Washington among Congressmen seems to be against annexation, on the ground of Hawaii's remoteness and the expense involved in assuming her protectorate. The commissioners will reach Washington on Friday, and will immediately seek an interview with the powers that be. But it is doubtful if this weighty question is one which can be settled during the present administration, and it is probable that President Cleveland will call the much talked of extra session of Congress for the consideration of this new international problem.

THE experience of Cambridge, Mass., in securing prohibition for seven years in succession and the efforts put forth by its temperance advocates are well worthy a detailed and careful study. Never were plans better laid and executed by a citizens' committee. Money was raised, ($2,000), headquarters opened, the entire registration was canvassed and prohibition voters notified by circular just when and where to vote, their names being checked off as they appeared at the polling places and men sent to bring in those who had not voted. A large printed sheet, called Frozen Truth, consisting of actual facts setting forth the great gain to the city in good order, thrift, increased growth, savings bank deposits, in real valuation, in unity and public spirit, from prohibition, was sent to every voter in the city. Public meetings were held and the churches united in the agitation so that by prayer, hard work and a wise use of means the real issue was kept before the people and a glorious victory attained. Similar efforts would reap similar results in many other law-abiding communities, we are sure. At least the successful endeavors as briefly outlined above ought to be full of instruction to public-spirited citizens everywhere.

THAT invaluable institution, the Woman's Lecture Bureau, has been placed under the care of Miss Lucy Anthony, Somerton, Philadelphia, who is a niece of the redoubtable "Susan B." Miss Anthony herself consents to go on the list and there is not a woman in America, or a man either, whom the people more delight to honor than this great-hearted pioneer who has given half a century of active work in the temperance, suffrage, and other reforms that are vital to the uplift of humanity. Miss Lucy Anthony has had some years of experience in making lecture trips, and has been most successful. She is trusty, quick and genial, three points from which alone can be constructed the triangle of a lecture bureau that shall live and last. It is slow work to build up such an institution, but it is very sure. People wish to hear good speakers on living issues; reformers speak at lower rates than lyceum lecturers do, and Miss Anthony can furnish as good speakers as the nation affords at far less rates than they could be obtained from the regular lecture season bureaus. We urge our brothers and sisters everywhere to try the lecture bureau under its new auspices, and we are confident they will never regret so doing. For particulars see page twelve of last week's UNION SIGNAL.

FATHER MAHONEY, our stalwart prohibition worker issues a bi-weekly manifesto at St. Paul, Minn., and we wish it might be as ubiquitous as drink. It is an admirable little sheet to give away and full of convincing arguments against the liquor men's tactics, and the high license fallacy. We wish our white-ribboners would send to Father Mahoney for specimens and give them out to Catholics, who will accept the utterances of their own great men, and thus be brought into a more intelligent sympathy with what we are trying to do. Here are some quotations: "One-half the amount of what is annually spent in drink in Ireland would, if applied for the purpose, buy in fifteen years all the farms in Ireland." "If we could make England sober we might shut up nine-tenths of the jails." Cardinal McCabe, of Dublin, writes, "Intemperance is the source of nearly all our crimes and misfortunes. Ninety per cent of all Irish crimes are traceable directly or indirectly to drink. I blush for the old race whenever I walk along the streets of our cities and read over the doorways prefaced so seldom by the words, 'bank, dry goods store,' and so often by the words 'saloon and imported liquors.' In a single western state of America there are one thousand five hundred saloons kept by Irishmen, representing twelve million dollars that come out of Irish pockets in one year. Must we have the drink always with us? Is there no remedy? The state alone can save us. The traffic smiles approvingly on moral suasion. Moral suasion leaves its work intact."

THE PATH SEEN FROM THE HILL.

BY H. W. GIBSON.

As the lone wanderer perplexed and troubled,
Seeing no way to go,
Doth seek some height whence he may view the landscape
Stretched like a map below,
And noting carefully each foremost landmark,
Of mound, or tree, or hill,
Doth haste him down to follow through the valley
The path seen from the hill—

So would I seek in times of doubt and conflict
The sacred mount of God,
Whence I may mark the relative proportions
Of all things on life's road;
And frame my course upon the clearer insight
Into my Father's will,
Striving to follow closely through life's valley
The path seen from the hill!

Paris, France.

A WHITE RIBBON PILGRIM IN ENGLAND—THE ENGLISH CAMPAIGN.

BY FLORENCE BALGARNIE.

The holiday season was upon us, and Christmas day dawned with a face so smiling and rosy as to puzzle the American who imagines the old country is in gloom six days out of seven.

But next morning London woke to a horror of great darkness, to the awful, indescribable yellowness and blackness of a genuine fog which remained until the evening of the 29th; the merry peals of Cathedral bells gave place to the horrid explosion of fog signals all along the tracks down which the trains slowly crawled, and sunshine was feebly replaced by electric light, gas and oil lamps which only seemed to render the gloom more deadly dark.

Meantime the campaigners, Lady Henry Somerset, Miss Frances E. Willard and Miss Anna Gordon, were resting after their labors in the charming retreat known as the Cottage Reigate. Reigate is one of the quaintest little old world towns, lying in a vale amidst the Surrey hills. A famous coaching place it was in the so-called "good old days," which we people of the radical persuasion prefer to call the "bad old days," because they were allied with much political corruption and organized monopoly. Reigate too, was in its day an ecclesiastical centre, as the Priory indicates; but only the ghosts of mediæval monks remain to haunt the dusty alcoves, while its modern owner prefers to live outside her own Priory gates, in the charming William Morris decorated home, termed the Cottage. It is such a quiet spot, and in the summer the back garden is all alive with sweet, old-fashioned flowers, such as Mrs. Allingham loves to paint and Kate Greenaway portrays in her children's books, where the daffy-down-dillies stand all in a row. Here, then, under its wintry aspect, which with us means either white or green, for in damp little England the grass never fades, our well-beloved and honored leaders rested until the New Year brought with it a fresh round of work.

It was pleasant, indeed, to welcome Miss Willard and Miss Gordon again amongst us. You have already heard of the magnificent reception accorded to them and Lady Henry by the Highgate Temperance Society, the very night after they reached town. This is old news, but the little people may like to know that the church in which they spoke is at the very foot of the famous Highgate hill, up which Dick Whittington was climbing when Bow Bells called him back saying, "Return! Return! you shall be Lord Mayor of London."

The meeting on temperance Sunday in St. James Hall, under the presidency of the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, was also a great success, and both ladies, despite the ill effects of bad storms on the Atlantic, made a deep impression upon the audience which crowded every corner. This James Hall, where some of the grandest political rallies have been held from time immemorial, and where classical concerts are given almost daily throughout the season, has now for years past been engaged every Sunday by the West End Mission, organized by the Methodists.

As you may guess by the name, this hall is not far from the Palace of St. James, close by which is Marlborough House, the town residence of the Prince and Princess of Wales. Strolling then from St. James Hall, down Piccadilly, and turning to the left as we make for Pall Mall, we come upon the palace and passing by its quadrangle, where a military band sometimes plays, we cross St. James Park, traverse the foot bridge over the lake, come out by Queen Anne's Gate and so find ourselves in Victoria Street, where at Albany Buildings, No. 47, Miss Helen Hood works all day with ceaseless fidelity. Even on Boxing Day, a day which to the cockney is more peculiarly a holiday than even Christmas itself, the faithful secretary was at her post at the headquarters of the World's W. C. T. U. of the British Empire.

Emerging into the street let us proceed up it to Broad Sanctuary, that spot where many a poor hunted wretch found safety from his pursuers in the olden day, and so past the James Abbey of Westminster and the Parliament Houses to Trafalgar Square, where the National Gallery stands. Then on we go up St. Martin's Lane, round the east corner of the British Museum and presently we find ourselves at 57 Gordon Square, where Lady Henry and her guests make their home during their months of work.

From hence within three days after reaching home they set off on a prolonged tour of conferences, which had been organized by the ever capable Miss Hood. Yorkshire was the first point of attack. A series of conferences and meetings was held in Sunderland, Middlesborough, Hartlepool, Doncaster and other places. Then came a few days of grace, and after that Birmingham was made the center, followed by Nottingham, both of them most important towns in the Midland counties. As all these conferences are planned on similar lines, one is typical of the rest.

Nothing could exceed the enthusiasm displayed everywhere. The Yorkshire folks are "canny" and cautious, but "true and tender," and temperance sentiment is much more fully developed there than in some of the southern counties. That most active temperance reformer, the Countess of Carlisle, owns estates at Castle Howard, in the North Riding of the county, and the Yorkshire women have a splendid federation of unions, which they work much on the lines of American state unions and which is affiliated with the headquarters of the British women in the Memorial Hall, London.

In the Birmingham town hall I understand the finest demonstration of all was held. On the evening of the first day the largest hall in Nottingham was crowded to overflowing. The speakers of the evening were of course Miss Willard and Lady Henry, both of whom were in excellent form. Your sweet singer, Madame Antoinette Stirling, whom we now consider ours, sang three times, and most charming thing of all, gave a little temperance speech by way of response to the final encore. Next day the conference sat from early morning until late in the afternoon, when organization, literature, police matrons and many other subjects were discussed and Mrs. Whitall Smith gave one of her ever-profitable Bible readings. In the interval between conference and public assembly Miss Anna Gordon held a pleasant meeting for the children.

The second evening session was no less successful than the previous one, and deputations of the Rechabites, Good Templars and other bodies presented addresses to both of the distinguished visitors. The platform was quite gay with regalia and badges of all kinds, among which the white ribbon, like a modest snowdrop, peeped from many a bosom.

At these conferences delegates were present from all points of the county, so on each occasion we may say a capital stroke of organization was accomplished.

BRITISH RECEPTION TO MISS FRANCES E. WILLARD.

The great united demonstration convened by Lady Henry Somerset in honor of her beloved and well known guest, Miss Frances E. Willard, was without a parallel in the history of the temperance movement. For once all barriers seemed broken down, and men and women of every creed and many nationalities banded together to testify their appreciation of the services rendered to humanity at large by the President of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Deeper even than this was the significance of this magnificent gathering, for on this eventful night, Monday, January 9, delegates from forty-six societies were present, men, women and children, representing the grand standing army, seven million strong, of total abstainers, which exists within the British Isles. This vast army of the mother country was drawn up not as a foe of the great Republic across the seas, but as friends, allies, comrades of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of America, to give them a right royal salute, and to shout in joyful chorus: We wage with you, our beloved American sisters, our peaceful war for God and Home and Every Land. Would that we might have demonstrations such as this in every town throughout the two great countries, for then would the mutual prejudice, pride and jealousy engendered by newspaper recriminations, McKinley tariffs and ignorance vanish as dewdrops in the sunshine.

The meeting was announced for half-past seven in Exeter Hall, but more than an hour before the time the Strand was lined with thousands of people eager to gain admittance. So great had been the demand for tickets that their issue had been suspended on the previous Saturday; but ticket or no ticket, people seemed determined to force an entrance, and the situation was, for a time, almost alarming. Arriving at the main door at seven o'clock, it was nearly half-past before I succeeded in forcing my way up the crowded staircase to the platform, where I found the speakers already seated. The national choral society of the National Temperance League, led by Mr. James A. Birch, and accompanied on the great organ by Mr. Frank W. Parish (both of Her Majesty's Chapel Royal), rendered the familiar chorus:

"Joined in God's cause, heart to heart, hand to hand
We all belong, we all belong;
Each one a part of the white ribbon band,
We all belong, we all belong;
Each but a unit, yet each counts for all,
What though our place and labor be small,
Our part be but to obey His great call,
We all belong, we all belong."

Prayer had previously been offered by the Rev. F. B. Meyer, who has lately succeeded the Rev. Newman Hall, at Christ church, Westminster, and audience, platform and choir had joined in singing the well-known hymn "How firm a foundation."

The scene from the platform was most impressive. Exeter Hall, that ancient rallying ground for the advocates of great causes, has grown somewhat worn and dreary looking with time, but to-night it seemed to have put on holiday attire. From out the dingy window recesses which line each side from platform to back gallery, waved the flags of all nations, American, British, Chinese, German and French; the great organ was fairly embowered in tall palms betwixt which hung the banners of the Woman's Union, the white-ribbon encircled globe and the motto, "Christ for the World," and below this embroidered in white chrysanthemums upon a crimson cloth was the one short, sweetly comprehensive word, "Welcome." On either side of this the flags of the two great English-speaking nations were draped, the Stars and Stripes to the right, the Union Jack to the left. The front of the platform was wreathed with holly, laurels and yew, and intertwined with tulips, white and red, while the air was fragrant with the presence of lilies of the valley, roses and lilacs.

Lady Henry Somerset was in the chair, and on her right sat Miss Willard, supported by a host of distinguished men and women, Members of Parliament, London county councillors, labor representatives and temperance advocates, together with members of the following societies:

The British Women's Temperance Association, the World's Women's Christian Temperance Union, the United Kingdom Alliance, the Young Abstainers' Union, the Independent Order of Rechabites, the Independent Order of Good Templars, the Anti-Opium League, the Anti-Opium Women's Emergency League, the Church of England Temperance Society, the Total Abstaining Section of the Y. W. C. A., the Band of Mercy, the Salvation Army, the International Christian Police Association, the Church Army, the London West-end Mission, the Women's Suffrage Society, the Peace Society, the Vegetarian Society, the Rev. Armstrong Bennett, B. A. and six ministers deputation from the Wesleyan Church, the Tower Hamlet's Mission, the Baptist Total Abstinence Society, the Women's Liberal Federation, the National Union of Women Workers, the English Sunday Closing Association, the National Vigilance Society, the East London Mission Institute, the Prison Gate Mission, the Friends' Temperance Union, the Railway Mission, the British Medical Association, the Congregational Total Abstinence Society, the Theological Students' Total Abstinence Society, the New Church Temperance Society, the Catholic Total Abstinence League of the Cross, the National Temperance Federation, the Phœnix Order, the Working Women's Teetotal League, the Butchers' Total Abstinence Society, the Bakers' Total Abstinence Society, the General Post-office Total Abstinence Society, the London Temperance Hospital, the Temperance Orphanage Board, the Y. M. C. A., the Railway Temperance Mission, the Presbyterian Total Abstinence Association and the Women's Trades Union Association.

The opening address of welcome was given by Lady Henry Somerset and was so brief, yet full of poetry and reverence that it may be given in full:

"It is fitting that this historic hall should have been chosen as the scene of a welcome to one who, above all other titles deserves that of Reformer. Wherever the temperance cause has a champion, wherever the cause of social purity has an exponent, wherever the labor movement lifts up its voice, wherever woman with the sunlight of the glad new day upon her face stretches forth her hands to God, there is the name of Frances Willard loved, cherished and revered. Tried by a jury of her peers—even amid the clashing opinions of this transition age where the old is unwilling to die and the new seems hardly ready to be born—there would still come the verdict, she is a fair opponent, she is a kindly comrade; as Lincoln said, she has 'firmness in the right as God gives her to see the right, and moves along her chosen path with malice toward none and charity for all.' From that more august and perhaps impartial jury, beyond the circle of reform, comes the verdict prophetic of that which history shall one day record—she made the world wider for women and happier for humanity.

"We know that America owes her greatness to the sterling worth of those intrepid Puritan pioneers who were the best gift of the old world to the new; so Frances Willard, who has in her veins that pure New England blood, owes to her ancestry much of the strength and courage that must ever be the basis of a reformer's character.

"If no other work had been accomplished, one of the greatest achievements of Frances Willard's life has been her mission of reconciliation to the women of the South while yet the scars of war throbbed in their breasts, and new-made graves stretched wide between sections that had learned the misery of hatred. It was the white ribbon taken by her tender hands that bound these wounds and gently drew the noble-hearted women of that sunny land into the hospitable home circle of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

"'Sacrifice is the foundation of all real success,' and it was a crucial moment in Miss Willard's life when she deliberately relinquished the brilliant position of dean of the first woman's college connected with a university in America, to go out penniless, alone and unheralded because her spirit had caught the rhythm of the women's footsteps as they bridged the distance between the home and the saloon in the Pentecostal days of the temperance crusade. She has relinquished that which women hold the dearest, the sacred, sheltered life of home. For her no children wait around the Christmas hearth, but she has lost that life only to find it again ten thousand fold. She has understood the mystery of the wider circle of love and loyalty, and the world is her home as truly as John Wesley said it was his parish. She has understood the divine motherhood that claims the orphaned hearts of humanity for her heritage, and a chorus of children's voices around the world hail her as mother, for organized mother-love is the best definition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

'Live and take comfort; thou wilt leave behind
Powers that will work for thee—
Air, earth and skies.
There's not a breathing of the common wind
That will forget thee; thou hast great allies;
Thy friends are exultations, agonies,
And love and man's unconquerable mind.'

"In honor of such a guest we have gathered our choicest flowers of rhetoric and birds of song, for it is good and true to pour out the fragrance of our affection and our praise, and place our tribute in the warm clasp of living hands rather than lay it on the cold marble of the tomb."

Before resuming her seat the chairman called upon the Rev. Canon Wilberforce to give the first greeting to Miss Willard because he knew something of the work she has accomplished, and his visit to America had given him an insight into the power and strength of women's work there, and Canon Wilberforce then dashed into an earnest temperance appeal and offered Miss Willard a hearty welcome in the name of the Church of England Temperance Reformers.

The crowd driven back from the doors had flocked down the staircase and filled to overflowing a small hall capable of holding some fifteen hundred people. Here the eloquent Canon, followed quickly by Madame Antoinette Stirling, retired to keep them in patience until Miss Willard and Lady Henry Somerset had completed their duties upstairs.

The Rev. Mark Guy Pearse then spoke as representing Methodism, and was to have been followed by that dearly loved Catholic priest of Liverpool, Monseigneur Nugent, but to the general disappointment came instead the following telegram:

Regret exceedingly that severe cold prevents me being present to-night, having been confined to my room since Thursday. Offer a cordial welcome to Miss Willard and wish her every blessing in her heroic work. NUGENT.

Seated on Miss Willard's right was a little, dark-eyed, dusky-browed lady with a white, crimson-edged mantle enshrouding her from head to foot. Her Oriental coloring had relieved the monotony of western dullness of attire and all eyes were riveted upon her when introduced as Miss Soonderbai Powar, "a daughter of the Ganges come to hail the daughter of the Mississippi."

During the evening cable and telegrams had kept pouring in, among them from Mr. John Bidwell:

America to England: Our National Prohibition party affectionately greet you; you honor America by your welcome to Miss Willard, America's great reformer.

From Mrs. Eliza J. Thompson:

Crusade greetings to England's workers.

From Mrs. E. Louise Demorest:

Hearty welcome accorded our leader and oracle, Frances E. Willard, regarded an indication of English co-operation in suppressing the drink traffic.

From Mrs. Susan S. Fessenden:

I. Thess. 3:10, first clause.

And also telegrams from a number of branches of the British Women's Temperance Association.

Mrs. Bramwell Booth who was announced on the program as taking part in the meeting, unfortunately was unavoidably detained, but upon the platform were several representatives of the Salvation Army, and any allusions to that body were greeted with applause. Mr. John G.

HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

Woolley, who has already won his spurs with us in England, was next introduced, and was followed by "A hymn to music," by the choir, and the presentation of a bouquet of roses and lilies to Miss Willard from Miss de Broen, Paris; a basket of flowers, grapes and apricots from the children of the Lincoln Band of Hope union, of which Mrs. Massingberd is president, and a most exquisite white silk banner, upon which was embroidered, the work of some members of the Y's, in blue and gold, the following inscription:

"Warmest Welcome to Frances E. Willard, our Honored Guest and Beloved Fellow Worker, from Loyal British Women, Exeter Hall, January 9, 1893."

In addition Lady Somerset presented a white album containing autograph letters of welcome to Miss Willard from many well known and zealous reformers.

Mrs. Ormiston Chant was next introduced as representing the suffrage and peace movements; "For," said Lady Somerset, "it was the revered and honored Susan B. Anthony who said to me when I parted from her in America, 'I look on Frances Willard as the woman who has done and will do most to hasten the day of our deliverance.' It is fitting, therefore, that a voice as tuneful and as loved on both sides of the sea should give the greeting of the English Guild."

The Rev. B. F. Horton then spoke as a Congregationalist, and Mr. W. T. Stead, editor of the Review of Reviews, "whose purity crusade was the lever that lifted the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of America into that new evolution of work so inextricably bound to the temperance movement as the name denotes, for purity is the key-word of white-ribboners." Alderman Ben Tillett, one of the leaders of the greatest Trades Union in the world, the Union which is redeeming the most unskilled laborers from poverty, viz: The Dock, Wharf, Riverside and General Laborers' Union of Great Britain and Ireland—made historic three years ago by the Dock strike of the Port of London—was next to have spoken, but he was unavoidably detained in Bristol by reason of the important part he plays in a great strike in that city, but he sent the following letter, which in our ever-increasing Democratic country deserves an honored record:

BRISTOL, Jan. 8, 1893.

MY DEAR LADY SOMERSET:—For obvious reasons I shall not be able to attend your meeting, to give welcome to Miss Willard. I do recognize the importance of your gathering, and feel that it represents a mighty effort, making for the greater sisterhood and brotherhood. The movement of social progress wants all the brains and ability, the well-wishes the human race can give it. Its energy, its vitality must come from the highest sources. The personification of strong purpose and strong will is embodied in the lady you have to-night for your guest. As such I am anxious to say how grateful I am, that in one sphere of useful reforming work you have such a character to make vivid the expression of the need for reform.

Wishing your meeting success, I remain,
Yours sincerely,
BEN TILLETT.

His place was worthily taken by Mrs. Annie Hicks, one of the noblest women England has produced, a leader amongst the Trades Unions for women, and one who recognizes temperance as the basis for her work.

Mr. J. N. Raper, the Nestor of the United Kingdom Alliance, was received with loud applause when he said that he knew Miss Willard as a baby but three years old. He referred to her temperance age, and drawing from his pocket an old newspaper of seventeen years ago he proved his claim to prophetic power by reading his own deliberate opinion as expressed, when on a tour in the states in 1876, with regard to Miss Willard who was then but setting out in what he foretold would be a grand temperance career. He concluded by expressing the hope that he might meet her again on this platform seventeen years hence, on January 9, 1910.

It was now half-past nine and all were growing impatient to hear the guest of the evening, therefore the illuminated addresses which were to have been formally presented were simply handed over to Miss Willard in the name of three hundred branches of the British Women's Temperance Association, the Working Women's Temperance Union, the Independent Order of the Rechabites, the Vegetarian Society, the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Miss Willard then rose to speak and was greeted with a magnificent ovation, audience and platform rising en masse, waving handkerchiefs and giving three British cheers in a manner which, with all their enthusiasm, no American audience has as yet mastered, for it takes a burly form and the broad chest of John Bull to cheer in the lusty fashion of our Saxon and Viking ancestry. Miss Willard won all hearts by the simple, pathetic description of her early life on the prairie farm, her girlish aspirations for power, and above all, voting power, her entrance into a larger life, her work for prohibition and her enthusiasm for the purity and the labor causes. Late although the hour was, she was compelled to descend to the lower hall and address the crowd which had waited patiently there through the long hours.

TRAFALGAR SQUARE.

On opening the leading London newspapers the next morning I find that even that most conservative and would-be oracle, the Times, devotes considerable space to a report of what even it is forced to admit was a "remarkable spectacle"; while the Daily News, organ of the Liberal party says: "Miss Willard has perfect command of the eloquence which is unadorned, and her quaint Americanisms, homely practicability and quiet earnestness, had a wonderful effect upon the audience. She established sympathetic relations with them at once and her response was a wonderful combination of dry humor and common sense. The demonstrations were from first to last a magnificent success."

The Daily Chronicle, the organ of the Labor party, the advanced Radicals of the more Socialistic persuasion, devoted nearly two columns to a description of the meeting and concluded a leading article by saying: "To this result, (the making of people at once free and sober) in whatever part of the world it takes form first, Miss Willard—of whose career and views our readers learned fully in the interesting interview she accorded to our representative a few days ago—will have contributed a splendid share, to which last night's meeting was a fitting tribute."

Madame Antoinette Stirling sang, "Oh, rest in the Lord," three cheers for the chairman, votes of thanks proposed by Mr. William Benn, M. P., L. C. C., and seconded by Mr. J. Malins, C. C., C. C. T., and the temperance doxology closed this unique gathering. We feel that our work has been stimulated and our society is encouraged to move on conquering and to conquer.

SCIENTIFIC NUTRITION IN COOKERY.*

BY SARA C. BULL.

I.

EOREWERT.

How is nutrition in cookery related to temperance? it will be asked.

The W. C. T. U. now aims, we believe, in its various departments to be the teacher, and by doing essential, positive work it overcomes the evil in our midst.

The Crusade served as a baptism to the consecrated workers, but the work itself has brought out these home-women into lines of study, thought and action they little dreamed of at the start.

Nutrition is the enemy of intemperance. It satisfies the child and man, and the healthy, unperverted system neither craves for nor likes condiments or stimulants.

These articles are to give the views of scientific people who accept properly cooked and combined foods with a fair amount of irritants and stimulants, vinegar, pepper, tea and coffee, etc., as temperate and right. Hygienic cookery—pure food to make pure blood—would require of many W. C. T. U. women, possibly, as great self-control and denial as they require of persons addicted to alcoholic stimulants. In all things the ideal of right living becomes clearer as we study the perverted in relation to the normal state of health, either physical or moral. If these articles help in this direction, I shall be satisfied. . . . . .

The articles will perhaps contain nothing new to the good cook and experienced housewife. But the rationale will be studied and the conclusions of those specially fitted to teach us will be given. There may be those who wish to know more about cookery but who feel that they have not the "faculty, judgment and knack" so constantly quoted and needed to bring out satisfactory results. The reason why certain directions in the cook books are given, if fully understood, is to impart courage to those having the responsibility without the equipment they would desire in the way of education or experience in this line of work. The chemistry of food leads naturally and pleasantly to the practical demonstration of the cooking-class. And cookery may be made as attractive, we believe, as we all know the proper service of the table to be, with its snowy linen, glass, flowers and attractively served dishes.

It would seem that if food is to be properly nutritive it should be varied and appetizing, and that our standard of what is appetizing should also be in agreement with what those in health assure us to be good and satisfying, suited to the doing of hard work either mental or physical. Good health may be affirmed by those who are able to do their day's work comfortably without stimulants; who are able, as Mrs. Richards expresses it, to bear cold, wet and hunger for a day or two readily; a sweet breath and quietude of nerves that know no dread of work or anxious care in advance of its performance, but go to it with enjoyment, are signs of a normal, sound condition. And such persons will not think much about the quality of food, but will instinctively take the most nutritious and wholesome that is offered them.

*The writers quoted in these articles most frequently are E. Atkinson "Science of Nutrition," with tables or notes by Mrs. Ellen H. Richards, Mrs. Mary Hinman Abel and others, W. O. Atwater and C. D. Wood's "Food Investigations," Mathew Williams' "Chemistry of Cookery," Dr. G. Konig, "Zusammensetzung der Menschen Nahrungs und Gennssmittel," Berlin, 1889. Huxley, "Physiology Cook Books," Mrs. D. A. Lincoln's "School Kitchen Text Book and Cook Book," and Miss Parloa's "Kitchen Guide and Companion."

A cheerful mind and ample time for meals is the best help to digestion and the best economy, with no comments at the moment on the food offered; this is not merely in agreement with the best breeding, but is a real help to digestion, in that any other topic which is agreeable to all is better than talk at meals about the food we eat. The palate, when unperverted, is as decided in its natural taste for good food as the healthy mind is for good literature. And children, fortunately, are not difficult to bring back to a healthful state if they have been perverted by an unwholesome table.

What do we ordinarily find to be objectionable in the common diet?

Very commonly the food elements are wrongly proportioned; too much starch in white breads, pastry and potatoes for the fats and albumens, or the latter too much concentrated, as, for instance, the too frequent use of beef which tends to inflammatory conditions and excitement of nerve for people of sedentary habits.

While the present processes of flour manufacture, as proven by analysis, do not so deprive the white flour it is claimed of the nitrogen element as to make the waste very great, since a greater proportion of that remaining is assimilated than in the case of the graham bread, yet the phosphates in the white flour are a serious loss. It is also found that fluorine, one of the elements essential to the teeth and bones, contained in the wheat as in hardly any other article of food, is lost with other elements, and this is a very serious loss, and should be a satisfactory reason for choosing the whole wheat flour in preference to the white flour. For those persons who cannot assimilate graham flour (unfortunately much of it is adulterated in the general market with poor grain and mixtures) the peeled wheat flour, furnished by the Health Food Company, rich in the nitrogen element and carefully prepared to preserve all the elements, it is claimed, is excellent. The use of whole wheat flour, fine or coarse, according to individual needs and preferences with the yellowish tint furnished by the nitrogenous gluten soon educates the taste to a decided preference for it.

Baking powder breads, so common now in the country, are not wholesome for daily use. The pure baking powders, soda and cream of tartar in union, form a residue of Rochelle salt not injurious occasionally, perhaps, but being medicinal, it is not to be supplied constantly like the common salt—chloride of sodium.

The proper baking of bread to help toward converting the starch into dextrine and to incline the eater to the thorough mastication of it, since it is to be remembered that the stomach proper does not act upon the starch, except it be so converted by the cookery and saliva, is important. Toast and reheated bread are more digestible because of this change in the starch.

The baby's first solid food often consists mainly of potatoes, soda crackers and white bread with milk, although the child's stomach is not ready for starch in such quantities, and other grains should be used in combination. Both young and old need to give starch foods much more careful mastication than beef, yet this is not always taught a child, or the need of giving the teeth work as well as the stomach with other than soft foods. Good, nutritious flour, milk and eggs are difficult to get in the general market at a reasonable price. The poor man or women pays a larger proportion than is reasonable for badly selected food, and to secure nutrition that food is to suffer waste by poor cooking. The rich are harmed by extravagant waste in concentrated foods not well combined, if not improperly cooked, and their children seldom have the breadstuffs that are essential to their normal, physical development.

Not only is it found that food is improperly combined as noted above, but after the digestion is weakened by improper quantities and quality of the same it is usually excited to further efforts by "appetizers," condiments or stimulants, catsups, sauces, mustard, peppers, pickles, spices, tea and coffee, if not beer, wines and liquors, for the nerves' and stomach's sake.

When one meal has been omitted for any reason, and a feeling of "all goneness" follows, it may be known that the system has been more stimulated than nourished by the habits of diet. People blindly tax their digestion to the extreme, prodding it unmercifully by frequency of eating and undue seasoning, but they are surprised after this extra work is done if diabetes, Bright's disease or plethora, which expresses itself in colds, bronchial troubles, etc., appear. Yet the family in which these do appear has been making the way for them by hundreds and thousands of meals.

It is to be recalled that we are wise or unwise by the month and year, and that if we know and understand that certain things are essential and wholesome, the child as naturally learns to like and to help the right order, as it becomes exacting, irritable and discontented under the wrong conditions, because it is victimized by the ignorance or negligence of the mother, and has been denied nerve and muscle food.

REFORM FORCES: CAN THEY UNITE?

BY JOHN BIDWELL.

All forces having for their object purposes worthy of a place in the catalogue of self-evident and imperative reforms ought verily, in some way and at the earliest convenience possible, to be brought together. The question is asked, Is it practicable? It is, as I firmly believe. There are obstacles, of course. But no one can be warranted in the expression of a doubt till every possible effort has been put forth to overcome the obstacles. And if practicable then it becomes an unquestioned and imperative duty on the part of all reform forces without delay to fall into line.

The election has not shown as great advance in numbers as we had hoped, but it has made possible great and greater advances. It has taught sublime lessons, one of which is that of patience. The storm has to an extent cleared the political sky and given us a wider horizon. The fiat has gone forth—the people dissatisfied with former conditions demand change. They have been able not only to see but to feel that higher tariffs mean heavier burdens for they have to pay all the bills. The winning party can claim no indorsement because it happened simply to be the convenient instrument, providentially at hand, with which to inaugurate the beginning of the mighty changes to follow.

One thought to my mind is most significant. If a dominant party of boundless ambition, with more than thirty years' tuition in political life, with an administration intrenched in power, with the patronage of more than two hundred thousand official appointés—their friends and adherents—with the influence of a quarter of a million saloons and liquor dealers fostered and served by that administration, with the mighty aid of untold wealth and enormous monopoly interests at its command, in a word, with the press and every agency known to modern political warfare, if such a party could not successfully plead its right to exist and win a victory in 1892 it can never win. What the future may be no man may venture to premise. One thing is certain, the past can never be recalled. Prohibition has advanced, every sign is encouraging. The opportunity is in itself an invitation to all good men, to all good people opposed to the rule of rum, monopoly and corruption, and in favor of progress, purity and economy, to abandon old uncongenial affiliations and come out squarely and bravely on the side of right, home and humanity, making common cause with the friends of equal and intelligent suffrage in the greatest reform ever proposed in this or any country under the banner of prohibition. Thus the reform forces can and ought to unite.

Why may not the reform elements of this nation come at once together? There is certainly no good reason why they should not. Let them first meet, under an appropriate call, in a grand national preliminary conference, say at Chicago during the great celebration. Let such a call be a most earnest and respectful invitation to all patriotic citizens, irrespective of partisan affiliations, who are intelligent enough to apprehend the dangers thickening on every hand; who are dissatisfied with the timidity, helplessness and subserviency of old parties respecting said dangers; who possess the moral courage to break loose from partisan tangles, and are willing to stand squarely upon a broad platform of principles looking to the complete overthrow of the saloon in every form; to the crowning of woman with the ballot; the making of intelligence essential to the elective franchise; to the ownership or absolute control of transportation lines in the interest of all; and to all other reforms vital to the progress, prosperity and perpetuity of the nation. Let such conference announce in a tone that shall ring in the ears of all people that ours is a Christian nation; that here all classes and creeds are equal before the law; that no public money shall ever be used for any sectarian purpose.

Such a call should meet with a resounding response throughout the country. From minister and pew—the responsible leaders of public thought and morality—the response should reach the mark of absolute unanimity. The aggregated, the unified influence of the churches in the great movement of reform would be so immense as to chronicle the event as an epoch in our national history, and, without doubt, the beginning of an era of unparalleled prosperity.

In all movements involving morality and the public well-being, Christian people surely ought to be the leaders, not the clog or stumbling-block. For everything permitted by law the people who vote for it are responsible. Is it not certain that the great majority of Christians have voted and still vote the same ballot as the saloon-keeper? Are not the churches then more responsible, because more intelligent, than the saloons for the woe, poverty, misery and crime, the inevitable fruitage of the liquor curse? How long will the saloon continue to rule? Just so long as Christian people continue to vote for and with the saloon.

All praise to those churches and Christian people who pray for Christ's kingdom to come, and do not vote for the saloon and the devil. All should so pray, none should so vote. Let there be made, therefore, a long, loud and earnest appeal to the churches. They cannot afford longer to be a stumbling-block. Nor can they afford to divide or diminish their membership by a backwardness that may force the organization of Prohibition churches all over the land. Nor can they afford to compel the masses to the conclusion that religion is a thing so feeble, so attenuated, so earthly, that it cannot be mixed with politics to purify without being itself contaminated.

Surely the churches of Christendom cannot much longer endure service in Satan's vineyard. Let reformers take courage. Let not the churches delay till bitter necessity compels the spirit of reformation to shake off the dust from its feet against them. Therefore let us make an appeal, reminding them of the vast army of drunkards for whom, more than other classes, because of their profession, their intelligence, their influence, the churches are responsible. It is impossible of belief to see how the people of this country, which is essentially a Christian nation, can by their votes uphold the monstrous liquor wrong.

If the proposed plan of a grand national conference meets with approval, let an invitation, breathing the deepest earnestness and the most affectionate solicitude, go forth to the churches. And not to them only, but to all citizens who are dissatisfied with present conditions, who are alive to the dangers thickening upon the country and who are willing to enter with unflinching courage upon a plan of reformation as wide as the continent and fully abreast with the times.

MISS PASH IN INDIA.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—

A meeting for women will be held at the Native Girls' High School, Kibè's Wada, on Thursday, Dec. 1, where Miss E. Pash, B. A., of Girton, will deliver a lecture on the Higher Education of Women and Temperance.

So ran the advertisement in one of the local newspapers on Wednesday, the 30th of November, and having heard of Miss Pash's able and interesting address to the native gentlemen, we resolved to make time for the women's meeting. We have advanced sufficiently, you see, in Poona, to have a gathering of this sort—and a great advance it is!

Twenty or thirty years ago a women's meeting was an unheard-of proceeding here, and Mrs. Grundy's Indian sister would have had food for talk for weeks if a native lady had proposed attending one.

Education, however, has broken down prejudice sufficiently to secure Miss Pash an audience of two hundred ladies, representing the leading native families of Poona. The delicate tact which prompted the wise lecturer to dress as an Indian lady when addressing her Indian sisters went a long way towards prejudicing her audience in her favor. Miss Pash has been sent by the British branch of the World's W. C. T. U. to appear before the Indian National Congress, which meets late in December, and to advocate the higher education of native women.

It was a scene as striking as unique, in the old palace in Bhudwar Peit where the Native Girls' school is now located! There stood the cultured English lady, clad in the soft clinging draperies of the East; on the stone steps that led down to the open courtyard, round the fountain built in eastern fashion in the centre of the square, sat the elder pupils of the school—all of them wives, and some also widows. Their large, lustrous eyes never moved from the speaker's face; as she told of her mother's death and the want she felt of a mother's love, the dark eyes grew moist with sympathy—for there is no love so strong in the heart of the native of India as that which exists between mother and child.

But the school girls in the quadrangle, who have already entered on the duties of wifehood, were not the only listeners to Miss Pash's lecture, for in the verandas on two sides of the square sat the native ladies, who had been induced to attend the meeting. All bent forward eagerly to catch the clear tones of the speaker, while the numerous doves that seem to have found lodging in the carved eaves of the old palace cooed a soft accompaniment to the address. In language so simple that the most ignorant there could understand, Miss Pash told the timid Indian girls how the thought of coming across the seas to India had appalled her till she remembered how He who held the sea in the hollow of His hand could guard and shield her from all danger; especially when He was sending her Himself (just as He sent a ray of sunlight down to the dark earth) to brighten and cheer His Indian children and help them to a better, happier life.

The Pundita Ramabai then gave the ladies a résumé in brief of Miss Pash's lecture to the men on the previous day, and her easy eloquence and delicate sense of humor won for her as usual the applause that her audience (men or women) always accords her. Talking of the temperance union to which Miss Pash belongs, Ramabai said she felt strongly how much the women of India needed to join such a body of workers, for though they might shut their eyes to the state of things in India now, the fact remained that intemperance, with its attendant evils, was spreading in the country. She remembered the time when an old Brahmin priest years ago committed the unheard-of crime of getting intoxicated, and he had to undergo a dreadful penance before he could be received into the Brahmin community again. Nowadays a man has only to pay four annas and he is considered to have atoned sufficiently for his fault. Ramabai then told of the scheme, which Miss Pash had come out to further, for the higher education of women in India.

"Have you," said Ramabai, in the language of parable so clear to the Oriental, "have you not seen those little black ants that abound in Poona just before the rain comes, and have you noticed how they are made to slave and cater for the white ants, doing all their work for them? Then perhaps you have observed how in the monsoons these slaving ants get wings, and away they fly to a higher sphere of action. Well, it has often struck me that our women in India bear a strong resemblance to those slaving ants! They are content to slave on, day after day, thinking of nothing higher or nobler than supplying the bodily wants of their husbands and children. But, my sisters, here are wings for you, wings on which you may soar aloft to higher things than cooking and cleaning, which, though very useful and necessary in themselves, ought not to fill up our lives to the exclusion of all else. Now here is a way opening in which our girls can have greater opportunities than heretofore of being educated, and, taking wings, as it were. Let us do all we can possibly think of to promote this scheme."

The native ladies pressed eagerly round Miss Pash to be introduced, and after the pretty custom of the east decorated her with a garland of white flowers (a species of jesamine) and sprinkled her handkerchief with rose-water, after which from a silver bottle with a long neck, they put ottar of roses on her hand and gave her a tiny nosegay of roses and jesamine.

As we drove home through the crowded native city with its noise and din, and as I thought of the many Indian women who live and die in the ignorance in which their ancestors died, I could not help longing that the brave, noble workers out here were multiplied a million times for India's millions.

MRS. JULIET B. RILEY, "AWAY."

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Mrs. Juliet B. Riley, of Troy, Ohio, the revered mother of Ohio's state president, Mrs. Henrietta L. Monroe, fell asleep in Jesus on the morning of December 19, after an illness of only thirty minutes. She was conscious to the last, said farewell to the loved ones with her, closed her eyes and was in heaven. She was laid to rest on Wednesday morning, December 21, at ten o'clock.

Juliet B. Riley, daughter of Richard H. Neale and Hannah W. Neale (neé Winn), was born in Loudon county, Va., October 19, 1805. She was a descendant of one of the most distinguished families of the state, the same which produced the famous "Stonewall" Jackson. Soon after her parents moved to Parkersburg, Va., from there coming to Troy, Ohio, in 1824. She was married to Z. Riley in 1826, in 1829 moving into the house built by her husband, which she had occupied continuously, up to the time of her death, for sixty-three years.

She united with the Presbyterian church of Troy in 1834, having been a member thereof fifty-eight years. She was the oldest member and the oldest person in the church, having outlived all those who were members at the time of her connection therewith. Her life has been one of great usefulness at home, in the church and the social organizations thereof, and in other ways that were sought out or came to her.

She was one of the originators and directors of the Ladies' Library of Troy, an organization that for years was the only circulating library in the county. During the Civil War she entered heartily into every movement that added to the comfort and welfare of the soldiers, being president of the Soldiers' Aid Society for four years, giving up the duties only when called to the bedside of a loving husband in his last long sickness.

She was the first depositary of the Troy Female Bible Society, and in the family there yet remains the bookcase used for keeping the Bibles. By a unanimous vote of the Bible society she became a life member of the American branch.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

He (Abraham) staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief; but was strong in faith, giving glory to God; and being fully persuaded that what he had promised, he was able also to perform. —Romans 4:20, 21.

In order to have our financial agent, Rev. Watson Tranter, fully equipped for his great undertaking of raising the entire indebtedness on the Temple, and also for the purpose of silencing the foolish slanders that have been circulated in regard to its financial standing by those who should have been its strongest supporters, in November last all papers and contracts in regard to the entire plan of the Temple, since its first inception, were placed in the hands of one of the largest corporation firm of lawyers in Chicago to thoroughly inspect, and at a joint meeting of the Temple trustees and advisory board, at which a few of the leading business men and clergy of the city were present, a full statement of the status of the enterprise was given without fear or favor, with the request that a thorough and entire sifting of the entire plan be made by the business men present. They were also asked to make a statement in writing for the benefit of the public, over their own signature, as to the condition in which they found the affairs of the corporation. The meeting took place November 12, and the following statement in writing signed by them was sent to the trustees:

CHICAGO, ILL., NOV. 14, 1892.

TO THE BOARD OF TEMPLE TRUSTEES:

We have, in compliance with your request, and for the express purpose of reassuring the friends of temperance throughout the world, made a personal examination into the financial affairs of the Woman's Temperance Building Association, and the Temple Building at Chicago, Illinois.

Our primary object has been to determine whether the interests of the members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and the friends of temperance have been conserved, and, whether it can be expected that by judicious financiering, the great Temple building at Chicago will ultimately be owned by the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

In our judgment the action of Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, and the others, members of the Temperance Building Association and the Board of Temple Trustees, in the management of this entire enterprise, has been eminently wise and prudent. A continuance of such management, with the hearty co-operation of the friends of the enterprise and of temperance, ought, in due time, to secure the absolute ownership of the property to the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Respectfully submitted,

GEO. M. PULLMAN,	PHILIP D. ARMOUR,
J. S. RUNNELL,	THOMAS B. BRYAN,
H. C. SPEER,	HERRICK JOHNSON,
JOHN HENRY BARROWS,	HENRY A. DELANO,
O. P. GIFFORD,	WATSON TRANTER,
H. S. HARRISON,	WM. C. GRAY,
LEWIS CURTS,	GRAHAM TAYLOR.

The following persons not being able to be present at the meeting, indorsed the enterprise in these words:

From representation of facts made to me by persons in whom I have confidence, I have no doubt that with continued good management, as hitherto, the Temple will ultimately be owned by the W. C. T. U.

T. W. PALMER,
ARTHUR EDWARDS,
EDWARD GOODMAN.

We trust the above authenticated statement (the original document being in the hands of Mr. Tranter) will so assure Christian business men of the admirable management of the entire undertaking that they will only be too glad to give towards an enterprise that promises so much for humanity. We also most sincerely hope it will forever silence the fearful ones in our own ranks, and stop the silly and injurious report that "the W. C. T. U. will never own the Temple." The signature of such men as George M. Pullman, the founder and owner of the town of Pullman and sleeping-car works, and Philip D. Armour, the great western capitalist and packer, to the above document is priceless, as they are both known the world over, not only as the greatest living business men in their lines, but men of the strictest integrity and sagacity. They would not, if they were paid millions for it, sign a document unless they entirely believed the facts as stated, and the same is true of all the others who have signed the paper. The name of Thomas B. Bryan, vice-president of the World's Columbian Exposition, is a synonym this country over for all that is honorable. H. C. Speer is one of the cleverest, far-seeing bankers of Chicago; J. S. Runnell is one of Chicago's great lawyers; Rev. J. H. Barrows, D. D., Rev. Herrick Johnson, D. D. (Presbyterians); Rev. Henry A. Delano, D. D., Rev. O. P. Gifford (Baptists); Rev. Lewis Curts, D. D., Rev. Watson Tranter (Methodists); Prof. Graham Taylor, D. D. (Congregationalist). These men are all leaders in their own denominations and have a national reputation. The Congregational paper of the West, the Advance, is represented in the above document by H. S. Harrison; the Interior (Presbyterian), by the veteran Dr. Wm. A. Gray; the Northwestern Christian Advocate (Methodist), by Dr. Arthur Edwards; the Standard (Baptist), by Dr. Edward Goodman. In the simple signature, T. W. Palmer, all may not recognize the Hon. Thomas W. Palmer, president of the World's Columbian Exposition, one of the truest and most chivalric friend the women of America possess.

Mr. Tranter has sent out postal cards to five hundred of the leading clergy of this country to get an expression from them in regard to the Temple. The questions he has asked each are as follows:

How do you regard this coming event of the dedication of the Temple by our Christian women? Will you endeavor to arrange a gospel temperance service or services during February, March or April in honor of this event?

The answers received are wonderfully encouraging, showing the wide interest the great enterprise has secured in the hearts of the Christian public. We will give from time to time a few of the responses received.

Address Mr. H. C. Speer, 237 La Salle St., Chicago, in regard to Temple Trust bonds.

WHATEVER COMES.

BY SARAH K. BOLTON.

Life is a struggle for the most,—
Bare rooms and common fare,
And helpless friends,—a weary host,—
And toil, and stifling air.
But Lincoln came from such as these,
The country's life to save;
And manhood is not nursed in ease,—
Whatever comes, be brave.

Some will speak ill, some envy you,
Some criticise, or blame;
Some whom you trusted prove untrue,
Friends only in the name;
Some will ignore you if your dress
Be poor, some scorn your sphere;
But keep a heart that loves to bless,—
Whatever comes, have cheer.

You will be tempted in the race;
Debt is an easy snare;
And pride has oft a Janus face,
And vice a winsome air;
And love of wealth and power may lead
To dally with the wrong;
But to your better self give heed,—
Whatever comes, be strong.

"FRAGMENTS": AT WHOSE DOORWAY?

BY MRS. L. S. SISSON.

The last echo from the last little hurrying footstep, eager for school, had just died upon our doorway. I had paused a moment to know what first to undertake; there was the disordered room awaiting the tidying touch; on the floor sat baby Willie pleading with eyes and hands to be taken up; in the kitchen, a few steps away, stood helpless, stolid yet willing Katrina, who had come over in "der leste schiffen" from the fields of Germany, and whom I was trying to induct into the mysteries of the American kitchen. Taking Willie in my arms I proceeded to show her the preliminary steps to a very simple dinner, then turned to the tidying. Just then came a low, timid knock at the door. At my opening, a woman, tall, gaunt and haggard entered; about her hung a loose calico wrapper, which in its palmy days had evidently graced the form of one several inches shorter and as many broader. Somehow in life's battle she had lost one eye, while hard drawn lines upon the face told pathetically without words the severity of that conflict.

I was soon listening to the old story of a worthless husband, whose earnings were squandered in drink, and of an empty cupboard. "Would I give her work?"

As an outcome the next morning found her in our washhouse contemplating an overflowing basket of soiled clothes. She began work and I a series of journeys from sitting-room to wash-house; that night two saddened women, Katrina and I, mournfully surveyed a sloppy floor and "a washing" inexpressibly "stampeded"; grimly we took down from the line the few flapping pieces she had managed to get out and prepared to do all over the next day.

Poor employer! poorer employé! She had known absolutely nothing of the work she had undertaken. As in the dusk I saw her depart to her cheerless home, grasping her day's wages and a basket of food, tired, I knew, with wet feet and an aching back, I said to myself, "Poor woman! she is at our own door—a 'fragment' of the miserable submerged tenth."

. . . . . .

Last week, having occasion to be out on a little church work, I stepped into the cozy home of Mrs. Pettus, whom I found vigorously plying her needle upon a pair of boy's pants. Holding them up for inspection she said: "You know Mrs. Howard has two grown sons; her closet is full of partly worn men's clothing. She offered me all I wanted for charity; these I have washed, ripped and pressed and am remaking for the Billings family."

"But consider the work," I said; "you are not strong, you do your own housework. Certainly you should not undertake this. Why does not the mother do it herself?"

"Oh," replied my busy friend, "she does not know how; she cannot sew a seam properly, or do the simplest kind of mending."

Alas! it was true. She had been married very young; was ignorant of books, and absolutely untrained and unskilled in household economy—a stranger to that subtle something a thrifty housewife calls "managing," by which the possessor can turn and make over from seeming nothing, and still have her family comfortably clad.

Following in the wake of this woman's inefficiency was a drunken husband; a few weeks before he had suddenly died, leaving her with a large family, from a babe to lads half grown. These last, three in number, half clad, hungry and gaunt, roamed the streets, hovered about the railroads and coalshaft gathering little baskets of coal, their only fuel; growing up a pest and menace to society, (voters though).

The mother knew nothing of wholesome cookery, had not dreamed of a possible duty in the care of health or of morals. Like my washerwoman, she knew nothing of the work she had undertaken, but hopelessly submerged in the depths of her own ignorance she and her unhappy brood eked out a miserable existence. . . . .

. . . . As I sat this afternoon before a piled-up basket of mending these two instances of misery chased each other through my mind. As I thought I drew the needle rapidly in and out, for the day had been so full of interruptions and baby was now asleep. Jing-a-ling went the door-bell, and I rose with a half sigh, which became a whole one of relief, as I ushered in my good, cheery friend, Mrs. Dunlap, a neat, trim, little body, whose whole presence expressed capability.

"Dear me," said she, as she followed me to the sitting-room, and her quick eye taking in my vacated post at the work-basket, "you are always busy. How I envy you. Since our children are grown and gone the housework takes so little time. I read till I am tired, then (this with a smile) run around among my neighbors in self-defense. I really get hungry for heart employment."

So saying, dear soul, she took up a needle, and as we two worked the basket unloaded itself, and a restful peace stole into my spirit. The call ended with gratitude. I put away little garments neatly mended (we parsonage folks do have much to be thankful for), and being alone, again those unhappy "fragments" troubled me. What can be done? Shall they go on till the grave hides their misery and others quite as unhappy take their places? There is a ray of hope in the numberless agencies that are at work training classes in which cookery, simple rules for care of health and cleanliness (itself a mighty uplift) are taught. But these are in the city, while the great country (itself not always a paradise) and the smaller towns are uncared for, save as our mothers' meetings carry the gospel of work well done into homes darkened by ignorance.

Just here to my mental vision arises the trim form of my helpful caller. Ah! is not here a possible solution of the vexed question, the old solution by individual work! Let Mrs. Dunlap (and she represents a large class) as she hungers for "heart" employment, hunt up a class of girls (perhaps one—ten) who are growing up into untrained womanhood, and through the week give them one or more of her leisure afternoons, teaching plain sewing, plain mending, under her watchful eye have them rip up partly worn garments, cleanse and utilize for younger children. Could a mothers' meeting take more practical form than by its individual members teaching or training some helpless young mother who suddenly finds herself confronted with undreamed-of duties?

But perhaps this is work better done as from individual prompting, for the poor in country town and hamlet shrink from publicity and organized charity—and this is the divine spirit of true independence and native self-respect. So let the individual, wherever she is, who is bent on serving God and helping humanity, gather about her one or more, win their confidence and teach them how to do well the common duties of life.

I heard an old soldier tell the story, vouching for its truthfulness, that once during the war, when the two armies were in unusually close quarters in a battle, a Union soldier—a great, red, strapping fellow—became excited, and breaking through the lines, seized a man in gray, and dragged him by sheer force, before he could recover from his surprise, within the Union lines. Being chaffed by his comrades he replied, "You can poke fun if you want to, but I got my man; had each of you done the same the enemy would have been ours."

Some such warfare as this must be before the great army of the untrained "submerged" take their places in the ranks of the efficient and the helpful.

Winchester, Ill.

As we go through the years we get consecutive views of God. His glory shining into the soul comes to us in various aspects, and we ought to feel every year that we have a new and a broader and brighter view of God. No man should be able to pray the same prayer twice. No preacher should be able to preach the same sermon twice. Each year we should take a new angle of view and see new glory. In that mysterious hour which we call the hour of conversion, the glory of God shines into the soul and there we see the Saviour. The Christian forgets the thought of salvation and sees God as a great developer, slowly unfolding his wondrous plans through all the nations.—Rev. Robt. McIntyre.

WORDS TO THE WISE.

Aunt Phosie Entertains Herself.

BY ABBY MORTON DIAZ.

Being a lone body, just a kind of nobody, I have to entertain myself all by myself in some way; that is, after my day's work is over and I am at home with only Toby for company—though it is surprising how much company anybody can make of a cat as knowing and loving as Toby is! Don't tell me a cat has no mind.

Mind! That is one subject I entertain myself with. What is mind? Who can tell me? Is it the something that thinks? or is the thinking the mind? Sometimes I stop the thinking, shut it off all together, to see if there is any mind left, and there seems to be nothing in the world left but nothingness, just blank space.

"My mind to me a kingdom is." That is a saying I have heard somewhere; I suppose the kingdom means what we have to think about, and how wonderful it is we can all possess such a great kingdom; even anybody like me who never had very much schooling nor many opportunities. A mind kingdom has the advantage of being a kind of movable real estate. No matter where we go we are never off our own grounds, and it seems to be pretty much a kingdom of our own getting together.

Now I am generally working around through the day, sewing and mending among all kinds of people, and sometimes at nightfall, after I have come home and opened the stove dampers and lighted my kerosene lamp and settled down at my little round table and read the interesting parts of the morning paper Mrs. Fuller sends me in every day—there's a woman that in all ways does her best to make a heaven about her—then I just tip back a little in my rocking chair with my feet upon the stove hearth. Toby curled up in my lap, and think over what I have been reading in the paper, and maybe some of the cute things in Marcus Antoninus—that is one of the books Mrs. Fuller made me a present of—and dwell especially on what has entered my mind-kingdom during the day from the sayings and doings in families and in neighborhoods.

One thing that puzzles me is that so many people have objections against sky. I notice that in almost every house there is a regular curtain line where the curtain must stop in going up. Now take Miss Prissy and Miss Jane, where I often work, both of 'em nigh about as old as I am. Miss Prissy, she likes the curtains way up and Miss Jane likes them down to the regulation line. Miss Prissy comes in and up they go, and by and by Miss Jane comes in and says, "Goodness gracious, Priscilla! do you want to let in all outdoors?" And Miss Prissy says that is just about what she does want and she would like to have the window glass reach all the way across, so that when she pleases she can pull up shades and seem to be sitting outdoors and be able to see the sky.

Miss Prissy is the only person I know of except myself that takes in the sky as a part of what she has to enjoy. She says if she can see the sky arched all about her overhead, it makes her feel larger and grander and take in deeper breaths; says when she stands at a window where the curtain edge cuts right across her sky vision it is like having the top part of a picture covered over. Miss Jane says it is not at all genteel to have curtains hoisted up high; says it looks strange to people passing the house; so Miss Prissy calls the regulation line the line of gentility, and the way-up-top one the line of glory. She says it is easy enough to pull a curtain down when you'd rather not have folks looking in, or if the sun shines in too bright, but do let us have sky when we want to, especially when it makes a glorious picture, and I am in her way of thinking.

My easterly and northerly windows give me grander pictures than rich people pay thousands of dollars for. The other evening a man lectured in our vestry about the good of having pictures in the school-houses and everywhere where children can see them, so as to make them love what is beautiful. Miss Prissy says it is all right to lay out money for this, but says, why not make children take notice of the beautiful that is to be had free? Let 'em be made to look overhead and all around, she says, and to notice the deep blue of the sky and the piled-up glory toward night and the different shadings of the herbage and grasses, and the shapes of trees in winter time, and pay attention to all the prettiness that grows wild in summer and the pretty things about insects and birds and animals, and she did mention about seeing something pretty even in snakes and caterpillars.

But dear me! how many things there are to think about! Miss Prissy says her brother's children being used to seeing no higher up than the curtain line, have such a habit of looking low that they scarcely know what the sky is like.

A BUILDER'S LESSON.

"How shall I a habit break?"
As you did that habit make.
As you gathered you must lose,
As you yielded now refuse.
Thread by thread the strands we twist
Til they bind us neck and wrist;
Thread by thread the patient hand
Must untwine ere free we stand.
As we builded, stone by stone,
We must toil, unhelped, alone,
Till the wall is overthrown.

But remember, as we try,
Lighter every test goes by;
Wading in the stream grows deep
Toward the center's downward sweep;
Backward turn, each step ashore
Shallower is than that before.
Ah, the precious years we waste
Leveling what we raised in haste;
Doing what must be undone
Ere content or love be won!
First across the gulf we cast
Kite borne threads, till lines are fast,
And habit builds the bridge at last.

A SCRIPTURE TEMPERANCE LESSON.

Isaiah 5.

BY MRS. S. W. CARTLAND.

[For a public meeting of the Band of Hope or L. T. L.]

Leader.—There was a time, boys and girls, when some men and women in our land wore chains. Four millions of black men and women were called slaves. They were bought and sold like horses and cows. This was done not only in the South, but in some parts of the North as well. Now the handcuffs and chains are broken in all our land. Nearly thirty years ago the black people were all set free when Abraham Lincoln, who was then President, wrote the Emancipation Proclamation, which meant that there should be no more slaves in this country. There is now not one black slave in the United States. The chains and handcuffs are all gone, nobody knows where. The slaves have become free men and women, and in many towns they are being educated the same as white people. Now, children, are there really any more slaves?

Children.—Yes, there are more than four millions of them.

L.—To what are they slaves, and who are they?

C.—To intemperance, and they are both white and black.

L.—Do these slaves work early and late? What does our Bible lesson say about it?

C.—"They rise up early in the morning that they may follow strong drink: they continue until night."

L.—Did some of the slaves in the long ago have kind masters?

C.—Yes, and some of them had plenty to eat and drink.

L.—Does our lesson say that is the case with the slaves of intemperance?

C.—"They are famished, and their multitude are parched with thirst."

L.—What further does it say about the rich slaves as well as the poor slaves?

C.—"The mean man is bowed down, and the great man is humbled."

L.—What is the end of them all?

C.—"Hell hath enlarged herself and opened her mouth without measure, and they shall descend into it."

L.—How are the links formed in the chain which binds these slaves?

C.—By moderate drinking and by treating.

L.—What is moderate drinking?

C.—Tasting a little cider or a little beer, without intending to drink much or to become drunkards.

L.—What is treating?

C.—It is when one man pays for the drinks of his companions and they all "drink to his health," they say.

L.—To his health! What would be more proper to say?

C.—Drink his death, for liquor is a poison that kills body and soul.

L.—What does our chapter say about those who call things by wrong names?

C.—"Woe unto them that call evil good and good evil; that put darkness for light and light for darkness."

L.—What does moderate drinking lead to?

C.—It leads to drunkenness.

L.—What does our lesson say about drunkenness?

C.—"Woe unto them who are mighty to drink wine, and men of strength to mingle strong drink."

L.—What does license mean?

C.—Allowing men to make liquor and sell it if they will pay money to the United States government for the privilege.

L.—What does our chapter teach us about this?

C.—"Woe unto them who justify the wicked for a reward."

L.—What are all true friends of temperance trying to do?

C.—They are trying to break the chain of license.

L.—Do you think that any one bound with this mighty chain can be set free?

C.—"The Lion of Judah can break every chain."

L.—Who is the "Lion of Judah"?

C.—The Son of God.

L.—Repeat His proclamation of emancipation.

C.—"The Son can make you free; YE SHALL BE FREE INDEED."

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

REVOLVING SIEVE.

Morning, chicks. Come in the house, here, a minute, before we go to the shop; I want to finish this fire. And I might as well tell you something about managing a coal fire. I learned it from Aunt Mary. She got one ahead on that. Most people shake and shake and shake and the ashes and clinkers accumulate below and the fire grows shallow above; and every few days there must be a revolution with dust and work and a new fire. Why, when I first met Aunt Mary she was running a stove in which the fire had not been out for several months. If she had possessed no other attractions, this alone would have—do it? Easy enough. When the fire has been undisturbed for some time the burning coal forms an arch over the ashes, so that you might shake all day and no fire would fall. This is almost always the case in the morning. Now, just tip the grate down and with the poker get the clinkers out. Often you can clear the entire grate and then have to punch the fire from above to make it fall. What's that, Jimmy? Your mother does that way? And Helen's? That's good. Then there are two smart people in the world besides Aunt Mary. Yes, if the coal is too fine it will not work so well.

Now for the shop. Lots of dry lectures for you yet, on tools and how to sharpen and use them; but perhaps we'd better go on with coal-fires, as the weather is so suggestive. You will often want to sift the ashes, when the fire goes out, or if you have a kitchen girl like ours. The back-and-forth sieves make a big dust and noise, besides wrenching your back. Get a little box from a grocery, about 9x9x12, which you see will turn in the top of a barrel. Cut a hole in each of the four sides, 5x8, and tack pieces of wire over them, one-half inch mesh. Make a door of one side, or cover, rather. Hinges at the farther end, hooks at this end. Now bore a hole in the middle of each end, and put a broom-handle through, letting the small end project about six inches. We nail the box to it so the box will turn when it does. Put a six-inch crank on the large end, side opposite the cover so it will hang down when the cover is up. Cut notches in opposite sides of the barrel and lay the thing across. Total cost, exclusive of barrel, about ten cents (being for wire and staples; they will give you the box) and two hours' work, or more if you are not lively. Soft pine will answer, and is easy to work.

To operate the machine raise the cover, pour in the ashes, be surprised to find that the little box will hold a bucketful, fasten cover and throw an old bag over the top, letting it rest on the box. Your left hand holds the bag where it touches the barrel, and with the right you turn slowly. Easy? Indeed it is. One can almost feel dignified using this thing, but not with the common shaker.

If you want to make a nice one or make them for sale make a cover large enough for any barrel, cut a hole for the box to turn in and make a box cover to close over it, hinging it to the barrel cover. Stain with aniline in water, if for sale.

Pokers, like some people's ideas, are generally built after a pattern perhaps furnished by Noah, late of the ark. The end is bent some three or four inches, and flattened to go between grate-bars. But you don't want that, in these days of shaking grates. Heat it red, and hammer it out perfectly straight. Then heat the point, and bend one inch, flatwise, and you have a poker to be proud of, or glad of.

That noise? That's the old clock I've had out here for repairs, striking its velvet stroke on a silver bell in a golden twilight, as it were. Used to clang like rat-traps and vinegar. Covered the hammer with chamois skin and put leather washers between the bell and the iron to which it is fastened and between that iron and the wood of the clock-case, and then left the bell as loose as possible and keep its place. When the hammer strikes on wire you can stick a piece of chamois or cloth to the back of the case and let it stand where it will get hit, or cover the hammer. In this way you can soften a clock to any desired degree, so as to accommodate any style of nerves.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—The L. T. L. is legion as its name indicates, and it is a glorious thing to belong to this great temperance army. In the great fight for our principles which will grow fiercer as you grow up, you can know that God is on your side and right will surely win!

An L. T. L. leader writes that if there are any Legions which have spare copies of entertainment programs, temperance selections, or back numbers of The Young Crusader or Oak and Ivy Leaf to please send them to the new L. T. L. at Lakewood, Chautauqua county, New York, Box 134, who will receive them very gratefully.

Here is another L. T. L. budget, trimmed to fit our narrow space. Loyally,

Aunt Jane

OUR BILL OF FARE.

The first poem on our Contributed pages is by Mrs. Helen W. Gibson, the temperance and mission worker of France. Miss Balgarnie gives a glowing account of our National leader's tour in England and the notable temperance demonstration at Exeter Hall, London. The valuable series of articles upon Scientific Nutrition in Cookery, by Mrs. Sara C. Bull, is commenced on page four, and Mr. John Bidwell sounds the keynote upon the union of reform forces. The Household has choice contributions and selections, including our ever-welcome "Words to the Wise." Correspondence, commencing on the fifth page is concluded on the fifteenth page by Dr. Kate Bushnell's interesting letter, telling of the work of Mrs. Andrew and herself in New South Wales. Our children have mental food of the best quality. The News from the Field is led off by Mrs. K. L. Stevenson's ringing account of Massachusetts' no-license campaign, followed by crisp reports from Ohio, New Hampshire, Kansas and Rhode Island.

FROM VARYING STANDPOINTS.

There is a story told of a man, who, at the time of the separation of the Reformed Episcopal Church from the larger body of the Protestant Episcopal, visited, on the same Sabbath, three churches of the latter denomination in the city of New York. In the morning he went to a very "High" church, where the rector spoke with the utmost severity of denunciation upon the new movement; predicting that it must speedily come to naught. At the close, as expressive of his conception of the attitude of the church towards "all Schismatics" he gave out the hymn whose first line is, "The church's one foundation is Jesus Christ, the Lord."

In the afternoon the gentleman attended a more liberal church where the movement was alluded to somewhat commiseratingly, it is true, still the pastor assured his people that they need have no fear; nothing of this kind could in any way affect for her injury, the true church, and he, too, gave out as especially appropriate to the occasion, "The church's one foundation is Jesus Christ, the Lord."

In the evening our friend wended his way to a "Broad" church, where also the event found mention, but this time as a something which should occasion rejoicing rather than sorrow; since all such divisions could only mean a widening of the true scope of the church, an increase rather than a diminution of her powers. And here, too, was given out and sung as especially appropriate to this view of the case, "The church's one foundation is Jesus Christ, the Lord." All of which goes to prove that the numberless views of the same things which we find in the world about us, come, not because the things themselves change, but because we view them from varying angles of vision.

This thought came to us with special force a little time ago, as seated in a railway train we heard two ladies just in front discussing the whist parties and the dancing parties with which their lives, past, present and future, seemed to be filled. Just as we were thinking pitifully of the waste of vital and spiritual forces involved in such a life, one of them suddenly exclaimed: "Oh, I never take a nap in the day-time; I think it is such a waste of time." Which remark left us reflecting that standards of use and waste might differ.

It was at a National Convention of the W. C. T. U. A certain prominent speaker happened to be mentioned, when another white-ribboner exclaimed: "Oh, I shan't go to hear her speak to-morrow; she showed temper in the discussion to-day." And then followed a detailed account, to a constantly increasing group, of an event which, if it occurred at all in the way it was told, was certainly observed by very few. It was also at a convention: A woman who had done more real work for a certain great enterprise than all the sisterhood save herself combined, had made what was conceived to be an error of judgment, and action was to be taken in the matter. "There must be no uncertain sound upon this question," was again and again repeated, in many varying inflections according to the temper of the speaker; and at times it almost seemed as if the sweet graces of love and forbearance were of far less vital moment than that an annual convention should "give no uncertain sound" upon a matter of expediency, an error of judgment.

A poor girl, in the greatest anguish which can possibly come to a human life, with a wifeless motherhood stretching out its Golgotha path before her, was turned away from the Christian (?) home where she had been serving as faithful domestic, although it was well known that she had not a friend in the country, or even an acquaintance, to whom she could look for aid. Afterward the gentleman who had sent her, with the pangs of motherhood even then upon her, to the hospital, said to the white-ribboner who had found her shelter and given her help: "I know there is a sense in which such girls are to be pitied; still I claim that there can never be any extenuating circumstances in the case of a man's getting drunk, or a woman's losing her virtue; and I think they should be left to suffer the full penalty of their sin." There could be but one answer to such a proposition, and that came in the form of a suggestion that it was well for the world the Lord had not been of that opinion. "Well, yes, that is true in a sense; still the cases are not parallel." And as the standpoints were so manifestly at variance, the white-ribboner never asked where the parallel lines diverged, but went her sorrowful way, reflecting on the varying standards of life.

We might multiply instances almost without number as illustrative of this thought. Who of us has not discovered again and again, sometimes with a comic, sometimes with a tragic realization, how absolutely our standard of right and wrong may be at variance with the standard of another; how entirely our ideals of "whatsoever things are true" may differ from the ideals of those with whom we come in contact; how our best and our worst are constantly misjudged; the one lowered far beneath its right, and the other often correspondingly exalted? Who has not wished that in the higher realm of thought and life, words might ring counter to but one thought, and not stand for as many varying shades of reasoning as the lips which utter them?

Is there no absolute standard of right and wrong; no greater virtues which must manifestly take precedence of all lesser ones; nothing which can appeal to the universal human heart and commend itself as the absolutely true and important?

Can words never mean one thing and one thing only? Must we continue to talk of use in what seems to others the most pitiable waste? Must we construe as righteous indignation what seems to another the saddest lack of Christian charity and forbearance? Must the Pharisee continually think that he is verily doing God's service as he draws his skirts away from the sinning woman for whom the Saviour of sinners showed only the tenderest love? It is appalling sometimes to see what varying ideals of morality find cover under a Christian profession, and oftentimes under a fervor of Christian experience. A prominent member in one of the "orthodoxest" (see "Fishin' Jimmy") of churches said not long ago that he considered it perfectly right and legitimate for him to take advantage of a man in a bargain and charge him more for a thing than it was worth. Indeed, he seemed to consider that in this way he was proving himself a special benefactor, since the sooner the man's "eye teeth were cut" the more chance there would be for him to make a successful business man. That man has not the slightest idea that he is a hypocrite. The question is, "Is he?" Can it be that souls are born with a mental obliquity which makes it impossible for them to see all things in right relations? Can a man who can see clearly to "read his title clear" still be unable to see when he is lacking in the commonest principles of honesty and integrity? Can a Christian woman see that it is wrong in another to show temper and not see that it is more wrong in herself to proclaim that fact and injure her sister in the eyes of others who would otherwise have been in entire ignorance of the matter? Can any number of women fail to see that it is of infinitely more importance that a convention of the W. C. T. U. should "give forth no uncertain sound" upon the great questions of love and gentleness and Christian forbearance than its voice should be clear upon mere matters of expediency? Can it be that any follower of Jesus Christ should ever for one moment believe that the sin of turning the poor and erring from his door would be less in the eyes of the Master than the sin for which she was so grievously suffering?

We confess, that in the jarring voices of life, each one of which claims to be making for truth and righteousness, we are sometimes sorely puzzled, and long for a voice clear and unmistakable to proclaim to all, "This is the way, walk ye in it." And has not that voice spoken? Did it not make itself articulate during thirty-three years of earth life, each moment of which was spent in revealing truth; in revealing God? Oh, if the followers of Jesus Christ could only go back to a study of Himself; Himself not in theology, but Himself in daily living as unfolded in the gospels, could we not soon reach a common standpoint of interpretation and expression? Should we not learn from that life that, whatever else a man may fail in, he must not fail in love and deeds of love towards his brother man? Oh, how some of our virtues would shrivel if we once brought them fully under the search light of truth as shown in His life; how our works would show for self-aggrandizement, our zeal against sin for lack of patience; our righteous indignation for petty anger and selfhood; how we would be convicted above everything else of that which in His eyes outweighs all else—lack of love!

Words will mean one thing, and one thing only, when we stand before His throne. Let it be the purpose of each white-ribboner's life to find that one eternal meaning now, and incorporate it in a life so lived after His, that through that life He only shall be revealed.

ILLUSTRIOUS DEAD.

The death angel has been busy with America's roll of honor, this first month of 1893. Army, bench and church are respectively in mourning for one of their representative members, while every loyal heart feels the prick of bereavement in the death of the man who filled the high office of Chief Executive with peculiar wisdom and grace during a term of unusual difficulty and peril.

The future historian of American civilization will write the name of Rutherford B. Hayes among the first and greatest of our peace Presidents. His accession to the office was at a most trying hour, when unrest ruled all classes and revolution was threatened. As we look back upon that period, remembering the charges and counter-charges of fraud, and intimidation made by both parties and the rumors of war in case either party seat its candidate, as one must do, the spring of 1877 appears scarcely less critical than the spring of 1861. In that time of excitement and clamor, Mr. Hayes' chief concern was that the settlement be just and honest: "There must be nothing crooked on our part." When apprised of a "deal" about to be made he protested against "defeating one outrage by another," declaring it better that his opponent should have the place than that he should gain it by any means that would not bear closest scrutiny.

He was true to his opposition to a second term even though his own possible successor—the best test of conviction upon that point—with the chances in his favor, his party having been greatly strengthened by his administration, as the majorities for Gen. Garfield proved. Personal ambition could not exist with the elements of integrity which marked such a man.

Every moral measure was augmented by the example of the White House during the Hayes régime. Wine, ostracised at court, fell into disuse at the receptions of the best society throughout the country. The charge of niggardliness made in certain quarters was met by the statement of the steward, a long time incumbent of the executive larder, that the cost of state dinners exceeded all precedent, and that hospitality had never before been so lavish.

In his self-sought retirement from public life, Mr. Hayes has not used the prestige of his presidency for private gains, but has bestowed it rather in charity. His name has long been identified with prison reform, and the International Congress of Charities, Correction and Philanthropy, to convene in this city next June, had counted upon him to preside over its deliberations.

But the tenderest and most universal tie binding the President-philanthropist to the people was his home life. His devotion to his wife, a woman so fit to be first lady of the land, was without flaw, and after his last visit to her grave he was heard to wish himself beside her, although he hastened to say, "I am not unhappy." His last words were, "I am going where Lucy is."

The position of ex-President is now practically vacant, the only other who could claim it having lost it in the higher one of president-elect. Mr. Cleveland's presence at the funeral was a beautiful instance of the triumph of personal friendship over party differences, in which all parties may rejoice.

The tribute of the Union League Club of this city, of which Mr. Hayes was an honorary member, said in words most fitting: "We cannot call his death untimely, for a life inspired like his, by daily devotion to daily duty, is a finished life whenever the end may come."

The crape upon the altars of Episcopacy is for one hardly less widely known and loved. The elder meeting his acquaintance, the vestryman, on a sad morning not long ago did not say: "I see your church has lost a Bishop;" but Methodist exclaimed to Baptist as they opened their papers, "Phillips Brooks is dead!" And the answer came quickly, "Oh, what a loss!" All Christendom is one communion to mourn Phillips Brooks dead, as it was to love him in life. The secret of his power and popularity has defied search and analysis. It was no trick of oratory. It was rather in spite of some defects of delivery. The story is told of him that, canvassing his capacity, as stock in trade when about to decide upon a vocation, he consulted the president of the university of which he was a student. That gentleman suggested that they begin by ruling out the impossible professions. "Now in your case," said he, "owing to the impediment in your speech you could never be a preacher, and we may as well at the outset lay aside all thought of the ministry."

But a heart like Brooks' forces utterance and compels the tongue to do its bidding. It might be said he had need of fewer words than most men, so much did he put into a few, as when he speaks of Christ, "the condescension of divinity and the exaltation of humanity." His greatness was not in argument, but in persuasion. With his quick knowledge of men, and his desire to redeem the time, he may have felt that the returns for argument are too slow.

Bishop Potter at the ordination of Bishop Brooks doubtless uncovered the source of might when he declared the best gift of the gifted candidate to be "that enkindling and transforming temper which forever sees in humanity, not that which is bad and hateful, but that which is loyal and improvable, which can both discern and effectually speak to that nobler longing of the soul which is the indestructible image of its maker. It is this —this enduring belief in the redeemable qualities of the vilest manhood—which is the most potent spell in the ministry of Christ."

THE STORY OF THE GREAT PETITION.

This petition has a story as wonderful as the "One Thousand and One Nights," if only it could be told in the languages of Bulgaria and Switzerland, Scandinavia and Italy, Germany, Russia, Holland, Great Britain, China, Japan, Hither and Farther India, Turkey, South Africa and the Congo, Australia and South America, Corea and Madagascar and the Sandwich Islands.

It is intended that the whole force of this world's union of women shall be turned upon international questions affecting social and temperance reforms. As one of the instruments to this end the Great Petition gives a practical direction to the new-world-sense that thrills the hearts of women in this last decade of our century. It calls for no money, it even demands no personal pledge from those who sign or indorse it, but only asks that the nations of the world may put away the unholy traffic in alcohol and opium with which every Christian nation is more or less in complicity. Surely no differences of opinion as to franchise or politics need forbid good women to put their names to this petition, or hinder good men from indorsing this request of their mothers, wives and sisters.

Is it objected that little or nothing will be accomplished by the presentation of such a petition? This we do not know. One who wields all power in heaven and earth once said: "Oh, woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt." A petition which already carries almost two million names and which it is hoped will have double that number before it is called in for exhibition at the World's Fair in 1893, preparatory to setting forth on its world-wide mission to the rulers of all nations, will be in itself a vast object lesson, crystallizing into one burning focus the hopes and prayers, the agony and tears of wives and mothers, sisters and daughters around the globe, and it might well be a spectacle on which angels should gaze with sympathy.

Is the need of governmental interference questioned? Not when a stream of cheap intoxicants flows steadily fromthe civilized nations to all parts of the heathen world, and the single city of Hamburg sends in a year brandy to West Africa to the proportion of sixty-five per cent of all its exports, more deadly and infinitely more soul-destroying than the cholera germs which we so much dread.

The Congo lands were bought with liquor, and in all the dark continent a bottle of rum is current coin. Samoa was seized because of the value of the German trade in liquor with that island. Let Great Britain and China and India and our own Pacific coast tell the successive chapters of the great opium story, and when it is rehearsed no one will ask, What is the need of such petition?

Why should American women lead this petition? Already our English sisters are rivaling us in their zeal, as their nation has rivaled us in the shame of these shameful traffics.

"Good work," says Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt, "is done in other countries, but in organized work it is English-speaking women who have accomplished great things. It is almost impossible to imagine a congress of women—like the last in Boston—in Paris, Berlin or Rome. The leading part in Christian missions and in moral reforms must be taken by the English-speaking nations. In the United Kingdom, the United States, Canada and Australia there are 125,000,000 people practically homogeneous. United what can they not do?"

It is earnestly requested that every woman having a heart for this work should communicate with Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, Ravenna, Ohio, thereby receiving blanks and instructions for obtaining signatures to the great World's Woman's Petition.

A CHANGE OF MANAGERS.

On page twelve of this issue will be found the official announcement of the change of business managers for the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association.

For more than two years, Mrs. F. H. Rastall, previously president of Kansas W. C. T. U., has occupied this important position. Her devotion to the many interests of our large and increasing business has been unswerving. Retiring to engage in private business, she will continue to reside in Chicago. She will be much missed in W. T. P. A. circles and our best wishes accompany her to her new position.

Mrs. Caroline F. Grow, the new manager, is a resident of Chicago and for six years has been the successful business manager of the Elite. She has demonstrated sterling business ability, as well as strong Christian character, and we confidently expect her to rapidly prove herself worthy of the confidence of our large constituency, as she has already that of the Board of Directors and every one who knows her.

Our Publishing Association never had wider opportunities of usefulness that it has to-day. Open doors abound and we mean to so strengthen our forces and enlarge our boundaries as to enter them all, one by one. The Columbian year offers us many new channels of endeavor and we are planning to be fully prepared for them.

A PRIZE thesis on Constitutional Law has just been published in France. It was offered by the University of Paris, and the subject appointed for last year's competition was the condition of women with respect to the exercise of public duties and political rights. The thesis studies carefully the political rights of women, refutes the accepted arguments against their recognition, and concludes that the age of the subjection of woman is rapidly passing away, and that in the new conditions we shall lose nothing and gain much. Those who dread the effect on women of a general acceptation of their rights and personality may feel comforted by the assurance of this writer, Dr. Louis Frank, that not even equality in political privilege will prevent women from devoting themselves to pleasing the other sex. He sets forth that women have full suffrage in Wyoming, in Nova Scotia,—of which we were not aware—in the Isle of Man, in Chili, in Equador, and in five provinces of Austria. They have municipal suffrage in Austria, Hungary, Croatia, Prussia and Brunswick,—which we did not know—in the majority of the Scandinavian countries, that is, in Sweden, Finland and Iceland, in Russia—which we certainly did not know —in England and Scotland, in all the English colonies from Cape Colony to New Zealand, from Australia to Canada, and in the state of Kansas. He evidently means a qualified municipal suffrage. In twenty-one of the states they have school suffrage. We must say the showing is better than we looked for.

SELF-DENIAL week this year is April 3–10. I am confident that we could make of self-denial week one of the greatest institutions of the W. C. T. U. But we do not yet work it up, and it is a divine law that where we have not sowed we shall not reap. The Salvation Army issues a special number of its magazine entitled, All the World, and with the utmost ingenuity sets forth the meaning, purposes and advantages of self-denial week. It strikes its key-note at five pounds, which is higher than I should feel that we could go as yet. I think one dollar is about what we ought to average. In a special issue of All the World a most interesting story is told of the work of a Salvation Army officer, then a statement is made or a question is asked, "Will you pay the expenses of an officer who will toil like the one of whom you have just read for a whole year? Will you deny yourself something to give him the opportunity of denying himself almost all things for the help of the world?" We might very appropriately paraphrase this by saying, "Will you give one dollar to put THE UNION SIGNAL for a single year in a new home, or to send out so many pages of temperance literature, or to pay for so many bricks in the Woman's Temple, or the Woman's Temperance Hospital? About ten dollars will cover the cost of forming a new W. C. T. U. Will you be one of ten to form this group of loving mother-hearts and hands, giving each one dollar?" It is plain to me that the self-denial fund has not yet reached its true status in the thoughts of our great host. Let me urge our treasurers from the largest nation to the smallest local auxiliary, to stir their respective constituencies as they have never yet been stirred on the subject, and see what can be done to quadruple the self-denial fund of 1893.

Frances E. Willard.

Miss Jessie Ackermann, president of Australia W. C. T. U., is spending six months in India and later will go to South Africa. She has formed one hundred and eighteen local unions in Australia, four colonial and one national union. Seven thousand women have joined at her meetings. It is no wonder that the Australian women have adopted our American sister.

A pleasant visit was made by our South African missionary, Miss Alice Palmer, to the author of "Dreams," Miss Olive Schreiner, whom she pronounces a lover of humanity and wonderfully interesting. In February, Miss Palmer, who is now in the Pearl, will go to Mrs. Gray at Pretoria. She expects to remain in Natal from May till after the July meeting, then to visit the free state on her way to the Transvaal and to return to Natal.

"Whisky is your greatest enemy," said a pastor to an intemperate man.

"Well, doesn't the Bible tell us to love our enemies?"

"Yes," said the pastor gravely, "but it doesn't tell us to swallow them."

Some speakers cannot get along successfully without applause. This is a pity and no one should allow himself or herself to remain in such a case. The best way is, like the famous Antony, to say to one's self, "I know no eloquence, I only speak right on," and not to wait for any expected applause. If it comes it is a very good spur oftentimes in the side of a jaded steed. I heard the other day of a teacher who stood up in the midst of the meeting after the brethren and sisters had declared that they did not wish vocal manifestations, especially during the sermon. This man was a local preacher and he was exhorting, but broke off in the midst of a flight of eloquence to interject this sentence, "I cannot go on; you have not given me an 'Amen' or an 'Hallelujah' since I started." Alas! he had bid high; no demonstrations were knocked down to him after this touching appeal.

Mrs. Isabella Webb Parkes, wife of Rev. Dr. Edward L. Parkes, professor in Gammon Theological Seminary, Atlanta, Georgia, is addressing the theological students on the W. C. T. U., its scope and movement. This is as it should be. No class of men needs information concerning the modern movement by which the Christianity of Christ and not of His commentators is enshrined in the customs of society and the laws of the land more than do our young theologues. They need to be kept free from sacerdotalism and in touch with the people. None can help to do this more than Christian women, and if such women were invited to speak on living themes before the students of our seminaries, it would "make for righteousness" beyond all telling.

"What is the best word, or what is the good word?" This is an old-fashioned expression sometimes used as an accompaniment of a friendly greeting. It seems to me excellent Saxon both in language and in spirit. I wish it were current coin as it was in earlier and perhaps simpler days. However this may be, whoever keeps it in his mind as a central idea in all his converse with those about him will do well and deserve well of his kind. Just now, especially in the temperance ranks, let us make it a matter of principle as well as of pleasure to ask for the best rather than the worst word concerning the outlook, the work and the workers.

Among the beautiful epitaphs of which the world is full, I note the following recently observed by me in my travels. Down off Cape Cod is Marshfield, the famous country home of Daniel Webster, and in a lonely little grave-yard near by, the great statesman who did not understand the signs of his times lies buried. Beside him is the grave of his wife with this exquisite inscription, "Let me go, the day is breaking." Near by is the grave of Adelaide Phillips, the once famous vocalist, with the words of her favorite recital, "Oh, rest in the Lord." The tomb of Abraham Lincoln, who declared in his speeches that above all things he wished history to write of him that he was faithful, bears simply his great name and those words that he had coveted as the inscription, "He was faithful." A dear sister named Mary, beloved and bemoaned by one of our best workers has this upon her headstone, "Jesus saith unto her, Mary." A nameless tomb bears but these words, "First at the Trysting place." Another this, "The world disdained her other name, Love writes but this; Leonora."

ON DUTY.

MASSACHUSETTS.

OUR ANNUAL STRUGGLE.

That struggle, as in all local option states, comes each year at the ballot box. Never before was it so fierce as this year, and never were the victories so decisive. It really looks now as if the old Bay State would find herself under a straight prohibitory law so far as the action of her individual towns and cities is concerned, almost before she knows it. It is estimated that already, taking the elections of last spring in conjunction with those just held, the majority in favor of no-license throughout the state is about twenty-four thousand. Our municipal elections are held at two distinct seasons; those of the cities occurring in December, those of the towns in the spring.

Massachusetts now boasts of thirty cities; two—Medford and Everett—having been added to the list during the past year. In each named place there is an active Woman's Christian Temperance Union, which did all in its power to bring about the grand result that the new born municipality should take its place in the ranks with a clean record, so far as its voice on the liquor traffic is concerned. In both cases the efforts were crowned with success; though Medford signalized its own majority by electing as her first mayor the largest distiller in that much distilled town. In Chelsea the union was most active, holding meetings two or three times each week in the different wards, distributing literature, aiding in the grand mass-meeting, and contributing one hundred dollars to the campaign fund. Chelsea was "dry" last year also, but its majority was largely increased this year.

The unions of Cambridge, always most active, were by no means behind their usual record in the campaign of this year. They sent an appeal to the voters, distributed literature largely, held a mass-meeting in conjunction with the churches of the city and came in for their full share of praise when victory, for the sixth time in succession, came to them. It was an inspiring sound, so says an ear-witness, when the bells were rung at midnight, telling to all that right had once more prevailed and the schemes of the adversary been overthrown. Brockton union has always had the credit of keeping the no-license sentiment alive in that place, and it is not strange that this is so, when a letter has come from its president saying, "We paid for everything that was done here." Small wonder that she adds, "When shall we see the day that ends our woes?"

The no-license sentiment in some of our cities, as Somerville, Malden and Newton, has been so long established that it almost seems as if they could never go back to the old régime of the legal grogshop; and yet our sisters do not therefore relax their efforts. Mrs. Talbot, of Malden, presided over the largest and most effective rally ever held in that town, and the No vote was larger than ever before. Perhaps the most surprised women of our state were those of the Fall River union, for that Fall River would ever go no-license no one dared to hope. The elation which came after the election is even yet mingled very largely with fear, since it is claimed that the result was brought about by the machinations of the liquor men themselves. However this may be, the Fall River union is resolved to take the initiative, if necessary, in an effort to see that the law is properly enforced when once it shall go into effect on the first of next May.

Taunton also is rejoicing in an unexpected victory, and feels that it has had a large share in bringing it about, because of its consenting to do some work, not pleasing to the flesh, which nevertheless contributed very largely to the ultimate result. Chicopee, Lynn and Salem are three other jubilant cities, but perhaps the greatest joy has come to our union at Waltham. For years Waltham has been the one "rum" center, surrounded by a temperance sentiment which has voiced itself at the ballot box of the various contiguous towns. The union and the temperance men and women outside the union have long groaned in spirit and cried out, "How long, oh, Lord, how long?" but the result of turning that large foreign population "from darkness to light" has seemed too great even to hope for. This year the burden was laid upon the union in a way it had not been before, and the president called a meeting of the women of the town. Their faith took hold upon God in that meeting, and it resulted in a quickening of sentiment throughout the entire city. Various other meetings of both men and women were called, a campaign document, "The Why," was issued and a decisive victory gained. The liquor element resorted to threats and intimidation, even attempting a boycott on a bank, the officers of which had taken a prominent part in the work, but their bravado soon expended itself, and they are now looking about for "fresh fields and pastures new."

Pittsfield, so near the line of the Empire state that it has long seemed as if it were impervious to even so much of temperance sentiment as Massachusetts boasts, astonished itself and all other places by voting No. It is said by the women of the local union that a large share of the credit for that vote must be given to the masterly address which Mrs. Fessenden delivered there the week preceding the election.

Lawrence also rejoices in a "dry" record; but there are other cities where the rejoicing of last year is turned into mourning because of the change from No to Yes on the part of their voters. First among these must be mentioned Worcester, where our unions have always been most earnest and aggressive in pushing the no-license campaigns. Worcester's record has been a vacillating one for years, one year No, another Yes. It almost seems as if it needed a year of license to arouse the temperance people; and then as if a year of no-license put them to sleep in fancied security, while it roused to ten-fold activity the foes of the cause. Be the cause what it may, it is certain that in several of our cities the Yes and No alternate with surprising regularity, which only goes to prove that we need the prohibition of the liquor traffic upon some surer basis than the passing whim of an annual popular vote.

Haverhill, Marlboro, Fitchburg and New Bedford also went from No to Yes, much to the grief of the friends of temperance in the respective places.

The record stands as follows: Cities voting No for a number of years in succession, 7: Brockton, Chelsea, Malden, Newton, Quincy, Somerville and Cambridge. Those which are always Yes, 6: Holyoke: Northampton, Springfield, Boston, Newburyport and Lowell. From No to Yes, 5: Fitchburg, Haverhill, Marlboro, New Bedford and Worcester. From Yes to No, 10: Chicopee, Fall River, Gloucester, Lawrence, Pittsfield, Taunton, Waltham, Woburn, Lynn and Salem, while two, Everett and Medford, voted for the first time as cities, and voted No. Total, No, 19; Yes, 11.

Some of the No majorities were very large; Brockton had 846; Fall River, 924; Lawrence, 1,039; Malden, 1,008; Newton, 808; Pittsfield, 387; Quincy, 744; Waltham, 511; and Somerville, 1,861.

But Boston's Yes majority was the most surprising fact which has as yet been made manifest. That the "hub" of the liquor traffic for Massachusetts should turn in a majority of but 1,184 for license, seems almost past belief. Last year the fall from a majority of 24,000 to 8,000 was looked upon as very significant; what can be thought then of a fall from 8,000 to less than two! Great alarm was felt by the liquor men themselves. They awaited election returns at Horticultural Hall, where the tables were spread with tempting viands and their own wares flowed freely. They greeted the returns from the various wards with feeble cheers; or such remarks as, "Whew, a close shave, that!"

When separating at 9:30, the president said it was evident that license had carried by but a small majority. He could not tell what were the causes contributing to such a result, but the trade must inquire into them, and if possible obviate them before another election.

Thus, even upon his Boston throne, uneasy lies the head that wears the license crown; and the grand old commonwealth of Massachusetts is coming nearer to the prohibitory law of which the Liquor Dealers' Association secures the repeal, than it has since those troublous days of 1868.

The chief part taken by the Boston union in the campaign was by the circulation of literature and the issuing of an appeal to the clergy of the city, asking them to preach upon the subject the Sunday preceding election. The majority responded to the call and the pulpits of Boston gave forth no uncertain sound upon the enormity of the licensed saloon. The state union held a no-license rally in its series of people's church meetings. Mrs. Joseph Cook presided, and the speakers were Mrs. Fessenden, Dr. Miner, Dr. Gibbs, Rev. Mr. Dunn and others. The house was crowded and the effect of the keen logic upon the hearers could have been only for good.

Soon the towns must begin the struggle which the cities have just gone through, and so on we go in a never-ending round. "When shall we see the day that ends our woes?"

And the answer to this conundrum which is given by the Massachusetts W. C. T. U. is "When we shall have prohibition by law; prohibition in the constitution, and prohibition established and enforced by means of woman's ballot." May God speed the day!

OHIO.

DECEMBER DOINGS.

"So others shall
Take patience, labor, to their heart and hand,
From thy hand, and thy heart, and thy brave cheer,
And God's grace fructify through thee to all.
The least flower, with a brimming cup, may stand
And share its dewdrop with another near."

Champaign county W. C. T. U. met our first winter month at the very threshold, in the Methodist church, North Lewisburg, where much good, practical work was done, and much planned and recommended by the committees for the coming year. Mrs. Monroe, state president, by her wisdom and helpfulness, was the inspiration of the convention. In her evening address she briefly sketched the organization and work of the W. C. T. U. in this and other lands. The unions of the county reported state, district and county dues all paid and a small balance in the treasury. Good officers were chosen for the ensuing year. Lunch and tea were delightfully served in the lecture room.

The second district, Mahoning, Trumbull and Portage counties met in fourth annual convention at Niles, Mrs. Lucinda Davis presiding. Devotions of morning session were conducted by Mrs. C. F. Camp. This district is doing grand work. Youngstown, Mahoning county, leads in coffee house mission work, the district backing the enterprise. Miss A. Rose Morris, of Charleston, read a paper on physical culture which was heartily endorsed by Dr. Anna Shaw, who spoke in the Presbyterian church in the evening, and addressed the W. C. T. U. next day, concluding with a touching tribute to our beloved Miss Willard who is followed by the loving sympathy and prayers of the great white ribbon host. May she find across the seas the much needed strength and refreshment. Rev. Henrietta Moore delivered an eloquent address. The district is ably officered and will do valiantly. Niles hospitality called forth heartiest thanks. Adjourned to meet in June.

Under the auspices of the Delaware Y's, Mrs. A. J. Graham gave her interesting and instructive lecture on Alaska, in the Presbyterian church. Mrs. Graham has visited this great northland and her descriptions of its scenery, wonderful glaciers, mission schools among the Alaska Indians and the many curios shown made a delightful entertainment for the public and resulted in nineteen dollars for the Y treasury.

"One of the encouraging things by the way," writes a Steubenville W. C. T. U., "was our first quarterly meeting." It was held in the Congregational church. Audience good and reports from nine of the twelve superintendents full of interest. During the quarter three public meetings were held and the membership of twenty-two nearly doubled. The Messenger, our state organ, edited by Mrs. H. E. Hammond, is highly prized by the superintendents who are enthusiastic in the work of their departments. The Y's and L. T. L. contributed to the success of the meeting.

The Cincinnati Central W. C. T. U. is now gathering its clans in the winter campaign. Several deaconesses from the Gamble Home are white-ribboners, working in harmony with the Central at Shantytown under the southern bridge, where since last report eighty-nine religious calls have been made, eighty-seven opportunities for prayer, one hundred and six tracts and sixty-three bouquets given out. Seventy-one taught in Sunday-school and sixty-six in the Industrial; eleven calls on the sick and six garments distributed. Hamilton county W. C. T. U. and Cincinnati Central are marching right on.

Mrs. O'Mealy, superintendent flower missions of Williams county, sends a full annual report, gathered from the faithful superintendents of the department in the following unions: Williams Center, Pioneer, Edon, Montpelier, Edgerton, Melburn, Stryker and West Unity. Bouquets, potted plants and funeral designs have been judiciously distributed. The sick, in darkened homes and infirmaries, have been blessed and comforted by their sweet ministry. Total number of floral gifts distributed, 710.

"Rejoice that Heaven lies not away—
Beyond the clouds and starlit dome,
But in the heart and in the home
And in the deeds of every day."

Coshocton W. C. T. U., twenty-two strong, with fair prospects of increased membership, is about to open a reading-room, the plan being to have one of their members superintend it one day of each week. They are making vigorous efforts to secure the needed funds, and will doubtless succeed.

Mrs. Frances W. Leiter, for so many years the superintendent of the department of scientific temperance instruction, has withdrawn from the work to more fully engage in that of physical education in the National Union. By her resignation, Ohio has lost a peerless leader, whose faith and devotion overcame all obstacles and won for us the law requiring temperance teaching in our schools. But the law must be made effective. To this end our state president calls for more complete organization of the department in local, county and district superintendents.

"Mary Allen West, senior editor of THE UNION SIGNAL, is called home!" In common with white-ribboners everywhere we were suddenly and sorely stricken.

Our hearts stood still. "No, no!" we said,
"It cannot be! it cannot be!"
Then spake the voice, "Be comforted,
Forbid her not to come to Me."

Also December 21, Mrs. Juliet B. Riley, of Troy, Ohio, the revered mother of our state president, Mrs. Henrietta L. Monroe, was laid to rest. Our sympathies are with those personally bereaved, while of the dear departed we say, "They rest from their labors and their works do follow them."

BUCKEYE BITS.

Marlboro L. T. L., in charge of Mrs. Santers, is flourishing, with over fifty members.

Canton W. C. T. U. gave their industrial school of one hundred and twenty-five girls and twenty-five teachers a Christmas treat.

Mansfield has organized a confederation. Thirteen women's societies were represented at the initial meeting.

Marlboro has organized an Equal Suffrage Society, auxiliary to the state, not to interfere with W. C. T. U. work—rather to aid it.

The Troy Y's gave "Aunt Dinah's Husking Bee" to a delighted crowd in the opera house, December 1st, and cleared sixty dollars.

The twenty-first district W. C. T. U. held an enthusiastic convention at Columbus, December 15 and 16. Mrs. Monroe was present and delivered an able address in the evening.

An equal suffrage convention was held in Berea, January 5, Mrs. S. M. Perkins, editor of A True Republic, presiding. Fine papers were presented, including the address of welcome by Mrs. E. J. Kennedy.

Mrs. J. M. Graham, of Newark, delivered her interesting lecture on Alaska at West Berlin. The collection taken was given to the Temple and this loyal union also voted ten dollars to the same cause.

NEW HAMPSHIRE NEWS.

The men chosen by the people have taken their seats in the house of representatives and the senate at Concord.

The sisters of the state are again anxiously working for the enactment of certain laws that shall help our young. To this end the following petition is being circulated:

"To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives: We, the undersigned, request your honorable body to amend chapter 99 by adding the following section: No child under sixteen shall smoke or in any way use cigars, cigarettes, or tobacco in any form, in any public street, place or resort. A violation of the provision of this act shall be a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding ten dollars and not less than two dollars for each offense."

May the petition find favor before the good men in the House and Senate and be secured, after which may there be honor and moral courage enough among the law enforcers to see that our boys' mouths are cleansed of their filth.

Oh, the power of example! How can our boys gracefully submit to the rod of correction, either by law or argument, from those older and wiser in whose mouths are daily seen the filthy weed which is forbidden them? There is beauty in consistency, but in this matter of the use of tobacco, this virtue seems missing. How can the man condemn the boy for the very faults he himself possesses?

In the annual circular sent out by Mrs. Emma L. Hoffman, superintendent of the department of narcotics, she has this worthy clause, "Let every union take at least twenty copies of the 'Anti Tobacco Gem,' place them in the homes and Sunday schools; I make this urgent request as it is the only anti-tobacco paper published in America, and we need just what it offers us; ten copies will be sent to one address for a year for one dollar, or twenty-five cents a year for single copies, by addressing the publisher, C. H. Shepherd, Melvin Village, New Hampshire." Her circular is an earnest plea for purity from this vile tobacco habit.

The state annual reports are ready for distribution, and can be had of our recording secretary, Mrs. C. M. Abbott, Rochester, N. H., at ten cents per single copy or twelve copies for one dollar. A liberal distribution of this report among thinking people will do much toward answering the question, What are the W. C. T. U. doing in New Hampshire? and convince people that a good work is being done in many departments. No union can afford to do without the inspiration and help which comes from a knowledge of the lines of work successfully carried on by others.

We have in our state an aged ex-governor who is a very strong temperance man. He has been a total abstinence man since 1826. He is in his ninety-seventh year. His name is Nathaniel S. Berry, of Bristol, N. H. For the past five years he has been making minutes of the events of his life from his early childhood. His memory is clear, which fact he attributes to his temperance habits. He has been a member of the Methodist church for sixty-seven years and pronounces himself as "waiting patiently and happily for that summons to go to his heavenly home in the church triumphant."

We have cause to be proud of our lecturer, Mrs. Emily K. Jewett, of Hollie Depot; her words are so well chosen, her idea of our duty to God that we keep our bodies pure and stainless, so reverentially put, her manner so womanly that she wins friends and converts wherever she goes.

After a recent lecture in South Sutton the ladies formed a W. C. T. U. with the following officers: president, Mrs. E. A. W. Hoyt; vice-president, Mrs. Charles McAllister; recording corresponding secretary, Cordelia M. Withee; treasurer, Hattie Elliott.

The quarterly meeting of the Rockingham county W. C. T. U. held their last meeting in the Free Baptist church, Candia. An address of welcome was given by the president of the Candia union, Mrs. J. P. French, and received a hearty response by Miss A. E. McIntire. There was a good attendance from the local unions in the county, Rev. Mr. Prescott, pastor of the church, bade the convention a hearty welcome; this coming forward of the pastors to support and encourage our conventions is a very necessary step, too often omitted.

There were photographs of some of our W. C. T. U. workers, temperance literature, and some useful articles for sale, the proceeds to be put in the county treasury. The state treasurer stated that the sum raised for the Mercy Home the past year was $1,650, less than half the amount to be raised.

Mrs. Chase, of Manchester, gave an interesting sketch of the Mercy Home. During the three years of its existence many grand results have been realized. Souls have been raised from the depth of sin to a knowledge of a better life and taught the true value of a home and Christian living. The ability of the home to become in time self-supporting is being proved as the laundry work done in the home has averaged a little more than one hundred dollars a month the last year. The land produces enough hay to keep a cow and horse, and this past season seventy dollars worth of apples were sold. In the evening a collection was taken for the home amounting to seventeen dollars.

At the New Market Demorest prize contest Miss Lena Hoar received the medal. A second prize, a book of Whittier's poems, was awarded to Harry Haines by the W. C. T. U. The speakers were successfully trained by Miss Anna Harvey.

The work of the Keene W. C. T. U. at the county jail has resulted grandly, far beyond their expectations. A service is held in the hall every Sunday and is well attended. There are at present nine prisoners and they are continually speaking in thankful words of the great good done their hearts by these meetings and the continued kindness. Last year there was an organ purchased by the union and placed in the hall which proves a great convenience. One of the members has given a number of excellent temperance books for the library and others keep them supplied with papers and magazines. They hold L. T. L. meetings twice a month and hope to accomplish much good for the rising generation.

The Demorest contest at Tilton was a surprising success, it being their first.

At the last meeting of the Hopkinton W. C. T. U. a barrel of very superior reading was packed and sent to Mrs. Loyene, at Jefferson, N. H., for distribution among the lumbermen. It was voted to send five dollars to the Mercy Home at Manchester to help pay for coal. Five dollars was appropriated for dishes that the union might be able to hold entertainments to fill their treasury and interest the young.

Extra bedding was contributed by kind hearts to make an aged citizen more comfortable this bitter winter. So the good work goes on, and hearts are made warm as well as bodies thereby.

Miss Ella T. Pearson is to make a trip through New Hampshire. She speaks in Hopkinton in January. A further report of her work will be given in my next letter. It cannot fail to interest, for what is done for the children is done for our future.

"Blessings on the hand of woman,
Angels guard its strength and grace
In the palace, cottage, hovel
Oh, no matter where the place!
Would that never storm assailed it,
Rainbows ever gently curled,
For the hand that rocks the cradle
Is the hand that rocks the world."

New unions have recently been organized in South Sutton and Sandown, with prospects of enthusiastic work.

Petitions to legislature are being circulated throughout the state, asking for such an amendment to the law forbidding the sale of tobacco to minors, that a fine shall be imposed upon any one under sixteen found using tobacco in any form, in any public place or resort, thus following the example of New York and Connecticut.

KANSAS.

GOOD TIDINGS.

In a letter of recent date a good sister says, "We have a great deal to be thankful for, haven't we? The constitutional convention defeated and a good prospect of woman suffrage success. Can't you hear King Alcohol gnashing his teeth?

"'The world rolls freedom's radiant way,
And ripens with her sorrow;
Take heart! who bear the cross to-day
Shall wear the crown to-morrow.'"

Our state legislature convened this week, and there is some anxiety felt by friends of equal suffrage as to whether it will stand by the plank in their several platforms which recommended submitting the question to a vote of the people, or if they will take the stand of a writer to an influential paper, who lately said when speaking of planks in the national platforms of the different political parties that "they really didn't mean anything, but were gotten up merely for campaign purposes," and the worst feature of it is he seemed to be in earnest and striving very hard to convince others of the truth of his assertions. He may not be altogether wrong, but we hope for better things, at least here in Kansas, from all parties, and our women are preparing to ask the legislature for the submission of an amendment to our state constitution, striking from it the word "male." If the petition is granted us it means much hard labor on educational lines, for, though we boast of the general morality and intelligence of our people, there are still some among us whom it will be hard to convince that a woman has a soul, at least, "a soul of her own."

I understand that the wise Solons found no legal barrier to prevent Mrs. Lease from being elected to the United States Senate, but that she has concluded to withdraw from the field. This, I think, all friends of woman's advancement will regret, for it would have been as good a time now as ever to test the matter, as to whether or no a woman would be received as a member of the Senate, no matter from what state she should come knocking for admittance, and if a door was found which, by some oversight, had been left unlocked, would it not have been best to have stepped in, before some one, now it is discovered, should turn the key on us, leaving us "out in the cold" for ages to come?

The state temperance union, at its recent annual meeting, passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is the idea and intent of the prohibitory law to cut off all profits in the sale of liquors, and only to provide places for the convenience of the people in obtaining liquors under the excepted conditions named in the law; therefore we earnestly request the coming legislature of the state to so amend the prohibitory law as to put the sale of liquor for the excepted purposes, in the hands of agents of the state, who shall have no financial profit from the sales, be they many or few.

Miss Amanda Way, of the W. C. T. U., J. R. Detwiler, of the People's party, John A. Murray, the father of our present law, I. O. Pickering, Prohibitionist and Richard Wake, Republican, were appointed to prepare such a law to be presented to the legislature.

This, I think, is similar to the law recently enacted in South Carolina. I don't know just how the W. C. T. U. stands as an organization on this question, but I do know that we have become very weary of the drug-store saloons and would like to draw the reins still tighter on the whole business. If the proposed change would bring about the desired result, it is just the thing we will work for, heart and soul, but if not we would rather "bear those ills we have than fly to others that we know not of."

The State Teachers' Association was in session in Topeka holiday week, and among other good resolutions adopted was one asking that the state board of education be authorized to issue a uniform course of study for the district schools of the state, and that district boards be required to adopt the same as manuals of instruction in their respective schools; that district boards, and boards of education throughout the state be required to furnish all necessary text books, free of charge, to all pupils attending schools under their control. When I read the above, my mind naturally turned to the scientific temperance instruction work of the W. C. T. U. and I thought what a grand law that would be for us, as it would enable us to get temperance text books into the hands of all pupils in all schools, who have heretofore objected to temperance teaching on the ground of additional expense necessary to procure the books. We can afford to heartily champion this bill, and bid it "God-speed." The last resolution of the association was as follows: "As teachers and citizens we firmly believe that the prohibitory liquor law of our state has been to our people, especially to the young, a great blessing; that the present law, known as the Murray act, is sufficient, if enforced, to carry out the intention of our constitution; and that any change in any of its provisions is dangerous at this time; that we urge an honest enforcement by the officers as it now is." Our new state superintendent of public instruction is described as one who neither uses alcoholic liquors, nor tobacco in any form. We shall hope that the questions on physiology and hygiene to be used in teachers' examinations will hereafter have some reference to the effects of tobacco on the human system, which I have failed to find heretofore, by careful search, but "we shall see what we shall see."

From Mrs. J. M. Kemp, state superintendent of railroad work, comes the report of a series of successful meetings held by Miss Jennie Smith, the National railway evangelist, at different points in the state, commencing November 30, and continuing twenty-three days. Hiawatha, Horton, Junction City, Topeka, Ottawa, Chanute, Parsons, Chetopa, Cherokee, Ft. Scott and Emporia were the places visited. Every meeting was a success in spite of the very stormy weather. She accomplished much in organizing the R. R. T. A. and awakening an interest in, and understanding of this department. The collections averaged well, being especially good in Horton and Emporia. The only regret being that she could not remain with us three months, instead of as many weeks, as nearly every place wished her to return for two or three weeks' work. Many conversions among the railroad men were reported. She held noon, afternoon and evening meetings. The Topeka State Journal said of her noon meetings, "No railroad man should permit this opportunity to pass without seeing one who has proven herself his firm friend."

Anderson county W. C. T. U. convened at Greeley, under its president, Miss V. C. Henry, of Glenlock. The sessions were all very interesting and helpful; sixteen delegates and visitors enrolled. Reports from the different unions showed faithful work done. At four in the afternoon Mrs. J. C. Reed gave an interesting talk to the children. The district president, Mrs. L. B. Smith, of Ottawa, gave the evening address, subject: "Queen Esther of the Nineteenth Century." The address of welcome by Mrs. Gertie Palmer, of Greeley, and the response by Mrs. Anna Champe, of Garnett, were both highly spoken of. The Greeley glee club discoursed sweet music. At the close of the second day's reports, Mrs. Smith organized a union at Greeley. She also lectured next evening at Bush City and organized a union of five members, with two honorary members.

NOTES.

Rev. T. C. Moffatt, the pastor of the Congregational church at Douglas, Butler county, preached an able sermon recently on the tobacco habit, which was published in full in the Douglas Tribune, and deserves to be widely read. If all ministers would only attack the filthy habit as fearlessly as he has done, they could accomplish much.

The W. C. T. U. of Utica recently gave a musical and literary entertainment for the purpose of bringing the pledge before the public. Four young people signed the pledge and allied themselves to the W. C. T. U., two as active and two as honorary members.

A Topeka Sunday-school recently gave a "cold water concert" with a program of delightful music, recitations and a tambourine drill.

The home for colored, aged and orphans is now in operation doing as much good as is possible under the circumstances. Any help will be thankfully received.

Clay county has held its second "workers' meeting" which was well attended. They think it more helpful than a convention.

RHODE ISLAND.

"Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it."

The work of the unions in this state is coming to be more and more in the line of prevention. The importance of scientific temperance instruction is being brought to the minds and hearts of both parents and teachers. Schools of method have been held in different places. Loyal Temperance Legion work is fostered, and the evils of the narcotic habit have been ably presented by our National superintendent, Mrs. Gleason.

Perhaps a brief summary of the Kent county convention recently held at Phenix will best show some of the many methods employed. Every union but one in the county was represented and all brought encouraging reports. All the schools in Warwick, the largest town in this county, were closed, and of the total, forty-three teachers, forty attended the meetings. Many other schools in the county were also closed that teachers and scholars might be present. The superintendent was in attendance and the principal of the Phenix schools furnished a globe encircled with the white ribbon, as a part of the tasteful church decorations. The public school of Phenix furnished the singing in the morning, and two exercises in physical culture from classes in two different schools gave a pleasing variety to the program. Mrs. J. H. Pay, superintendent of L. T. L. work, spoke to the children in her usual happy way.

In the afternoon Mrs. A. W. Chase, our state superintendent of scientific temperance instruction, gave an address, and Mrs. Hunt, National superintendent of the same, conducted a scientific temperance institute. In the evening Mrs. Hunt took for her subject, "Waiting for the Verdict." Mrs. Tyler, the newly-elected county president, presided with grace and dignity. Altogether it was one of the most successful county conventions that we have ever held, and we hope for good results in the schools in the way of temperance instruction. Soon after the convention Mrs. Ella B. Greene, of Hyde Park, Mass., visited Warwick and also Westerly, holding interviews with members of the school board to bring to bear an influence that may result in making physiology a part of the school curriculum for every grade and in the adoption of books approved by our National superintendent of scientific temperance instruction. This work was followed by a visit from Mrs. Gleason who spoke to many of the same schools. She has also been through the Pawtucket schools carrying conviction with her. The children were obliged to take notes for an abstract of her lecture, and thus their attention was assured. A proof of advanced thought and an acknowledgment of her ability was given to Mrs. Gleason by an invitation to address our state teachers' institute on "What can we do for Boys in View of the Recent Tobacco Law?" She made the most of the brief time allowed her, and some of our teachers pronounced hers to be the most "wide awake" address given before the institute.

Another helpful convention was that of Providence county, held at Watchemoket. The chief feature of the morning was a Bible reading on "Watching" by our National evangelist, Mrs. H. D. Walker. In the afternoon Mrs. G. F. Martin gave a graphic account of the journey to the heart of the Rockies over the famous "Loop," and Mrs. Babcock brought out points of interest in connection with Denver's great Convention. Mrs. A. W. Chase addressed the teachers, and in the evening the L. T. L's took a part in the program.

One work presented, although not under our auspices, enlists the cordial and practical sympathy of our W. C. T. U. women. It is the Bethany Home, which is being established for the benefit of worthy women from eighteen to sixty-five, the age at which they may be received at the Old Ladies' Home. Here, those who cannot find work, and others who from ill health are unable to earn a living, will have a home until work is found or health restored. A bazar conducted by churches of all Protestant denominations netted two thousand dollars for this worthy object, and Bethany circles are being organized in very many of the churches, the dues from which will furnish a regular annual income.

The Providence Y's are continuing their grand work of prevention and helpfulness under still more favorable conditions. They have removed their Tea Rooms to a new business block on Mathewson street, where they rent an entire floor and have kitchen, dining hall, reception room and library complete. Beautiful rugs, stand covers, screens, lamps, pictures, plants and flowers are chosen and arranged with an artist's eye. A piano invites the lover of music, and the best books and magazines of the day furnish abundant reading.

The building fronts the south and the bright sunlight combines with the pleasant surroundings to give a real home feeling to the place. Neither are the spiritual needs neglected. Each Tuesday and Friday two brief seasons of prayer are held during the noon hour. Mrs. J. K. Barney conducted these services during the first week and has promised her continued help when circumstances will allow.

The Newport Y's still carry on their rescue work with earnest zeal and many helpful tokens of success.

The People's Mission at Westerly, under the care of Mr. Harry Riddle, has aroused the opposition of the saloon-keepers who say that it "interferes with their business." What better praise could be given?

Bethany Mission, under the charge of Mr. Joel Bassett, continues its gospel temperance work in Providence.

A union of all the Baptist, Free Baptist, Universalist, Congregationalist and Methodist churches of the city of Pawtucket and its neighbor, Central Falls, in one grand religious awakening under the leadership of the evangelist, Rev. E. E. Davidson, is drawing Christian workers nearer together and hundreds of earnest seekers are finding the Way of Life. Never before in its history has Pawtucket known such a season of refreshing.

When the forces which make for righteousness shall be as firmly united as the forces of evil have always been, then we shall indeed see the Kingdom of God coming with power. May we all help to hasten the day.

MRS. CAROLINE F. GROW, BUSINESS MANAGER WOMAN'S TEMPERANCE PUBLISHING ASSOCIATION.

At a called meeting of Directors held in the Temple December 2, 1892, Mrs. F. H. Rastall, for two years business manager of the W. T. P. A., presented her resignation from the office, to take effect on January 1, 1893.

The motion that "we do not accept it" prevailing, Mrs. Buell and Mrs. Hobbs were made a committee to confer with Mrs. Rastall and request its withdrawal. Her decision remaining unchanged, Mrs. Woodbridge and Mrs. Thurston were requested to prepare resolutions expressive of regret and appreciation.

It was resolved that these resolutions be spread upon the minutes and a copy be furnished Mrs. Rastall and her family.

At an adjourned meeting of the Board, January 9, Mrs. Caroline F. Grow, for six years business manager of The Elite, was unanimously elected to fill the vacancy made by the resignation of Mrs. Rastall. She comes to us with large business experience and recommendations of the highest character. We welcome her to the official ranks of the W. T. P. A., asking for her the kind consideration of the constituency.

POLICE STATION AND POLICE MATRON WORK.

In talking with a police judge not long since about the number of arrests in all large cities, he expressed the thought that it was a matter of surprise to him, how little the mass of the people knew and therefore did not realize (because they did not know) about the great need of reformatory work among those under arrest.

He said, "Many of them are women and young girls and children," and he went on to say, "I have often wished in my very heart before I have passed sentence upon them, that I had some tender, motherly woman to take charge of them and see them to their appointed places of correction."

"Well, judge," I said, "we have police matrons in many of our cities, why not have them in all cities of the United States that have a population of over ten thousand inhabitants?" He replied, "Madam, I shall not rest until we have a matron in every city of my state that has the required number of people. I am fully alive to this urgent need."

We do not make the claim of starting an original thing in this department, but we do make the claim that it is no longer an experiment. It has developed into a settled and systematic effort, put forth in faith and confidence in the intelligence and goodwill of the better part of society at large to do what is right for the benefit of its unfortunate classes.

This work is eminently both preventive and corrective. As a preventive measure it should be looked at from a standpoint of political economy. "Money saved is money made," is a homely adage, and it does not take a mathematician to understand how much money it takes to build jails, penitentiaries and almshouses, nor how large a tax is required of the people to keep them running after they are built.

The following questions naturally occur to thinking people:

What are the duties required of police matrons?

Can the right kind of women be found who will act as police matrons?

How shall they be selected and appointed?

The work to be done by a matron is anything but a sinecure. She earns every dollar that is paid her. Her duty is to take charge of all women and children that are brought to the stations during the day or night. They are placed under her supervision until they are sentenced. She sees that they are decently clothed, bathed and made presentable to appear in court.

When the sentence of the judge has been delivered, the matron accompanies her protegés to the places assigned them. Some to homes for the friendless, some to industrial schools, some to county farms and some to city hospitals. But none of them go without a word of instruction, a warm grasp of the hand, with an earnest prayer on the lips, for God's Holy Spirit to awaken them to a sense of their need of a Saviour.

With this kind of protection they are not so apt to repeat the offence, and may become law-abiding citizens. Should this be the result, would there not be "money in it," and would not the city and state reap the benefit?

Can the women be found who are qualified to fill the places? Yes, we think so, for in all the large cities where they have been tried there have been but few failures. Most generally they have given satisfaction and have commanded the respect and commendation of their associates. The failures have been in those places where the matrons have been poorly paid for their services, and in consequence, incompetent ones were willing to do the work for less money.

I think that the charity organizations throughout the country which are doing such practical work among the unfortunate ones, will endorse the statement that there is "money saved" to the city and state by having police matrons, and that it is preventive as well as corrective to have them. In order that mistakes may not be made in getting the wrong woman for the place, let a committee be formed as a permanent one, composed of representative women from different philanthropic institutions of the city, who have had ample experience in judging of character and let them select the names to be presented for appointment to the Mayor. This will do away with favoritism by the city council.

In the cities of the states, when application has been made to the municipal authorities and when it has been refused to have matrons, perhaps the following may be a better way:

Let the state superintendent get one or more women of good judgment and some knowledge of legislative affairs to go with her to the capitol of the state and present to the legislative body a petition, asking that honorable body to consider the question presented. State to them that the bill is in the interests of humanity, and that for humanity's sake the women and children of the state should have this care.

The World's Columbian Exposition will bring to this country a large number of people from every walk of life. Among them will be some one who will go astray, get into trouble and come to grief. It is fair to presume that the number of arrests will be greatly increased. The need of matrons will be greater than ever, and should we not be prepared to meet the demand?

Will not every state superintendent of this department act upon these suggestions? And let us all coöperate in doing what we can to forward a movement that aims to develop a higher Christian civilization, a better government for preventive and corrective measures and to bring the generic man to an understanding of where the pathway lies that leads to true happiness. Letters will be sent to state superintendents to be distributed to local superintendents as to methods.

WORK AMONG FOREIGNERS.

The fears arising from the introduction of cholera at the port of New York last fall put a stop for a while to the labors of Miss Lindahl, our missionary. We then concluded not to resume the work again until next April, but the immigration was still so large, being nearly seventeen thousand in November, that we reconsidered, and Miss Lindahl again began work Dec. 1. She also found that her labors were so arduous, and took her time so fully, that it would be impossible to work for the same salary as heretofore, and this has been increased, though very low still for the amount of good accomplished. Col. Weber, who was at the head of the commission sent out by the United States government a year ago to investigate immigration in foreign ports and on the steamship lines, and who is in charge at Ellis Island, wrote a letter to Miss Willard concerning the work of Miss Lindahl, which was also sent to me.

The work has been more successful and is really accomplishing much more than we had anticipated. I hear of it in different states where the immigrants bring their friends. Tracts are given them and the good words they speak of the kind friend who met and helped them, gives the little white-winged messengers a value which makes them heed the instructions given.

The following is a memorial to be presented to Congress this winter:

"To the Senate of the United States in General Assembly Convened:

"The National Woman's Christian Temperance Union in convention assembled at Denver, Colorado, in November, 1892, under the resolution offered by the superintendent of department of work among foreigners and unanimously adopted by the Convention, beg leave to respectfully petition your honorable body to the further and more stringent restriction of immigration at our ports of entry.

"We believe that the safety and welfare of our nation and government is imperiled by the admission of such large numbers of aliens, especially as nearly half of our Commonwealths, either by statutory or constitutional enactments, permit male immigrants over twenty-one years of age to vote at all elections within twelve months after their arrival in our borders by filing their intention to become citizens, which action seems to us to be at variance with the laws of the United States, which require a residence of five years before conferring citizenship and the power of the ballot.

"We therefore most respectfully urge that a large restriction be placed upon the number, the character, or the power of those coming to our shores that they may not practically hold, upon their arrival, far greater power over our morals and even the very life of the nation than the women who are born of American parents, and who have all their lives lived as good and faithful citizens in our midst."

The general work is growing and increasing in importance. New tracts on different subjects are brought out nearly every month. I now have them in seventeen different languages and have put them at one thousand pages for one dollar, instead of one dollar and fifteen cents, as the electrotype plates, though increasing the expense at first, enables me to get out the second editions more cheaply. They are still much more expensive, however, than tracts in the English language.

The work in Pennsylvania is most encouraging, Illinois has taken a new start, with Iowa, Wisconsin and Minnesota not far behind. Several states have appointed state superintendents since the Denver convention. The excitement due to the cholera scare has made people realize how much our physical health is dependent on this class and by inference we begin to also see that not only the moral health but our very existence as a nation depend on our gaining the stranger for God and right.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

NOKOMIS, Ill., W. C. T. U. mourn the loss of a "brother-in-law," H. F. Rood, the husband of their esteemed president.

A HOPEFUL, serene and triumphal death was that of Mrs. S. M. L. Thickstun, a white-ribboner of Council Bluffs, Iowa, who passed away November 29.

MRS. R. W. MARRIAGE, Iowa's superintendent of peace and arbitration, is at present at her home in Iowa Falls, having just seen her husband pass "through the valley of the shadow" upheld by the Father's arms.

THE many friends of Mrs. Lydia M. Chase, former president of Arkansas W. C. T. U., will be sorry to hear of a serious accident which she sustained in being thrown from a carriage in December, She is now so much improved as to be able to sit up a few hours each day.

MRS. M. J. COOK, of Oskaloosa, Ia., fell asleep Dec. 19. She was a Crusader and afterwards local and district president, until physical weakness compelled her to resign. She was connected with many philanthropic interests, and her idea of serving God was in ministering to His creatures. "Her works do follow her."

THE recent death of the octogenarian, Joel Simonds, removes from Chicago another friend of temperance. The interest taken in the great cause by this good man during his last years dated from the introduction of THE UNION SIGNAL into the family. Few men give so freely of their energies to reform work as he during his early and later years.

THE Responsive Readings for February are upon the topic, Purity in Literature and Art. Whatever is done in this line of work must be done soon as the jury is deciding upon the exhibit for the art department of the Columbian Exposition. Will not unions give this topic earnest attention and follow the directions given by Mrs. Emilie Martin, of Portage, Pa., who is National superintendent of this department?

MISS E. W. GREENWOOD, World's and National evangelistic superintendent, will be in Wyoming county, New York, February 1-8; Beaver county, Pennsylvania, February 9-15; and later in adjoining counties. March 9, she will be at Scranton, Lackawanna county, Pennsylvania. Unions desiring lectures or Bible expositions en route please address her at once at 151 Remsen St., Brooklyn, New York. Her mail is daily forwarded.

AT the advanced age of eighty-eight, Mrs. Sarah S. Webster, of Van Wert, O., was called to rest, December 27, 1892. During the Crusade, the sound of her voice in prayer and song was frequently heard in the streets and in the saloons of Van Wert. Her soul was in the temperance work and she entered heartily into all the plans inaugurated for its success, becoming the first president of the Van Wert W. C. T. U. and remaining at the head as long as her health would permit.

A CHANGE.

On December 2, for reasons fully stated, the undersigned tendered her resignation as Business Manager to the Board of Directors of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, to take effect January 1, 1893. The time was later extended until February 1, 1893, to give the Board an opportunity to fill the vacancy.

In leaving this position I desire to acknowledge the faithful service of all the employés of the business manager, who, almost without exception have been painstaking, devoted, industrious; to the Board of Directors for their unwavering confidence in me, as evidenced notably during the past two months by their urgent desire that I remain, and by electing me to the vacancy on the Board caused by the death of Mary Allen West when I refused to longer occupy the desk; to the uniform courtesy of the constituency all over this and other lands; to the stockholders of the W. T. P. A., whose interests I have tried to serve.

I take pleasure in introducing my successor, Mrs. C. F. Grow, a business woman of experience, for whom I ask your utmost consideration.

To my friends everywhere I desire to say that I have formed business connection with the well-known firm of S. Bolger & Co., and my address hereafter will be 99 Washington street, Chicago.

As National superintendent of literature I am still a member of the great army of W. C. T. U. workers.

Yours loyally,
F. H. RASTALL.

Buffalo Lithia Water

A POWERFUL SOLVENT OF STONE IN THE BLADDER.

The following plate is from a photograph which forms a part of communication of Dr. George H. Pierce, Danbury, Conn., to the New England Medical Monthly for November, 1890 (see page 76 of tha journal), and represents some of the largest specimens of Two Ounce and Twenty-seven Grains of Dissolved Stone discharged by a Patien designated as "Mr. S.," under the action of Smaller Particles and a Quantity of Brick Dust Deposit, Dr. P states, were not estimated.

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER

"73 AVENUE D'ANTIN, PARIS.

"In Bright's Disease of the Kidneys, Acute or Chronic, BUFFALO LITHIA WATER Spring No. 2, is in my experience without a rival, whether in the Parenchymatous form or Interstitial Nephritis. In cases in which Albumen reached as high as fifty per cent., I have known it, under a course of this Water, gradually diminish and finally disappear, at the same time other alarming symptoms were relieved and the sufferers restored to health.

"The best results which I have witnessed from any remedy in Gouty and Rheumatic Affections have been from this Water, and in all diseases of Uric Acid Diathesis it possesses great excellence.

"In Stone in the Bladder of the Red Lithic Acid and the White Phosphatic Deposit, its Solvent power is unmistakable. Its value, however, in such cases is not restricted to its solvent power over these deposits, but it meets the important indication, that of so changing the Diathesis on which the formation depends as to prevent reformation."

These waters are eminently a NERVE TONIC, and in all NERVOUS EXHAUSTION and any FORMS of DYSPEPSIA and in female complaints are among the most potent of known remedies.

As one of the original Crusaders, she entered heart and soul into the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and was president of the local organization seven years; and for sixteen years, the president of the home and foreign missionary society of the Presbyterian church, reëlected at the last annual meeting, only declining the honor, unanimously tendered, for lack of strength to fill the position; she was also a leader and counselor of the church social for many years, and its president for four years. Thirty-nine years of wedded life—years full of happiness, given to few—were her portion, and for twenty-seven years she has waited the call that came to join the loved one whose memory was always green. Mrs. Riley was richly endowed in heart and intellect, and she retained her faculties unimpaired to the day of her death, taking deep and intelligent interest in all current questions.

She was a woman of great force of character and made an abiding impress, not only upon her own immediate family circle, but upon the community in which she lived so long, and where she was so deeply honored and respected. Foremost in all good works, her heart was large enough to embrace old and young, to the latter giving her tenderest sympathy and love, and she brought joy and peace into every circle where her loving presence came.

Mrs. Riley was a great lover of flowers, and at the funeral service her casket was almost hidden from sight by the magnificent abundance of lovely floral offerings.

Her life was one of the most beautiful, and taught the great lesson of the influence of Christ upon the lives of those who devotedly follow Him, and to-day she wears one of the brightest crowns and sings the praises of Him whom she loved in the courts of our God.

WORK IN SOUTH AUSTRALIA AND NEW SOUTH WALES.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The approach by rail to Adelaide from the Colony of Victoria is most beautiful. South Australia's largest city is laid out like a panorama at your feet, while you climb your winding way down the hills toward it, through wild and picturesque scenery, pausing occasionally at the villages by the way. We noticed particularly the peculiar beauty of Aldgato, not knowing then how soon we were to retrace our steps, to hold a meeting there. It was held in the overcrowded little Wesleyan chapel, and we spent the night with the minister's—Rev. Mr. Chester's—family and learned that the friendly brother and his daughter had, a few mornings previous, carried a breakfast to the railway station for us, having heard that we were to pass through. Unfortunately a mistake was made in the day, and we missed the warm breakfast, and the yet warmer welcome to South Australia they had it in their hearts to give us.

Although the weather was cold and rainy when we reached Adelaide, at noontime, we felt quickly the warmth and cheer of a bevy of "our folks," women of the white ribbon, who took possession of us. Mrs. Nichols was there, the Colonial president, Miss George, corresponding secretary, Mrs. Henderson, recording secretary of the Colony and president of the Adelaide local union, Mrs. Matthew Goode, our hostess, and Mrs. Lyall, of whose good works in missionary as well as temperance causes we had already heard. We wanted to converse with her at once concerning her wonderful sister and brother-in-law, Mrs. and Rev. John G. Paton, missionaries to the New Hebrides, whose life we had just read with such intense interest. But the opportunity was not then; later we had the great privilege of dining with Dr. and Mrs. Paton and Mrs. Lyall at Melbourne.

Round-the-world missionaries have little time for reading. When we saw Mrs. Leavitt in London she advised us to rigidly exclude every book from our outfit but our Bibles. But I wish to mention three books that we have read on the wing during the past two years that have made a profound impression upon us both: "The life of John G. Paton," "McKay of Uganda" and Rev. Andrew Murray's "Spirit of Christ"; the latter we have read again and again with great spiritual profit.

Max O'Rell and we were lecturing throughout Victoria and South Australia at the same time; sometimes he preceded us at a town and sometimes we him. His work and his word are national oddities and idiosyncrasies—telling what he knew and searching Australia for new material. Our message was the oneness of all in Christ and the likeness of all human kind. I venture to say we gathered more material for future use than he, for human beings, especially women, are strangely alike the world over, and come to a quick understanding of each other. And then, there is a wonderfully close fellowship between Australian and American women. In one regard they outstrip us—in their almost universal desire for the franchise; and I suspect also in another—cordial hospitality.

We spent from June 22 to July 21 in South Australia, holding our first meetings at Adelaide, a city of sixty thousand inhabitants including suburbs, which is beautifully situated at the foot of the hills near the seacoast.

Our first meeting in spite of our request to the contrary, was a public reception. Our sisters in their cordial good-feeling find it hard to dispense with what they consider a proper show of attention to their visitors. And yet in our extensive trip, one day given to social claims largely, in each of the important cities, means to us added months away from home. Yes, often in the haste to make the ship that will not wait for us, the loss of a day means in the end the loss of many weeks. We would rigidly vote out all social meetings for round-the-world workers. In our opinion the W. C. T. U. woman who delights in flattering attentions of this sort, should, for her own soul's welfare, be deprived of them; and the woman who feels she cannot spend the time abroad for them—judge ye whether her wishes ought or not to be consulted. The day has come when with our various departments there is always sufficiently interesting material at hand to make the most varied programs, and solid, honest toil for temperance can be made perfectly attractive to any audience. Those who resort to amusements and entertainments to attract are in danger of neglecting the work.

But it is often said, "The reception, at least, is needed in order to get influential persons interested by inducing them to come and make welcome speeches." The query is, must you ask a person of influence to come and say how interested he is and how welcome the visitor is, in order that his own speech may thus create his own interest? But our Australasian sisters have been almost unanimous in agreeing with us that "votes of thanks," as it is the custom to give them in England, and throughout British Colonies, are dissipating to the influence created by the addresses, a weariness to the flesh, and that the highest Christian spirit is best conserved by not turning the meeting into a matter of personal compliment.

We spoke at Parkside, Semaphore, Glenelg and Norwood, close to Adelaide, and addressed two large meetings, besides the reception, in the heart of the city, one on Sunday night at Pirie Street Wesleyan church, attendance about thirteen hundred; and the other at the Victoria Y. M. C. A. hall. This latter, just previous to our leaving the Colony, was under the auspices of the Adelaide local union.

We traveled northward from Adelaide to Port Augusta and Quorn, a distance of over two hundred miles; returning we left the main road to go westward as far as the coast to Port Pirie, visiting Jamestown and Petersburg between, and again made a second detour from the main line westward for Moonta, Wallaroo and Kadina, a mining region. We visited struggling unions with a few consecrated workers at Balaklava and Halbury. The most solid, far-reaching work is, I believe, often done in these very small places where many difficulties are to be met for they have the blessing of the One who counted the widow's all of much more value than the rich man's little.

A pleasant feature of these South Australian trips was the thoughtful, cordial attentions received from white ribbon women all along the line who were notified of our passing through their towns by the indefatigable Colonial corresponding secretary, Miss George. These boarded the train as we passed through their towns to give expression to their hearty welcome, and emphasize it in many instances with a dainty lunch. At one place the president of the union accompanied by another officer walked a full mile in the pouring rain to bring us a cup of hot tea and lunch. They seated themselves beside us in the compartment while we feasted on the good things. But all too soon after the signal to start was given, the train began to move out. They sprang for the platform, while we rushed after them gathering up scattered dishes by the way. Too late! we waved the teacups and saucers in regretful farewell and then packed the dainty things carefully away, to restore them to their owners at Narracoort on our return to hold meetings a few days later.

I wish right here to say the cordiality and hospitality shown us from the day we landed on England's soil, and the whole world over, have simply been marvelous and one of the Father's own richest blessings. We have never in a single instance been allowed to go to a public boarding place, excepting when from extreme weariness we have shut ourselves away from every human face, or begged our sisters to be allowed an entire separation from friends and acquaintances in order that we might put every moment of our time upon some especially pressing duties connected with the work. The world is very hospitable—at least in white ribbon circles.

At Gawler we attended an interesting and enthusiastic district convention, presided over by the Colonial president. South Australia has done wisely in the matter of forming district unions, and doubtless will gain greatly in the end through the more elaborate plan of organization. At Adelaide we found the best depot of W. T. P. A. literature we have come across anywhere outside of the United States, and rejoice greatly in the wisdom of the women in supplying themselves with these weapons of warfare. We made a southern trip after leaving Adelaide, to Mount Gambier, a distance of about two hundred miles, taking in Mount Barker on the way.

The fourth annual convention of the Colony was held at Adelaide, September 6-9, in the Pirie Street Wesleyan Church; this was several weeks after we had left the Colony. Seventy-nine unions were reported and eleven districts have been organized with a gross membership of 1,832 women, 105 Y's and 391 honorary members, and twenty-eight departments of work are in operation.

Returning through Victoria we proceeded northward to hold meetings in New South Wales, at Wagga Wagga and Juner Junction. At the latter place the gathering was in the Salvation Army barracks and our host and chairman, Rev. Mr. Studd, an Episcopal minister. We reached Sydney, the principal city of New South Wales, August 24, and were cordially met at the railway station by a group of white-ribboners, including the venerable Colonial president, Mrs. Bowes, who was most warm and tender in her treatment of us throughout our stay in the Colony—a dear woman, well known and beloved for her many labors for the advancement of Christ's kingdom. We were conveyed to the temperance hall where we found a large executive committee convened to give us welcome and discuss our plans for the Colony. It was a most pleasant occasion, but we were not to stop then for engagements, but at six o'clock the same evening took train for Queensland, promising to return to New South Wales a month later, after the completion of our Queensland labors, the report of which work Mrs. Andrew is engaged at the present in preparing for THE UNION SIGNAL.

The first engagement upon our return to New South Wales was with Tamworth. A pouring rain kept very many away. September 26 we held an enthusiastic meeting in the Y. M. C. A. hall at Newcastle, with the mayor in the chair. Newcastle is a very large shipping center. On the following morning we entered the Colonial Convention of New South Wales, which was in session at the temperance hall, Sydney, this being its second day. The annual meeting was held that evening at Centenary Hall, at which we spoke, and the next night addressed an audience at Williams Street Wesleyan church.

We went from Sydney to Bathurst, filling an engagement at Penrith on the way. Bathurst is the home of the Australasian treasurer, Mrs. Webb, and of Miss Emily Price, one of the Colony's strongest women and formerly the Colonial corresponding secretary. A good meeting was held in the town hall at Parramatta, followed by engagements at Goulburn, Mittagong and Stanmore; then we returned to Sidney and to the hospitable home of Mrs. Wise, president of the local union, who, although comparatively new to our work, is most active and interested and of unusually strong executive qualities. A farewell afternoon tea was given us at the temperance hall, October 19, the day before we sailed for New Zealand, at which we were glad for an opportunity to talk with the women of the practical work of the W. C. T. U. Mrs. Bowes presided over the meeting, and nearly one hundred women were present.

The secretary's report to the convention states that there are thirty-nine unions in the Colony with a gross membership of one thousand four hundred. Eight copies of THE UNION SIGNAL are taken throughout the Colony.

Here as elsewhere in Australia there is a strong and growing sentiment in favor of woman suffrage and prohibition. We are glad to note that our Australian workers are not to be distracted from their work for prohibition, by the presentation of any plans for regulating the drink traffic. At the time we were in the Colony a bill was before the legislature providing for local option and gradual prohibition, but to the great disappointment of temperance people it was so "doctored" before submission, that they completely abandoned it as a useless measure.

The Colony of New South Wales throughout is greatly in need of help to put the work on a thoroughly practical basis, which will stamp it with the W. C. T. U. characteristics. The breadth and aim of our departmental work are not yet grasped by many of the leaders. We understand that Miss Ackermann intends, upon her return to India, to spend a considerable time in this Colony broadening and strengthening the work. We hope this will be the case.

White ribbon sisters accompanied us to the steamer to say farewell when we left. Good Mr. and Mrs. Wise and their children lingered until we could discern their waving handkerchiefs no more as we glided smoothly away.

Then we turned our attention to our surroundings, for we were passing through one of the most beautiful harbors in the world. If there is anything more beautiful than Sydney harbor, my own vision will fail to grasp it. Even this went far beyond the possibility of adequate response from within, and imagination failed to conceive of anything left out of the charm of the scene. We were gliding along on smooth water past stately houses, beautiful lawns, parks and gardens, noble trees, wonderful peninsulas of land and then at last came the immense electric light-house. The shape of the harbor has been likened to a fern leaf because of its immense number of almost regular indentations! From tip to stem this immense fern leaf is eleven miles long, but its actual coast line measures twenty thousand miles. Eleven miles out we passed the rugged "Heads" and struck the bounding billows of the ocean and a stiff, cold breeze.

I write this from the steamship Oceana, one of the best of the Peninsular and Oriental line on the Red Sea. On the way from Melbourne we paused two days, December 22 and 23, at Colombo, and there held a large meeting at the Presbyterian church, which had been worked up by Mr. Jansz, secretary of the Ceylon temperance union; Rev. Mr. Spaarh presided. Later in the evening we addressed a few words to a meeting in the Wesleyan church. We failed after repeated efforts to establish communication with Mrs. Howland, of Jaffua, who was appointed president of the W. C. T. U. for Ceylon, and the union at Colombo had failed. Hence we were unable to learn whether our work is in existence at all on the Island. It was impossible for us to linger to work up engagements and meet our engagements further on, but Miss Ackermann crosses from India to them next month. Monday, January 2, two days hence, we expect to leave our ship at Ismailia, Egypt, and go to Cairo and Alexandria to learn what W. C. T. U. work is going on in these two cities and to give what help and encouragement we can. Ismailia is the railway terminus for Cairo—in itself uninteresting, excepting, a fellow passenger has informed us, "a museum, a fusty old place full of mummies; the Kings of Egypt are there, such as Romulus and Remus, and all those."

[From a personal letter written by Mrs. Andrew in the Gulf of Aden we take the following excerpt: "It does seem strange to be learning geography in this practical way. It is a great privilege, and yet the pressure of the work upon us has largely swallowed up the tourist in the worker. Still God does give us many a cup of almost unmingled interest and delight, and as I look off at the purple heights of Aden, it seems almost a celestial vision."—EDS.]

EXTENDED.

Realizing that it was not possible for the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL to do all that could be done under our new and unparalleled offer, it has been decided to extend it, and it will hold good until March 1st, 1893.

Please give attention to the following statement and proposition:

Fully believing that it would be one of the greatest aids to our cause, as has been said again and again in these columns, if THE UNION SIGNAL were more generally read, and being unable to personally canvass all the territory of all the local unions, nearly 10,000 of which are scattered over this country, and desiring your help in this direction, the proposition here outlined is made to all ages and sexes.

NOTE.—To any one, young or old, readers of "Aunt Jane's Cozy Corner" included, who will send us a club of eight new subscribers at one dollar each, we will forward promptly one of our beautiful W. C. T. U. solid silver after-dinner coffee souvenir spoons. These spoons have the die of the Crusade Church at Hillsboro, Ohio, imprinted in the bowl; Miss Willard's picture embowered in the National floral emblem, the trailing arbutus on the handle, while the top of the handle is surmounted by the world belted with the white ribbon. The back of the handle has the World's floral emblem, the water lily, and the initials of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association. These spoons are both beautiful and valuable, being of solid sterling silver.

REMEMBER, we will send an after-dinner coffee spoon, polished or oxidized, for eight NEW subscribers at one dollar a year.

FOR TEN NEW subscribers at one dollar each, we will send a similar spoon with gilded bowl.

FOR TWELVE NEW subscribers we will send a tea spoon of the same design, or with the Temple in the bowl, instead of the Crusade Church.

FOR FIFTEEN NEW subscribers at one dollar each, we will send a teaspoon with gilded bowl.

FOR EIGHTEEN NEW subscribers at one dollar each we will send an orange spoon, polished or oxidized, with the Temple or the Crusade Church in the bowl.

FOR TWENTY NEW subscribers at one dollar each, we will send an orange spoon, gilded bowl.

This offer is open until March 1st, 1893.

VALUABLE.

A district president writes: "I have just received the Responsive Readings for January, 'Duties of Officers,' and I feel like sitting down at once and thanking you for such a valuable leaflet. It's written just right, just as though you were talking face to face with the parties. And it's 'business' from first to last, just what is needed. It does my soul good. I intend that every union in my district shall have at least one copy of this leaflet. Many of the unions take the Readings by the year; such will be sure to have it. These Readings are very helpful to the women, helpful in furnishing something of interest for visitors who may drop in, besides being instructive to our own women on the right lines."

MISS WILLARD'S ADDRESS

In pamphlet form—the annual address at Denver—can still be secured. It should be in every home—read everywhere. Price 10 cents per copy. Send at once if you desire any before the edition is exhausted.

The Responsive Readings for 1893 will have selections from the "White Ribbon Hymnal" to accompany the Readings. The pages named are those of the new edition, which differ somewhat from those in the edition sold at Denver, as some additions have been made at Miss Gordon's request.

NOTICE.

Mrs. Sarah Wilder Pratt and Mrs. Mary French Swarthout, would like to say through the columns of THE UNION SIGNAL, that they have resigned their positions as president and vice-president of the Woman's Columbian Laundry Co., solely because of their dissatisfaction with the management, and because they were refused an investigation which they believed necessary for the permanent safety and success of the institution.

To introduce our Superior Flower Seeds we have decided to give away 200,000 packets of Pansy seed this season, as we believe it to be the best way to advertise our seeds.
To every reader of this paper who sends us 10c. (silver or postal note) the actual cost of packing and postage, we will mail our famous collection of Peerless Pansies, precisely the same as we have always sold for $1.00. The Peerless Collection consists of 4 packets as follows: BLUE PRINCE, lovely shade of porcelain blue shading to dark purple. BRONZE QUEEN, large fine blossoms of of a bronze color edged with mahogany. TIGER, beautifully marked and striped flowers of every conceivable color. MAMMOTH GERMAN, extra large pansies, often measuring 3 inches in diameter, all colors mixed.

All cannot possess a
$10,000 Souvenir
(This sum was paid for the first World's Fair Souvenir Coin minted.)
in the shape of a coin, but many can have fac-similes of this valuable work of art—only special coin ever issued by the U. S. Government—for $1 each.
United States Government
World's Fair
Souvenir Coins—
The Official Souvenir of the Great Exposition—
5,000,000 of which were donated to the World's Columbian Exposition by the Government, are being rapidly taken by an enthusiastically patriotic people.
As there early promised to be a demand for these Souvenirs that would render them very valuable in the hands of speculators, the Exposition Authorities decided to place the price at
$1.00 for Each Coin
and sell them direct to the people, thus realizing $5,000,000, and using the additional money for the further development of the Fair.
Considering the fact that there were but 5,000,000 of these coins to be distributed amomg 65,000,000 people, in this country alone (to say nothing of the foreign demand,) and that many have already been taken, those wishing to purchase these mementoes of our Country's Discovery and of the grandest Exposition ever held, should secure as many as they desire at once.
For Sale Everywhere
Realizing that every patriotic American will want one or more of these coins, and in order to make it convenient for him to get them, we have made arrangements to have them sold throughout the country by all the leading Merchants and Banks. If not for sale in your town, send $1.00 each for not less than five coins, by Post-office or Express Money-order, Registered Letter or Bank Draft, with instructions how to send them to you, all charges prepaid, to CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints. Having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, and desiring to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who wish it, this recipe in German-French or English, with full directions, for preparing and using. Sent by mail, by addressing, with stamp naming this paper, W. A. NOYES, 820 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

WORLD'S FAIR SOUVENIR COINS.

One of the most creditable pieces of advertising that has been done lately is that of the World's Fair Souvenir Coins. It must have been an inspiration that led Lord & Thomas to suggest to the directory the payment of the advertising in these coins.

The advertising as designed by Lord & Thomas was unique and original. It was placed in all sections of the country, the order was completed within six weeks, and the delivery of the coins made within two weeks of completion.

The World's Fair people were eminently satisfied with the success of the advertisements as a means of selling the coins, the papers are more than satisfied with receiving the coins for their pay, and Lord & Thomas are satisfied with the credit they have received for knowing how to push the sale of a peculiar thing to a successful issue. It is rumored that they are to receive an additional order, to which they are fairly entitled.

UNIQUE.

One of the first catalogues of the season to make its appearance is that of Wm. Henry Maule, Philadelphia, Pa. And it is unique in several particulars; in the arrangement of illustrations and letter press, by which a wealth of matter is crowded into its ample pages, enough to fill two catalogues as usually arranged. Unique in its title, "Two Minutes, Please," and the large number of cash prizes offered to buyers and planters of Maule's seeds. Its 140 large pages are filled with descriptions, prices and illustrations of the seeds which have made the name of Maule a household word in farmer's homes in every habitable country of the globe. Some of the illustrations are handsomely colored lithographs, the cover pages being especially bright and attractive. The magnitude of the business which this catalogue describes may be estimated from the fact that the names of nearly 200,000 persons who buy Maule's seeds are on the books of the firm and they are live men and women of to-day. A study of its pages would afford pleasure and profit to every farmer and gardener in America, as well as the remainder of the world.

LIVING SKELETONS.

Financially it probably pays to be a living skeleton. We understand that freaks of this sort receive handsome stipends from the managers of dime shows. The fat woman and the Albino lady are dwarfs in importance—if not in adipose tissue—besides fleshless anatomies. In private life, however, these angular, bony people are not admired, and considerable money is spent uselessly to remedy the unsightly defect of want of flesh. Despite many failures in acquiring bodily substance nothing is more certain than that there is a reliable means of adding to bodily weight and vigor, rounding of corners in the angular figure, converting a haggard, attenuated, woe-begone countenance to a plump and rosy one. Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil with the Hypophosphites of Lime and Soda will pad the form with firm, healthy flesh. Physicians say so:—So does the public:—So does the press. No diseases are so destructive of bodily tissue as those which affect the throat and lungs, and this loss is more efficiently repaired by Scott's Emulsion than by any other pulmonic. Medical men particularly commend it for the use of anæmic or feeble children, and no household where there are such should be without it. Its agreeable flavor is made a subject of constant remark in testimonials to its efficacy, daily received at headquarters.

WINTER RESORTS OF THE SOUTH.

Jacksonville and Tampa, Fla., and other South Atlantic and gulf coast resorts can be reached with but one change of cars from Chicago, and that at Louisville or Cincinnati, where the Monon makes close connection with the L. & N. and Q. & C. Vestibule trains, running through to Florida.

The Monon's day trains are now all equipped with beautiful new parlor and dining cars, while its night trains are made up of day coaches, and Pullman and compartment sleepers, lighted by electricity from headlight to hindermost sleeper.

The Monon has gradually fought its way to the front, making extensive improvements in its road-bed and service, until today it is the best equipped line from Chicago to the South, offering its patrons facilities and accommodations second to none in the world, and at rates lower than ver before.

Judging from the fact that Iceland, with seventy thousand population, has but two policemen and two lawyers, it must be a sober country.

It is said that the German Kaiser takes great interest in a society which distributes Bibles among the soldiers. Since its organization in 1831, over one million Bibles have been sold at reduced rates to privates.

At an important conference to be held in Birmingham next month with the Miners' Federation of Great Britain the importance and necessity for the appointment of women as factory inspectors will be discussed.

Prof. Tyndall gives some rather gloomy results of his researches in longevity, for he asserts that the average age of the trained nurse is but twenty-five years, while the non-nursing women attain the average of fifty-eight.

A millionaire English brewer owning ninety public houses has bequeathed two hundred and fifty thousand dollars to a Bible society. Is this a case where the recipient should say, "Thy money perish with thee"?

The temporary home for working women in Boston has for its main object the fitting and compelling of women to help themselves. The home is out of debt, and one-half the expenses are met by the work of inmates. Fifty-three hundred have been received since 1882.

The Royal Commission, who have been examining into the liquor traffic in Vancouver have listened to very conflicting statements. The mayor testified to the satisfactory working of the license law, to Sunday closing, etc. This view was sustained by the city license inspector. The police magistrate, testifying to the efficiency of the license system, also stated that sixty per cent of all the cases that came before him were for drunkenness and in ten to fifteen per cent of the others drink was traceable. Still license was a success—in making drunkenness, surely! The superintendent of the Pacific division of the Canadian Pacific Railroad stated that saloon licenses could be abolished with benefit; there was no necessity for them. One justice of the peace admitted that he had never seen the trade regulated successfully. All admitted that the failure of the Scott Act in Ontario was due to the apathy of the officials. A sea captain gave as his opinion that liquor was necessary to the existence of the Anglo-Saxon and in the next sentence declared that drinking was ruinous to young men and boys. The result of the examination seemed to be that license is as much a success in Vancouver as anywhere, which is no success, and that regulation does not regulate nor restriction restrict the amount sold.

A New Style Postal Card

has just been ordered by the Government—a kind of folder which may have the flap torn off and returned to the sender. Postal cards are steadily growing in favor and use. A single one has often accomplished results out of all proportion to its intrinsic worth. For example, a postal sent to Drs. Starkey & Palen, 1529 Arch street, Philadelphia, will bring in return a complimentary history of the discovery of their famous Compound Oxygen, its mode of action, and numerous testimonials from those who, by means of this wonderful agent, have been cured of Consumption, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Asthma, Nervous Prostration, Rheumatism, and a long list of the most serious chronic diseases that mortal flesh is heir to. It's a story that taxes credulity, but it is as strictly true as any history that ever went into a book-case, and withal, much easier proved than many such, for the reason that the writers are living and get-at-able people whose grateful motive is to point out to others the way of their own relief. If you need better health or greater strength, start out a postal card as above. Drs. Starkey & Palen, 1529 Arch street, Philadelphia, or Chicago, San Francisco, New York, and Toronto, Ont.

A Pitiable Sight

10 CENTS A DAY. ONE HUNDRED COTTAGES OR TENTS. 10 CENTS A DAY.

HARVEY, ILL.

The Chicago Inter-State Assembly has just been located at Harvey in connection with the World's Fair Temperance headquarters. It will have regular Chautauqua sessions every summer, and will be the great rallying point for Temperance Workers, Educators and Normal Training Classes. It will be the Prohibition Park of the Mississippi Valley. In connection with it we offer the use of its cottages and tents for World's Fair purposes.

LOCATION.

These cottages and tents are within 1,000 feet of the Great World's Fair Temperance Headquarters, and are immediately adjoining the grounds where the great Auditorium will be constructed in which will be held the great meetings, both during the World's Fair and thereafter each summer. It is on the banks of the Calumet River, as shown by the cut here given. They are from 15 to 25 feet above the water, and have perfect natural drainage.

WORLD'S FAIR

These cottages and tents can be used during the World's Fair. We can sell you a tent like the one shown in cut, delivered on the ground and all ready for use, and large enough to accommodate eight persons, ranging in price from $15.00 to $40.00 without furnishing; or, with furnishing complete, from $30.00 to $60.00. This, together with its site, would cost you a total of about $130.00. You and your family can occupy it all summer if you wish, or several families can occupy it in turn, and the outfit cost you only 75 cents per day for the entire season, and this is to be divided among eight persons who could occupy the tent, amounting to only 10 cents each for lodgings; and then after the World's Fair is over you will own your own cottage or tent, with its site, complete, for use thereafter or for sale again.

SPECIAL ADVANTAGES The great World's Fair Hotel, now in process of construction, with its enormous dining-room capable of seating 2,000 people at once, will be only 1,000 to 1,500 feet from your tent door. I will receive deliveries of fresh meats twice daily and direct from the Stock Yards. It will have its own dairy and will furnish fresh and pure milk. It has already stored its own ice in abundant quantities and for all purposes. It is within a mile and a half of the largest gardens in the Mississippi Valley; it is on the side of the Fair away from the crowds. I will be in a community made up exclusively of Temperance and Christian people gathered from every portion of this country, and of all others. It will be under a management experienced and successful, and which has never made a failure.

TERMS OF SALE.

The 100 cottages or tents are offered for sale, and all will be sold at the same price. Then a choice of location will be given to all buyers in the order in which their applications are entered on our books. Ten cottages and tents were spoken for the first day they were offered for sale, and among buyers already on our list may be mentioned GEN. C. H. HOWARD, DR. A. J. JUTKINS, MARY A. WOODBRIDGE, GEN. WM. F. SINGLETON, and others. If you wish to join this company of campers and get the cheapest lodgings ever offered in the choicest company ever gathered, write at once for full particulars to

A strong sentiment in favor of Hawaiian annexation is felt at Washington.

The territory of Arizona has been placed upon the list of new states by the Republican senatorial caucus.

An investigation is proceeding in Rome against Italian statesmen who are charged with complicity in bank frauds.

The new Cunard steamship, Lucania, launched last week, is expected to cross the Atlantic in five days and six hours.

An hundred houses are reported to have been wrecked in an earthquake shock in the city of Zanté, Ionian Islands, last week.

The Alabama legislature has passed a bill to prohibit the sale or disposition of cigarettes, also the smoking of cigarettes in public places.

Miss Anna E. Dickinson has brought suit for $125,000 against eight persons who were instrumental in lodging her in the Danville Insane Asylum in 1891.

The President has nominated Judge Howell Edmunds Jackson, of Tennessee, to take the place on the Supreme bench left vacant by the death of Justice Lamar.

The Illinois legislature has put itself on record as in favor of opening the gates of the Columbian Exposition on Sunday. The vote stood sixty-three to forty-eight.

The steamship, City of Peking, which sailed from Yokohama, January 10, has just reached San Francisco, being twelve days overdue. A search vessel had been sent out.

The anti-option bill, which is designed to destroy speculative dealing in farm and plantation products, passed in the Senate, and the contest over it began in the House, February 2.

The advance sheets of the Catholic Directory, the official publication of the Catholic church in the United States, gives the total Catholic population in this country as 8,806,095, 9,388 of whom are priests.

The first annual convention of the distillers and wholesale liquor dealers in session at Louisville, Ky., February 2, passed resolutions opposing an increased whisky tax, denouncing the whisky trust and commending the proposed investigation of its methods.

The Hawaiian commissioners have reached Washington and are engaged in interviews with Secretary of State Foster and President Harrison. They are confident of success in their appeal for annexation, and as England offers no opposition, the prospects for a peaceful and prompt adjustment are very encouraging.

IMPORTANT BUSINESS NOTICE.

Will all readers kindly notice the change of business manager of the W. T. P. A., and hereafter send all business communications to Caroline F. Grow, the present manager. Business communications include subscriptions, notice of change of address, orders for books, leaflets, cards, stationery, sample copies, etc. Literary contributions and suggestions for the conduct of THE UNION SIGNAL should be addressed, as heretofore, to the editors.

WE desire to call special attention to the important official communication on page twelve relative to the World's W. C. T. U convention. It will be seen that the date has been changed by force of untoward circumstances.

IT is claimed by the Salvation Army that theirs is the only organization of its size in the world that requires total abstinence as a pre-requisite to admission. So far as we know this is true, and if any dispute let us hear why they do so.

THE Durborow House Committee, which has the Sunday opening resolution in charge, has postponed action, according to a Washington dispatch. It is said that experienced and thoughtful observers do not think the resolution will ever carry if presented to Congress.

CANON WILBERFORCE very happily said at the recent temperance meeting in Exeter Hall, "Now is the ax laid at the root of the tree, and the old man who in the groves of Hawarden learned to use the ax so well, must take it up." Mr. Stead, in characterizing the guest of the evening forcibly used this emblem: "One of those busy shuttles in the roaring loom of time."

MRS. CARSE, having recovered sufficiently to enable her to undertake a journey, leaves on Thursday of this week for California, stopping for a few days at Las Vegas, N. M. Her friends believe the change of climate will fully restore her to health, and that she will return in the spring entirely recuperated. In the meantime her mail should all be addressed to the Temple, where a competent secretary will give it careful attention.

THE Free Baptist church had seven women delegates at its general conference in 1889, and this year the number was increased to thirteen. Zion's Herald says in regard to them that several of the women read papers, which were listened to with marked attention, that they took part in the discussions and voted according to their convictions. It does look as if the elaborate arguments with which some of our Methodist brothers proved the utter impossibility of women being a positive force in a convention of men were about to be relegated to the curiosity shop, along with other equally interesting a priori arguments by which men have in times past proved that only five planets could exist, that a steamship could never cross the Atlantic, etc.

THE Christian Advocate, New York, has just issued its index for the past year. It is carefully and accurately compiled, and is invaluable to one desiring to consult the year's file of this paper for information concerning any subject treated in its pages. We find on consulting this index that there is one subject for which those desiring information will have to look elsewhere than in the columns of the New York Advocate, and that is the W. C. T. U. This organization is mentioned, according to the index, just three times during the entire year. The first mention consists of a short quotation from Miss Willard, the second is a brief statement by Mary A. Woodbridge concerning the World's Petition, the third is a simple announcement of the annual convention at Denver. Well, one thing is assured, the W. C. T. U. with its 154,213 members of as noble women as this country can boast, not to mention its 12,363 Y's, is too big to be grieved at snubs from those who are determined to minimize the public work of women. Considering the work already done by the W. C. T. U., its steady, rapid growth and the position it holds with intelligent people as a great world movement, this attempt to ignore it as unworthy of notice by one of the leading religious papers of the day is simply amusing. It is very much like the persistent denial by the astronomers of Galileo's time of the existence of the four moons of Jupiter and their refusal to look through his telescope lest they might see the offensive satellites.

IN England seventeen men, consisting of Mr. Gladstone and his Cabinet, are the political rulers of three hundred millions of people, or one-fifth of the inhabitants of the globe. England is now becoming so democratic that it is quite likely, so the leading English papers say, that within a few years John Burns, a working man, who never received more than five hundred a year, will be one of the seventeen.

THE "ruinous" fall in the price of whisky during the past week has been unprecedented in the history of the vile decoction, which has to our sorrow always enjoyed a firm financial basis. Whether the wreck has been caused by the fears of Congressional investigation or the mismanagement of the prime builders of the combine, the fact remains that whisky has proved itself in countless ways an "unstable" product and this is the latest demonstration.

IN the February number of Our Day there appears a valuable set of letters from experts concerning the education of Japanese women. It will be of special interest to the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL to know that the principal contribution to this symposium is by Miss Umé Tsuda, a daughter of the gentleman who was so kind to Mary Allen West in Japan. Miss Tsuda was educated from childhood in this country and speaks our own language with the force and fluency of a native. She was graduated at Bryn Mawr and has just finished a post-graduate year for her degree. She is as fine a representative of the highly educated Japanese woman as Ramabai is of the Hindu woman. Miss Tsuda is at the head of the English department of the Peeresses' school at Tokio. She is filled with a noble desire for the intellectual and spiritual elevation of her countrywomen, and no one can read this eloquent letter of hers without sympathizing with her. The second communication on this subject is by Alice Mabel Bacon, daughter of the late Rev. Dr. Leonard Bacon, of New Haven, and author of the best book that has been written on Japanese women. This book is published by Houghton, Mifflin & Company, of Boston, and the title is "Japanese Girls and Women."

MISS WILLARD'S and Lady Henry Somerset's temperance tour in England continues with ever increasing interest and triumph. The great Exeter Hall meetings in London, January 9, described in our last issue, were almost unparalleled in enthusiasm and power. But we have to report still greater meetings in Manchester, which took place January 24 and 25. Men for over thirty years leaders in our cause say there never were in England two such days of temperance demonstrations. It is a proverb that "as Manchester goes to-day, so England goes to-morrow." That city is the temperance center for Great Britain. Canon Wilberforce and Sir Wilfrid Lawson presided at these meetings and delivered addresses sparkling with wit and wisdom. Miss Willard writes that these two gentlemen and Mr. J. H. Raper are not excelled in any land for force and fire. Canon Wilberforce said: "The temperance movement, thank God, is moving, and it is being moved by the quiet, loving work of those who recognize that God is their Father and man their brother. In a country, which for fifty years has had a woman for its sovereign, the political disability of women is a paradox, an absurdity and a shame." Sir Wilfrid Lawson's speech was a perfect shower of humor. In concluding his remarks on local option (which in England is equivalent to prohibition in America) Sir Wilfrid said: "If the Government concedes this, Miss Willard will return to her kindred in the Far West—to her kindred and our kindred,—and she will be able to tell them that there were still some wise men left in the East. She will be able to tell them that Brother Jonathan will have to go full steam ahead, if he did not mean to be distanced by poor old slow-going John Bull in the glorious race for emancipation, freedom, peace, prosperity and progress."

A VALENTINE.

BY EMMA PLAYTER SEABURY.

Why do I love my valentine?
Because he is so wholly mine.
Though mountains, rivers, seas divide,
This great, wide world is not so wide
Or cruel, that it yet can part
The two who love with single heart.

Why do I love my valentine?
Because I am so wholly thine.
There is no hour the long day through
But throbs with tender thoughts and true;
No night but what thy image seems
Engraven on my sweetest dreams.

And so forever, valentine,
This love must be my purest shrine;
Upon its altars I must lay
My heart's best offerings every day;
Content to see the incense rise,
Because love's joy is sacrifice.

And I have learned, oh, valentine,
'Tis sweeter to be wholly thine,
'Tis something better, more divine,
Than that thou should'st be wholly mine;
They get the best who learn to live
That life's true meaning is to give.

So on the bosom of the years
I cast aside all doubts and fears.
I have one hope, one simple faith,
Triumphant over even death—
Love that is mine is always mine,
I cannot lose my valentine.

If love be love it never dies;
Nor fairer cheeks, nor brighter skies,
Nor change of scene, nor time, nor place
Its slightest memory efface;
It bursts its bond for wider range,
For it means God—and cannot change.

It grows, as grows the leaf or flower;
It buds and blossoms with the hour;
And its perfections we may seek
Not where the ardent lovers speak,
But in some unseen quiet spot,
By all the careless world forgot.

And so its circling cycles swing
Around the budding, blossoming
Of that which holds my heart to thine,
Of that which binds thy love to mine.
And reverently I leave the shrine
Where bends my dearest valentine.

LITTLE TESSIE.

BY CLARA MILLS DUNN.

"It seems to me," said Mrs. McCune, "that this country is coming to a sad state of affairs, when the men of the nation sit idle and see the liquor traffic going on increasing at such a rate. They will talk against its evils, and then go and vote for high license. High license, indeed! It's little they care for the principle. Their hearts are not in the cause. It's just to get their men elected, and to be considered victorious. Principle has nothing to do with it. 'We've got to go easy,' they say, and my husband is as bad as the rest," she added bitterly, as she took up her sewing.

"In one sense you're right," meekly responded Mrs. Aldrich, her neighbor, "but you must not be so impatient. The world was not made in a day, and reforms move slowly."

"The temperance reform moves slowly enough to suit the veriest snail, I should think," and Mrs. McCune shoved the glittering needle through the garment she held.

"I think the time will come," said easy-going Mrs. Aldrich, "when all these reforms will be settled the right way."

"How many men are to be sacrificed in the meantime?" questioned Mrs. McCune warmly; "how many homes destroyed, and little ones made to suffer, while this slow work goes on, if it does go at all. I am sick of this eternal cry of patience."

"My dear Mrs. McCune, you are one of our ready and active workers, and I wish we had more of them in our ranks, but you are too eager to see results."

"I do see results," replied Mrs. McCune, bitterly. "It is results that have made me so earnest. My heart bleeds as I look around on every side and see the country coming to ruin."

"Have you heard of the Careys' destitute circumstances? They say Jack is drinking dreadfully, and his invalid wife suffers everything from anxiety of mind, and poor little Amy has neither shoes nor stockings to wear."

"Yes," replied Mrs. McCune quietly, "I knew it. I almost clothed Amy last winter from Tessie's outgrown clothes, besides making things for the younger children. But what avails the little we can do, while our own husbands will calmly stand by and vote for the very measures that bring about these dreadful calamities."

"I'm sure," answered timid Mrs. Aldrich, "I am as much distressed as anybody, but I am powerless."

"All women are powerless," said Mrs. McCune, "and if they had the disposition to help, they could do nothing, since they have no voice in politics."

"You know we differ on that issue," ventured Mrs. Aldrich, meekly folding her hands.

"I know we differ," answered her friend quietly, "and I am sorry for it. I look upon you as a soldier half equipped for battle. You have your musket, but no powder, my dear." She smiled as she spoke, but she met no answering smile on Mrs. Aldrich's mild but unrelenting features.

"I'm afraid the Ladies' Aid Society will have their hands full this winter, with those Careys," was all she said.

"Yes, but if our husbands prefer to support them I suppose we ought not to complain. The burden of all this waste and poverty comes on those who pay the taxes. And the tax-payers vote to empty their own pockets, apparently. All the profits go to the few rich, while the weight of the burden rests on the middle class. Your husband and mine belong to that class."

"You are very hard on your husband," simpered Mrs. Aldrich. "I think him an adorable man."

"Mr. McCune is a very good man, my dear, much better than you know," replied Mrs. McCune complacently, "all but his politics. But to return to the Careys. I can remember Ada Carey before she was married, a sweet, innocent girl, always bubbling over with mirth and laughter. And to see her as she is now! It is enough to break one's heart."

"I don't see why men can't control their appetites," said Mrs. Aldrich, "but they won't."

"And it is because they won't that we women have to take up the crusade," replied her friend vehemently. "When they have the power to vote for better laws, and we in our helplessness entreat them to help, they only reply, 'We'd like to have things different, but the people are not ready yet. The Prohibitionists are not strong enough as a party for us to cast our votes in with them yet.' It does not seem to occur to them to make the party strong enough by adding their votes to it."

"Well, I must go," said Mrs. Aldrich, rising. "I never do know when to go if we get to talking."

She departed, leaving her neighbor to her meditations, which were sad enough, as she reflected on the circumstances of her former friend and schoolmate, Ada Carey.

A shadow fell across the doorway, and her husband entered, evidently in great excitement.

"Well, Myra, there's a terrible state of affairs down at Carey's. Jack is raving around in a frightful fashion, and the doctor says it may terminate in delirium tremens."

"Tom," said his wife, solemnly, "if you knew you were the cause of Jack Carey's being where he is to-day would you have a wish to change matters?"

"Why, Myra! what a question! Yes, you know I would."

"Well, then, Tom, let me say that you are one that helps to swell the number of such wrecked lives as his."

"Why, Myra!" he exclaimed, aghast.

"Yes, you," repeated his wife, while a bright red spot burned on each round cheek. "By your vote you help to perpetuate this very evil," and her voice trembled as she spoke.

"Say, rather, it's Jack's awful appetite that's done it," he answered. "Nothing could have ever made any more of a man of Jack than he is. It's his own weakness and want of control over himself. No one is responsible but himself."

"Do you think it right to encourage such an appetite, instead of helping him to overcome it?" asked his wife.

"No, but, Myra, how can we sit in judgment on the whole United States because of one man's appetite? It isn't fair."

"Tom, it is not one man's appetite, there are thousands and tens of thousands of them, all going Jack Carey's road, and you are one of the millions who are helping them to enter on the path of death."

"You little moralist!" said good-natured Tom; "if men were half as good as you are, I think earth would be what it was first intended to be—Eden."

"I'm glad we have no boys," she said briefly, not noticing his badinage.

"By the way, where is Tee?" glancing as he spoke at the sitting-room beyond where her chair was vacant.

"Theresa? she has gone over to your mother's to stay all night," Mrs. McCune replied.

"Gone to grandma's, eh? I'm afraid she'll become as much of a temperance fanatic as her little mother, if she follows grandma's teachings," and he laughed lightly.

"No need to imbibe grandma's teachings for that; why, Tom, that child is too old for her years. She will sit and speculate whole hours at a time on ways and means to convert Jack Carey. It's enough to shame older people to see the deep interest she takes in that family. You know she is very fond of Amy, who is in her Sunday-school class."

"You and Tee are a whole regiment in yourselves," laughed Tom complacently.

. . . . . .

It was evening. Mrs. McCune sat on the porch waiting for her husband who had not returned though it was late, and she began to feel somewhat anxious, for it was unusual for him to stay until so late an hour. She heard the roar of the river in the distance, the sound of the town clock as it struck the hours, and mechanically counted the strokes from habit—eleven—then the shrill whistle of the approaching train as it came crawling through the gap in the hills beyond. It seemed but a few minutes afterward when there was a sound of hurried footsteps on the sidewalk and a man came rapidly up the walk to the porch.

"Is Mr. McCune here?" and Mrs. McCune noticed that the tone trembled, though the voice was strange to her.

Before she had time to answer, Mrs. Aldrich ran toward her and clasped her in a close embrace. "Be brave and bear it, Myra," was all she said, but Mrs. McCune divined her meaning.

"What has happened to Theresa?" she gasped out. "Is she dead? Oh, Mrs. Aldrich, is she dead? In mercy, tell me!"

"Not dead, dear, only hurt in crossing the track. They are bringing her home now."

A gleam of pity shone in the eyes of the rough, uncouth man and Mrs. Aldrich burst into tears.

At that moment Tom rushed into the room, staggering as though he could hardly support himself on his feet. "Oh, Myra," he groaned, "this is dreadful!"

They brought her in, little Tessie, and laid her down on the pillow her childish head had pressed so often, the slight form bruised and mangled, the yellow hair clotted with blood.

"I saved him, mamma," the white lips quivered, "I saved Jack from the train, but I was too late—don't cry for me."

For a long time little Tessie lay between life and death, the doctor, stirred to enthusiasm by her childish courage, fought death bravely for the life that had so nearly been given for that of another. But at last, when she was able to sit up, crippled for life, the doctor said, but loving and patient still, Jack Carey was admitted to see her.

"I'm not worth it, Tom," he said in his agony, "not worth one precious hair of that bright head, God knows! But it's the last,—I promise you that—and I hope God will help me to keep my vow!"

I wish I could relate a change in the village vote, an awakening on the subject of temperance brought about by this sad tragedy, but truth compels me to say that at the last election, "high license," lost only three votes from its former number, Jack Carey's, Tom McCune's and Mr. Aldrich's.

"I finally persuaded my husband to vote for prohibition," said weak, but kind-hearted Mrs. Aldrich, "just to please Mrs. McCune, poor thing! she is so fanatical on the subject. Of course it will make no difference with the result, for high license will carry anyway. Mr. Aldrich knew that all the time. Prohibition is impracticable at present and we are really not ready for it yet."

PROHIBITION—THE NEXT INEVITABLE.

Triumphs and Losses—New Points of Departure.

BY HENRY A. DELANO.

Prohibition, if it has not made large advancement, numerically, has not lost. It is a living issue. The tears and prayers of many thousands of faithful souls are in it. The hopes and energies and votes of good men are back of it, and it displays a most obstinate resistent force. Every brewery in the land, every saloon and every drunkard is an argument at last in favor of it.

Prohibition is certainly more than a movement to and fro. It is in the line of progress, political and social evolution. It has not only increased its vote, but has created by agitation, argument, and appeal to moral sense, a strong and widening sentiment in its favor.

Old-fashioned temperance methods have had their day. People tire of what and all that has fulfilled its day. Prohibition is the next inevitable. If the saloon could moderate itself; if it could reform, be decent, or compensate for itself! If it could produce one good reason for its existence! But it cannot. The annals of history will never hold the record of one good deed that a iquor saloon, as such, has done. There is nothing left for it but to perish.

Powder, dynamite, insane people, poison cannot be left indiscriminately around in community, and regulated, they must be taken care of and handled altogether by experts, physicians, law.

"No use for a saloon!" This is a very prevailing sentiment among many good people, but, alas, how feebly held. Therefore comes the sad and sober side of the question. It is estimated that in the recent election hundreds of thousands of party malcontents, on the one side, despairing of their own party's virtue, rushed like the swine of Gadera violently down the steep, went headlong to the other side, and were drowned in the sea of democracy. Had they been true to professed principle they might at least have voted a protest, and the enlarged vote of the Prohibition party would have given the saloonist something to think about.

As it is, the saloon sees the marshalling of temperance forces, the parade of cold water societies, hears our oratory, prayers and threats, but as to the ballot in the hands of thousands of these theoretically all-right people, it says: "Never mind the guns of the enemy; they point our way, but good, respectable temperance people won't shoot."

It is not extravagant, it is not even radical to say that, apart from prohibition, the saloon does not fear or even respect the average temperance sentiment of this country. Indeed, it does not even give a thought nor utter an alarm cry as to what may come to it from either of the old parties.

And here we are! God knows what next. Political salvation seems far away, because the moral forces of the land seem to have discarded political parties as instruments, in any sense, of moral reform. The theory of the majority in the church seems to be that the gospel of Christ is the all-sufficient power.

Radical thinkers will not deny this if only our friends will apply the gospel. But when a gospel is preached and practiced that licenses the most woe-cursed thing we know, a traffic that blights, degrades, pauperizes, brutalizes and kills by wholesale; that fills the land with mourning, heaviness and crime, then we challenge that sort of gospel.

So the issue is way back in the church, and with the church. It is at the point of the mountain sermon. It begins at the line of righteousness. It depends upon this other question: Is this nineteenth century Christianity of ours even ethical? Does it propose in any practical way, to lay a hand of healing, hope or help, upon the nation's most piteous sore? Looking at it in one way, we should not be discouraged. For forty centuries of old, God schooled men in lessons of righteousness; but amid all the sanctities of the Hebraic ritual and code, with the thunders of judgment in their ears, the flash of divine terror before their eyes, prophets, kings, priests and peoples went astray, conscience was dethroned, and righteousness was far from them.

They were at last upbraided as "whited sepulchres," "robbers," "devourers of widows' houses," "vipers," and yet, in the day of the Son of Man they were in the temple, close to God's altar, and from that privileged and exalted place, would not go down to succor the wounded, to relieve men's burdens, nor to do even the first principles of justice and mercy. The curse came; they rejected Jesus? Of course they did, and the curse fell. The great cause—some new Messiah—has always known this, the world's old way. Is it to be so again? Must some great prophet rise to lead us, be rejected, and we go into the new kingdom through his sacrificial work?

I read this the other day: "God is never at a loss. The land may be overrun by sin; the lamps of hope seem all extinguished; the whole force of the popular current may run counter to His truth, and the plot may threaten to be within a hair's breadth of entire success. But all the time he will be preparing a man in some obscure village, may be, and in the moment of greatest need will send him forth as a herald of deliverance, and His all-sufficient answer to the worst plottings of his foes." Let us pray for such leader's speedy advent.

But he must be not alone religious, political, statesmanwise; he must be righteous. God's church must furnish him, if it have the making of such an one in loins so weak and by sinews so wasted. Something must come to us from somewhere, out of heaven, from Nazareth, from the east or west, the north or south, for the tribes of the earth mourn. Perhaps it will be Him, Himself, without sin unto salvation.

Meantime, let us gather together. Let the Steads, the Booths, the Willards, the "Lady Henrys," and all noble cohorts multiply; let Christian socialists and true freethinkers move in closer rank toward some upper room of ardent prayer, apostolic devotion, martyr faith, and wait the endowment of power from on high.

Certain it is, there must be a reform; a reconverted, perhaps a new church, 'ere there can be a new, great party whose moral sense will lift it above the horrid and fatal compromises with party idols and party gods.

COLUMBIAN CRUMBS.

BY B. V. CUSHMAN, M. D.

MRS. PALMER'S REPORT.

The report of the Board of Lady Managers, lately submitted by its president to the Board of Control, is most satisfactory, and elicited words of commendation from President Palmer in his report to President Harrison.

Spaces in the Woman's Building have been assigned to twenty-two organizations of women, representing the most forceful work done by women in religion, education and philanthropy. A sort of gazetteer of women's societies is being compiled, as a later edition of the one at the Centennial Exhibition edited by Mrs. Aubury Smith. Of its proportions Mrs. Palmer says: "It has grown so, (since 1876), that while it is delightful to realize that useful organizations have increased at this rapid ratio, we are sometimes dismayed at the thought of the great volume that will result." If these "organized efforts" crowd upon women so that they have no time for the sweet personal ministries, so much more acceptably performed by one woman than by a society, there is true cause of dismay. This is the danger of over-organization. The injunction that made alms-giving sacred as lovers' kisses, "Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth," has given way to the urgency of the modern demand for "reports."

A very practical project is the establishment of a salesroom, where the choice work of contributors to decorative art societies and women's exchanges can be purchased as souvenirs. It is a practical and kindly thought on the part of the wealthy women in the lead. British women offer five hundred volumes for the library in the Woman's Building. They hoped to loan original manuscripts of the masterpieces of their most famous sisters, but these are in the British Museum, and a special act of Parliament has decreed that none of them shall ever leave England. There will be an original page or two of Elizabeth Barrett Browning, Harriet Martineau and Hannah Moore, and fac-similes of the first two pages of Adam Bede, Jane Eyre and a few other of the immortal works that have bound the laurels of literature upon the brows of English women. Lady Gordon, chairman of the library committee, has unearthed some rare curiosities in the old libraries and book-shops of the realm. Among them is a collection of pamphlets on the rights of women, published in 1696, under title of "Advice to Ladies."

INSTALLATION OF EXHIBITS.

Exhibits are coming in at the rate of twenty car-loads a day. Space in the great Manufactures Building is all allotted, and is insufficient for the demands. Australia was among the first to arrive by proxy, in a marvelous collection of tropical plants. These with rivals from Japan, Mexico and South America, are warmly housed under the great dome of the Horticultural Building, where they flourish all together, though green with jealousy. An awkward century plant is distancing all competitors in growth, shooting up at the rate of two and a quarter inches a day. It is the most ungainly specimen in the building, but having the true Chicago spirit—genius for getting on—it is a great favorite. "Uncle John" Thorpe estimates that it will touch the top of the dome at ten o'clock in the morning of July 3, 1894, if it does not bloom and die before that time arrives. The charming Chinese primroses have forced the appointment of judges of awards, because they bloom only in January. Mr. Henry Pfister, of the executive gardens at Washington, is appointed to the bewildering task of passing upon these beauties. How he can choose one to the exclusion of the others is past my comprehension. I walked through the aisles between two banks of the blushing, nodding things, and felt like an old bachelor at a ball of debutantes, when asked which I admired most.

Another interesting live exhibit is Lady Lil, queen of American cows. Her fawn-colored majesty arrived from Alabama one of the coldest mornings this month, and was immediately installed in the most comfortable quarters of the Jersey space, where forty-nine other members of bovine aristocracy will keep her from being homesick. Six stalwart men devote themselves to the care of these fine animals, who are fed, watered and exercised by the clock and by weight. Beside the agricultural and horticultural, a large part of the electrical exhibit is in place, and the great tanks in the Fisheries Building are ready for the smaller denizens of the deep, soon to arrive.

THE SANTA MARIA.

The model of the Santa Maria, Columbus' famous flag ship has arrived and will be launched upon the stormy waves of Jackson Park lagoon as soon as the temperature permits. The caravel is warranted historically correct, although to the irreverent American youth it "resembles two huge spare-ribs, riveted together and given deck, prow and helm." The jolly tars who have drifted into the park-force are puzzling themselves as to how the Spaniards ever crossed the ocean in such a craft. Most of them declare they shall be afraid to trust themselves on board her to ply the lagoon. Another Santa Maria is on the way from Spain, at the head of the Columbian fleet, which is to consist of the same number of vessels as Columbus started with, and is rigged and trimmed in every way to resemble the famous world-discoverer's squadron. It will steer along the same course, and attempt to reproduce all the features of that first voyage—barring the mutiny.

A HAPPY COUPLE.

Two old people in the seventies, residing in Fresno county, California, have had a consuming desire to see the World's Fair. They have read with great interest all news of its growth, and have so fed their enthusiasm, and saved their dimes, that the problem of railway tickets is well-nigh solved. Some of the money has been earned by chopping wood, and all of it by hard work. The ladies of the Family Dormitory Association, hearing of the old folks' ambition, sent them as a present, a share of Dormitory stock. This insures lodgings for ten days, and will probably make it possible for them to come.

MRS. JARLEY AT THE FAIR.

There is likely to be competition between Paris and New York dressmakers, and certain to be a fine collection of "wax figgers." Prominent women in both cities have been granted space for exhibiting costumes peculiar to their countries, at different eras. The Knickerbocker display will show a procession of fashions, in clothes and wearers, from the Indian maiden and the Puritan, down to the tailor-made "girl" of the year 1893. It will be a fine study in evolution.

THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE IN NORWEGIAN POLITICS.*

The liberal movement here has always shown a friendly disposition towards the temperance cause. Several of the most energetic reform men of the left party belong to the temperance army, and the press of the left party has always had open eyes to the great blessing that the decrease of liquor consumption would bring to the country.

It is in harmony with this that the temperance cause is taken up in the municipal program of the liberal politicians. The drinking dens which the authorities have permitted to be established in certain parts of our city are a curse, and there are whole quarters where it is impossible for decent people to reside on account of the abominable liquor traffic. Property in such quarters and in their vicinity is exceedingly low.

Another subject for reform is the beer licenses, which are going from hand to hand as common merchandise, and over whose proprietors the police force are unable to maintain any effective control. Those beer licenses ought for the sake of society to be repealed as soon as possible, to put an end to those poisoning competitors to decent restaurants, which only secure their licenses for a year's time.

But the greatest scandal is the traffic which the organized liquor monopoly is putting in view before the very eyes of the magistrate. In the center of the labor quarter, where about 1,500 working-men daily are employed, this company is now establishing a den, with gilded sign, costly windows and counters—all of it intended to draw customers and rob the money out of the pockets of the poor laborers, while he in return is poisoned with the fire-drink.

We must have another spirit in our municipal officers. The temperance cause must have the assistance of the magistrates, because the decrease of the liquor traffic means increase of working power and of taxability.

The temperance party ought to vote the ticket of the left party. At the large meeting, where the municipal program of the left party was finally accepted, the warmest expressions were heard in favor of temperance work through politics.

OF all inventions—the alphabet and printing-press alone excepted—those which have bridged distance have done most for civilization.—Macaulay.

GOD is the great Worker in the world. Though He entered into His rest on the seventh day yet His rest has been full of work. He works in rest and rests in work. The operations of nature, the course of Providence, and the evolution of an evident plan in history are all living tokens of His unwearying activity. We must be careful not to hide this fact of God's personal activity under the veil of the reign of law. Men speak much of law, as if they considered that laws were forces; a law is simply the unvarying method in which the force works which is behind it, mysterious and ineffable. Talk of law and you have explained nothing as to the essence of the force itself. If you demand what that force is there is but one adequate reply, and it is given in the one all-containing word—God.—F. B. Meyer.

PHILLIPS BROOKS.

BY KATHARINE LENTE STEVENSON.

"How could he die?" is the question which has sprung again and again from trembling lips and aching hearts. He of all men belonged not to death, but to the eternal realm of life.

Those who knew him best—and Boston knew him as no other place could—have so linked his life and work with the Divine purpose toward humanity that, in their first dazed moments it almost seemed as if both were gone.

So many seemingly worthless lives, this one so transcendently, immeasurably, pricelessly valuable! And yet, the bulletin boards on Monday morning, January 23, announced, "Bishop Brooks is dead." The telegraph wires were busy with the mournful tidings, till the whole world sat sorrow-hushed beside the man who "was not because God took him." "All the world grieves," was the fitting head-line of a Boston journal. All the world must grieve more and more as it comes to measure fully its loss. "Know ye not that a prince and a great man is fallen this day?" It were easy to give bare outline sketches but Phillips Brooks can never be known from without; it is only the forth-gleamings of the inner man which can reveal him. To see him in the pulpit with the glory of the inner light upon his face as he showed God unto men was to know him—a prophet and a priest. To know him in the daily walks of life was to find how the prophetic, priestly function must be carried into all human living if humanity is ever to become the child of God. To how many human beings he stood as the highest exponent of the Christ-life, we cannot tell; but we know there are hundreds, even thousands to-day who know God better, who see Christ more clearly, whose hope for humanity has been quickened through the life and words of Phillips Brooks.

The vocation of the ministry was to him an inheritance. On both father's and mother's side he was descended from Puritan clergymen. A long list of illustrious divines might be named in his ancestral lines; among them Samuel Phillips, one of the founders of the Andover Academy, and John Cotton, so well known in the ecclesiastical history of Massachusetts; while so strongly has the trait been developed in this branch of the family, that Bishop Brooks was but one in a group of four brothers ordained to the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal church.

He was born December 13, 1835. His boyhood days were divided between Boston and the old Phillips' manse in North Andover. At the age of sixteen he entered Harvard College, whence he graduated in 1855. Before entering the Episcopal Divinity school at Alexandria, Va., he taught for a time in the Boston Latin school, but the routine of a teacher's life in any ordinary school was too narrow to confine him who should teach to the world the deep things of God.

His first parish was the church of the Advent, Philadelphia. In January, 1862, he became rector of the church of the Holy Trinity in the same city. In 1869, for a less salary than he was receiving in Philadelphia, he came to Trinity church, Boston, where, for more than twenty years he has set the impress of his personality. In 1891 he was made Bishop of Massachusetts, and in 1893 God called him to some higher service, whose scope we cannot know, but of which we can only feel that it must be infinitely great since he leaves so much in the going to it.

His death was entirely unexpected. On Tuesday night he had preached with all his usual force in the church of the Good Shepherd, Boston. On Wednesday night he came to Grace church, Newton, to attend a meeting of the choir boys' guild. Thursday, having a severe cold, his physician advised him to remain within doors, but he did not consider himself ill, and attended to his correspondence as usual. When the doctor called on Sunday evening he discovered diphtheritic symptoms, and, though really apprehending no danger, decided to remain through the night. The Bishop's symptoms rapidly grew worse; he became delirious, and at 6:30 on Monday morning, after a violent fit of coughing, his great heart ceased to beat.

Such are the bare, outline facts. They are filled in by countless souls with tender memories of unvarying kindnesses, of great, soul-stirring words, of a life which made God real to men. It was, in one sense, an uneventful life. In his own words, he "never had a history." From some cause, known only to himself, the deepest, tenderest of life's relations were unknown to him. No wife nor child mourns him to-day, but universal womanhood and universal childhood mourn in him their highest ideal for man.

With his magnificent physique and with his splendid physical powers it could never have been possible that he should fall so easy a prey to disease had he not been weakened by overwork. Add to the duties of his bishopric and the care of Trinity church, of which he never in very truth resigned the pastorate, the care of that immense correspondence, the physical strain involved in constantly seeing people, especially to him who always gave to each one something from his inner self, and it is not difficult to believe that the true verdict in his case must be—"died of overwork."

As a worker he was indefatigable—his powers of application were immense and his mind systematized all his work. Says his private secretary, Rev. Dr. W. H. Brooks:

"He never neglected anything. He lived for his work. He never seemed to think of himself. His time was wholly given up to his ministry, and he never had any time to himself, and he always was willing to see every one who wished to see him, and he invariably answered every letter any one wrote him. The routine of his life was simple. He rose early, was in his study by eight o'clock, and devoted his time in the morning to answering his mail and receiving callers who came by appointment. It was seldom, comparatively, that any one saw him except by appointment during the last few years, his time was so occupied. He never dictated letters except purely official and formal documents. He wrote with great rapidity and ease, and in a beautiful hand, and his notes were always graceful in style and finish."

His philanthropy has long been Boston's pride. Not that it was of the kind which cries itself from the housetops—quite the reverse; it was quiet and unobtrusive, but so all pervasive that it could not fail to make itself felt and known. Every one knows the story of the day he was found in a tenement house nursing a sick baby, that the poor mother might go out for an hour of fresh air. Every one knows how he hunted out cases which needed help, and how simply, spontaneously, beautifully his help was given. His philanthropy consisted not alone in the giving of money; it embraced that more difficult province of giving himself in a charity which embraced people in all their crudenesses and peculiarities. We quote again from his private secretary:

"People used to address him the strangest kinds of requests. Once a widow out in Minnesota wrote him to get her a copy of her marriage certificate. Her husband had been killed in the war. The minister who married them had been long dead and the parish was extinct. He interested himself in it and secured it for her. Then a man down in some Southern State wrote to him to say that he had to go to New York to get a difficult surgical operation performed and had no money. He wanted help. The Bishop told me to write to the clergyman in his town to inquire about it, and say that if it was all right he would pay it. Then a man wrote to him to know if he could help him get a certificate of his baptism. All he could tell was that he was baptized in a High church in Montreal. The Bishop showed it to me and asked if we could do anything for him, and we sent him a list of all the churches in Montreal and the rectors of each one, that he might write to them."

Is it strange that for such a man who saved not himself, the world should mourn! As a personal friend he was known for his brightness of spirits, his jollity, as well as for the depth and enduringness of his friendship. He never forgot. He never wearied or changed. His character bore so strongly the Divine impress that it was the same yesterday and to-day. Who can doubt that it shall be "forever"!

Bishop Brooks was not a reformer. He was, in many ways, a forerunner of that higher type which must mark humanity when reforms shall be no longer needed. We who see all things from the standpoint of the world's present need have wished many times that he, too, always saw from the same angle of vision. There were things in his life which we believe would far better not have been there, for the weaker brothers' sake, and for his own. Nevertheless, through all the differences of head-belief, we recognized his God-given mission, his priestly anointing. In our several ways we worked for the one end. He honored our work as we loved and reverenced his.

But it is as a preacher—the greatest preacher of modern times—that Phillips Brooks must be best and most widely known. To hear him preach was to gain forever a new conception of the office of the Christian ministry. It was not that his eloquence transcended that of all others. It was surely not from force of oratorical powers though he had a most forceful oratory of his own. It was not because his brain was quicker or his wisdom more profound than that of any other divine that he must stand forever in the foremost rank. What was, then, the secret of his strength?

It is hard to analyze such a power; it belongs to but few men, and of that few, in modern times, he was the greatest. Primarily it lay in his own intense conviction of the truth of the words which he uttered. His creed, as defined by himself, was a belief in the Fatherhood of God and the childhood of man to God. He believed as few do believe in God. Side by side with that belief came an equal confidence that every man is the child of God. He saw humanity always irradiated by this light. The lower sunk into sin, the more pitifully apparent to his great heart was the truth that it was the child of God who was sinning. His life work was to bring men into the glory of the consciousness of this divine relation. His intense nature—so unlike the ordinary New England type that he has well been called Oriental—was all on fire with the blessedness, the glory of his own soul-contact with the Infinite. He saw in all men, not only the possibility, but the absolute necessity for the same soul-contact. His lips were touched with this coal from the divine altar. No wonder that moulten words poured forth—a very torrent of sound, when to him God was so real, and his love for humanity was urging him on with an intense longing to make Him as real to all.

Intellectually he was great, theologically he was broad; but beyond the greatness, beneath the depth, comprehending the breadth, was the fact that he was an enthusiast, a God-filled man, seeking for all other men the same fulness.

Can we doubt that he knows that fulness more fully to-day? Can we doubt that in some way his very going from us must work for us, too, a fuller knowing? His own words are the fittest close to this imperfect sketch. In the sermon, "Withheld Completion of Life," he said:

"We are like southern plants taken up to a northern climate and planted in a northern soil. They grow there but they are always failing of their flowers. The poor exiled shrub dreams by a native longing of a splendid blossom which it has never seen, but is dimly conscious that it ought somehow to produce. It feels the flower which it has not strength to make in the half chilled, but still genuine juices of its southern nature. That is the way in which the ideal life, the life of full completions, haunts us all. Nothing can really haunt us except what we have the beginning of, the native capacity for, however hindered, in ourselves. The highest angel does not tempt us because he is of another race from us; but God is our continual incitement because we are His children. So the ideal life is in our blood and never will be still. We feel the thing we ought to be beating beneath the thing we are. Every time we see a man who has attained our human ideal a little more fully than we have, it awakens our languid blood and fills us with new longings. When we see Christ, it is as if a new, live plant out of the southern soil were brought suddenly in among its poor, stunted, transplanted brethren, and, blossoming in their sight, interpreted to each of them the restlessness and discontent which was in each of their poor hearts. When, led by Christ, we see God it is as if the stunted, flowerless plants grew tall enough to stand up and look across all the miles that lie between and see the glory of the perfect plant as it blooms in unhindered luxuriance in its southern home. And when we die and go to God, it is as if at last the poor shrub were plucked up out of its exile and taken back and set where it belonged, in the rich soil under the warm sun, where the patience which it had learned in its long waiting should make all the deeper and richer, the flower into which its experience was set free to find its utterance."

To those of us—and they are many—to whom he stood in many ways the perfected flower of human life, it is a gloriously inspiring thought that that flower is to-day knowing its perfect unfoldment. We reach our souls across the infinite spaces which separate us and rejoice that we, too, in whom is struggling the same divine life, shall some day with him know its flower and perfect fruitage. Courage and onward! "He who planted the furrows will ripen the corn."

WHO WILL BEAR THE BANNER IN JAPAN? MISS WILLARD WANTS A VOLUNTEER.

To my beloved White-Ribbon Comrades:—

Let me place before you the touching letter of the new president appointed by Miss West to lead the W. C. T. U. in Yokkaichi, Japan. This message is eloquent in its simplicity and loyal love. Miss West could not have a better eulogy than its simple lines contain; only a true heart could have made an impression so strong in so brief a period. I seem to hear Miss West's voice calling, "Who will go and take up the work I have laid down?" We must send some one, true and tried, to stand in her lot and place in that pleasant, far off land. It is my hope and expectation to visit Japan, and all the countries where our work has been planted, within the next two years, but I feel that we should send some one at the earliest possible moment to gather the threads that dropped from the weary hands of our great-hearted comrade. Who shall it be? We ought to have a woman of proved ability and reputation. Three or six months' work in Japan now would tell beyond words for that nation and for our sacred cause.

Please communicate with Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, Ravenna, Ohio, secretary of the World's W. C. T. U., and, as I am at such a distance, I hereby authorize her and Mrs. Williams, our treasurer in Montreal, Canada, president of the W. C. T. U. there, to act promptly in sending out Miss West's successor. Lady Henry Somerset and Anna Gordon join me in this request, so it comes with the indorsement of the majority of the general officers of the World's W. C. T. U.

We are well and hard at work in this crisis time of political prohibition in the mother country. No such crucial hour has been known in England in the temperance cause, and I am confident that we could not invest our efforts elsewhere to so good purpose as we can here and now.

With affectionate greetings to all our comrades, and hoping to see you in a few months at the World's Fair,

I am ever and as ever, yours in the hope of the Gospel,

FRANCES E. WILLARD.

London, England.

A PATHETIC PLEA.

YOKKAICHI, Dec. 6, 1892.

DEAR SISTERS:—We sympathize with you deeply about Miss West's death. How sad you must be to lose such an earnest worker, especially in a strange land. We who have known her only a few days, feel as if we had lost our dear mother. Indeed she is our mother, for by her motherly kindness and suffering this Yokkaichi W. C. T. U. is left as her first born in Japan, for it is the first W. C. T. U. she organized here. When we Japanese sign the pledge we first write our name and then put our seal on that to make it sure; so it looks to us as if God has called her to rest and thus sealed the temperance work in our hearts with her life. We cannot forget her and the great good she has done for us as long as we live. We shall record her name and work in Yokkaichi W. C. T. U. history; first for our own inspiration, because we love her; second, for the inspiration of others who come in hereafter. Yokkaichi is a very hard place, and the suffering of women caused by drinking and impurity cannot be expressed. Our society is only a month old babe; it must be educated and trained. We expected Miss West to do this but as you know she has gone to her rest. Now, sisters please help us in every way. Last night, one of our members who went to Magoya to meet her, said with tears, "Every time I eat rice I cannot keep back my tears when I think how Miss West ate cold, hard rice in the boat on the way here." Another of the Christian members said: "Heaven seems nearer when I think of her smiling face."

Yours with sympathy,

TOMIYE KOMAI, Sec.

OUR LATE EXPERIENCES WITH THE KNIGHTS OF LABOR.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—As a fraternal delegate to the recent General Assembly of the Knights of Labor, I asked that they stand by the great cause of equal pay for women who do equal work with men; for the ballot for women; total abstinence in the individual, and suppression of bigamy; also for the Sunday closing and to exclude intoxicants from the World's Fair, and to work for uniting in a political movement all the reform elements of this country. I also presented the World petitions, and my own little hobby, the petitions to George Pullman and W. Seward Webb, of the Palace Car Companies, as follows:

"The National Woman's Christian Temperance Union makes earnest plea that women paying full fare on palace cars may not be subjected by day and night to the poisonous fumes of tobacco, which cause untold sickness and suffering to many. They believe your sense of justice will impel you to care equally for the comfort of women as of men. We therefore pray you to abolish the smoking compartment on the palace car."

I was very pleasantly received, and Mr. Powderly replied in a neat speech that they were with us on all these questions. Speaking for himself, personally, and Mr. Wright, he said that he wished us success with our palace car petitions. Coming to this convention he had suffered greatly from the tobacco smoke in the sleeper.

The special committee, appointed to report upon the requests presented to the General Assembly on behalf of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, presented their report, which was taken up and acted upon seriatim, as follows:

"That the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union be informed that the General Assembly reaffirms its devotion to the principles of equal pay for equal work for both sexes and of equal suffrage."

After discussion, the committee was instructed:

"To amend its report to assure the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union that the Knights of Labor, while continuing to demand equal pay for equal work for both sexes, and that the rights of citizenship shall not be limited to sex, go further and demand for women equal rights with men in all departments of life—social, industrial and political.

"That the General Assembly indorses the demand of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union for an equal standard of purity for men and women.

"That the General Assembly declines to approve the demand for closing of the Columbian Exposition on Sundays."

Regarding the demand that the sale of liquor on the grounds of the Exposition be prohibited, Representative Wright thought this might be left to the authorities of the state of Illinois, and moved:

"That this General Assembly, understanding that the laws of Illinois sufficiently provide for the efficient restriction of the sale of liquor upon fair grounds in the state, believes that the regulation of the Columbian Exposition in this respect should be left to the state authorities.

"That the General Assembly heartily indorses the efforts of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union to procure the discontinuance of smoking compartments in sleeping cars."

Representative Wright moved to substitute for the recommendation of the committee the following:

"That this General Assembly, while recognizing that the maintenance of smoking compartments in sleeping-cars, is unfair to non-smokers, and especially to women who use sleeping-cars, does not believe that this and other evils connected with railways managed solely with a view to profits, can be abated until the control and ownership of railways passes into the hands of the people. And the Knights of Labor would invite and urge the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union to join with us in our efforts to bring about the nationalization of railways." Substitute was adopted.

"That the General Assembly assures the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union that it will ever be the aim of this Order to assist them, and all others similarly engaged, to place the laws of the land upon the highest plane of Christian morality, and that the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union be assured of the high regard and esteem in which this Order holds their most excellent society and its illustrious president."

The report of the Committee as a whole was adopted as amended.

There was one thing struck me as being noticeable, and that was although there were no lady delegates present, the air was as sweet and pure as that we might find in a W. C. T. U. National convention. Not one trace of tobacco did my nostrils perceive. The kind and cordial manner with which I was received, made me feel at once that I was in the house of our friends.

CAUSE OF THE FRANCO-PRUSSIAN WAR.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—There seems to be no reason to doubt the truth of the current report that Bismarck claims the credit (?) of having precipitated the Franco-Prussian war by garbling a dispatch, nor any doubt that his assertion is true. The circumstances were these: The Prince of Hohenzollern had been tendered and had accepted the Spanish crown. The French government demanded of King William that he request the prince to withdraw his acceptance. The king refused to take any part in the dispute, but within two days news was received that the prince had withdrawn his acceptance. The French embassador then demanded that King William should promise never to give his consent to the prince being a candidate for the crown. This demand was also refused. The French embassador sought another interview in order to press the matter, but King William declined any further communication upon the subject. The situation was telegraphed to Bismarck who was in charge of the Prussian foreign office. A true version of the matter was sent to other foreign governments and to all of them King William's position seemed reasonable. So it doubtless would to the French government, at least there would have appeared no cause for war in it, but Bismarck so changed the dispatch that when printed in the North German Gazette it represented that the king refused any further communication upon any subject with the French embassador, which was of course equivalent to a dismissal. It was further stated that this refusal had been formally communicated to the other European governments. The French government regarded this as an open insult and challenge, which they accepted by a declaration of war, and Bismarck's purpose was secured. His object in precipitating war was to secure the unification of the German empire. His purpose in now declaring the part he played is to claim the honor of that unification. Time was, when one of the most serious objections to a popular form of government was supposed to lie in the fact that very little secrecy was possible, even in diplomatic affairs. It has been one of the missions of the United States government to show how very little secrecy is needed in such matters and such instances as this of Bismarck show the untold evils that result from the secret diplomacy of despotic governments.

ISABELLA WEBB PARKES.

Atlanta, Ga.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

For whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world; and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith. I John 5:4.

The white ribboners possess in Anna M. Palmer, the gifted evangelist, Des Moines, Iowa, a prophetess as saintly and full of faith as Anna, the ancient prophetess. Does not the following letter from her sound as though she stood upon the mountain top of faith, above earth's narrow limitation? No note of failure; triumphant rejoicing is her song as it should be ours. She writes: "You must be a wonderfully happy woman these days, notwithstanding all the vexations and toils associated with such a stupendous work of faith as the Temple. Faith has entered into the higher realization of sight—for we behold it, a marvel to the world. The Temple column of THE UNION SIGNAL is quickly scanned by me, and all mention of the Temple through the press makes me want to take you by the hand and with you sing the doxology. I never doubt that it will become the property of the W. C. T. U. . . . For five years I have looked forward to the completion and dedication of the wonderful building, and have said to myself and to multitudes of my friends: 'I want to be present at the dedication, and God willing I expect to be.' I am sure it will be classed among the greatest events in temperance history. 'When the elders and heads of the tribes' and the chief of the mothers shall give forth their voices in addresses, prayer and song, will not the Shekinah glory again appear and the cloud fill this latter day house of the Lord? Then will we together exclaim with Solomon, 'I have built Thee an house to dwell in, a settled place for Thee to abide in peace.'"

Although we are expecting great things in the way of large sums from the rich towards liquidating the indebtedness on the Temple, we feel that this can never excuse those from withholding who have but little to give. The following gifts, we are sure, must be very dear in the eyes of our Master, as they are given in the right spirit. "I am glad to have my mite-box full once more," writes Mrs. P. L. Munross, Mill Village, Pa. "I have no idea of laying my mite-box aside because it is such a little, but am determined, let what will come, to have that much for the Temple every year." A widow from Virginia sends $5 with the acknowledgment from a grateful heart to the good Saviour, that her only child does not use liquor in any manner. "One of our earnest women," writes Mrs. Nettie S. Hershain, Wakeman, O., "Mrs. Emily Barnes, noticing in the Golden Rule Miss Willard's call for $1, handed me $1, which she had saved by going without gloves." Mrs. F. W. Nichols, Spencerport, N. Y., sends $3.65, a thank-offering for returning health. Mrs. Devoe, Winona, Minn., a veteran over eighty-five years of age, sends $2 for the Temple, which she earned by making pillow-cases. Mrs. C. G. Dowd, another Winona lady, sends $6 earned by needlework. Mrs. Susan A. McEwan, Arnprior, Ontario, sends $5. She expresses deep interest in the Temple. We are, indeed, grateful, that our sisters across the border are so ready to help us. Again have our good missionary friends in Japan, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. C. Hudson, remembered us by sending $2.65 for their little boy, Ellis H. Hudson, and $3.65 for their baby girl. Surely the interest in our beautiful Temple circles the globe.

The dear children are so interested in the Temple, too. Mrs. Clara C. Hadley, Munford, N. Y., sends $5, a mite-box collection from her two little sons, Clarence G. and Howard D. Hadley. She writes: "They expect to visit the beautiful Temple during the World's Fair, and will always be interested in it, because they helped to build it." Little Joseph C. Cook, Augusta, Ark., writes: "Enclosed please find $4, which I and my two little brothers, Charley and Preston, made by selling peaches and peanuts and bringing in wood. We now send it to you for the Temple, which we hope to see some day when we are grown to be men. Our baby brother, Carlisle, could not do anything, but we want $1 to go in his name. I am an L. T. L. boy, and intend to keep my pledge." Blanche B. Hughitt, Sherman, N. Y., writes: "Enclosed please find $4.19, the contents of my sister Rose's mite-box. She has always been a sickly child, but her great interest in temperance work led her to do this little thing with wonderful persistency."

Mrs. Emily Smith, West Haven, Conn., transfers $100 worth of stock purchased in the Temple to the building fund as a gift. One thousand dollars has been this week paid by Mr. Harry Austin, Oak Park, Ill. This money was a gift pledged to the Temple by his father, the late Mr. H. W. Austin. Rev. Watson Tranter has deeded one thousand dollars' worth of lots in Chicago to the Temple; if we so desire he will exchange them in June for $1,000 in cash.

Mrs. Joel Russell, Haywood, Cal., sends $100 in memory of her husband, Joel Russell, who was a noted temperance man. Mr. Robert M. Carr, Chicago, Ill., sends $80, which completes his payment on a memorial tablet for his wife, Carrie L. Carr. Mrs. G. D. Magoun, Tickfaw, La., sends $10 towards the memorial tablet for her mother, Mrs. E. M. J. Decker, Victor, N. Y. Mrs. James Winters, Wooster, O., writes as follows: "Enclosed please find $10, to aid in purchasing the memorial clock for Whittier, to whom I feel that I in common with all our sex, owe a debt of gratitude which we can never repay; for truly his mission was "To starving spirits needing heavenly bread, the bond or free with wrong or right at strife."

Let not those who are looking for a safe and good investment forget our Temple trust bonds. There are only a few thousand of them left. Apply to Mr. H. C. Speer 237 La Salle street, Chicago, in regard to them.

"LET IT DROP."

The Time-Server's Argument.

BY R. B. HILL.

I believe in prohibition—
In the idea, understand—
But we're not in fit condition
In this bar-room-ridden land,
Yet, to grapple with the evil
And in wrestling fall on top;
It is hard to throw the devil,
So let prohibition drop.

There's no other power like it
To degrade mankind, I know,
But, for each time that you strike it,
Hydra-like, 'twill only grow;
Every effort to remove it
Will but cause a bigger crop,
And, although I do not love it,
Still, let prohibition drop.

Now we only spend a billion
And a little more for drink.
Why not let it reach a trillion,
As it will some day, I think?
Then it will have gained its limit,
And the people will cry, "Stop!"
But, ev'n though I now condemn it,
For the present let it drop.

It's a blot upon the nation,
And an awful, bitter curse,
Yet I fear this agitation
Will but serve to make it worse.
You can't make fact a fable,
Prohibition's sure to flop,
For it's not practicable,
And you'd better let it drop.

Right is right, there's no denying;
Wrong is wrong, and that's a fact,
But there's policy in lying
If there's money in the act.
Why, the revenue from liquor
Is the nation's strongest prop!
And we get it surer, quicker—
So let prohibition drop.

A TEMPERANCE VALENTINE.

BY MABEL GIFFORD.

Ned was splitting wood out in the shed, and whistling; not a cheery, boyish whistle, but a low, sad, "There is rest for the weary on the other side of Jordan."

His face was thin and pinched and old, and looked odd on such a little body.

A door in the shed opened into the kitchen, and a woman's voice could be heard crooning a lullaby. There were other sounds; the peculiar tap, tap of a crutch or cane, and rattling of dishes. Every time the sound of those regular little taps came through the door, Ned looked more thin and pinched and old.

"Oh, if I were only a man," sighed Ned, "or a woman; women do lots of things. They earn money, and they preach, and they fight. Yes, they fight for right, when folks won't do it. How I'd like to fight the rum fellers; and I will when I'm a man. A boy can't do northin'," and overcome by the insignificance and helplessness of his situation, he cut a circle above his head with the last stick and sent it spinning across the shed. He ran out of the door, across the yard, slipped under the rail fence and continued his race until he came to a rock in the middle of the field.

A chickadee, sunning himself on the stone flew off in alarm at sight of this steam-engine of a boy. A poor decrepit fly who had crept out of his snug winter quarters to stretch himself, and feel the warm sunshine on his wings, in his haste to flee tumbled over on his back and kicked helplessly.

Ned came to a standstill and stood looking hard at the rock. No doubt the poor fly felt that its last moment had come; but Ned was not looking at the fly, nor at the pretty green and gray scalloped moss, but at something entirely out of sight around on the other side of the rock. But Ned could see it very plainly, and he did not see the rock at all.

The panic-stricken fly kicked so hard, that at last it rolled off down into the brown grass. The chickadee from somewhere among the trees that circled the great lonely field, sang brightly. Still Ned stood there, his hands doubled tightly into two hard little fists, his breath coming fast, his eyes glowing with the intensity of his thoughts. How he dreaded to go around to the other side of the little rock.

A shrill whistle startled him; he nearly jumped off his feet. "The express," he muttered, looking up over the tops of the trees and watching the trail of blue smoke. "What's the use!" spoken in a louder tone, marching to the mysterious farther side as if to meet his deadliest enemy. And in truth such it was.

Kneeling down, he brushed aside some loose grass, raised a flat stone and took out a—bottle.

"I knew it! I knew it!" he exclaimed in a sort of a despairing excitement, "the express left it yesterday."

He neld it up and looked at it; a wonderful bottle, so small and innocent looking, so perfectly harmless, corked; such a perfect Pandora's bottle when opened. All over the world little demons of evil were rushing from such bottles to bite and sting and afflict with all the woes known to humanity. And they so soon grew to be dragons, terrible, fierce dragons, breathing out fire, wrath and destruction everywhere. And then, what would come to pass in his own home when this bottle was opened? Just what had come to pass many times before.

He gave the neck of the bottle a twist as if he were strangling something. Then he sat down on the rock and held it between his hands, as if he feared it might get away from him. He looked at it steadily:

"What's the use?" He looked harder. "S'posin' I did?" He looked about as if fearful some one was by reading his mind; then he fell to thinking again. "I'll do it!"

Taking a sweeping look around the field with its sodden, bleached grass, its one little rock and the great circle of trees skirting it, he hurriedly made his way to the lower part of the field, where was one spot pricked through with a little green grass.

Ned was trembling with the audacity of his intentions. He looked up to the blue sky where the great sun grandly blazed and sent his kindly rays far and near; and the prayer in his heart which he did not put into words was this: "Dear Heavenly Father, you can see everywhere like this bright sun. Please tell me whether I am doing right, and don't let anything terrible happen."

He lifted the cover of an old well long in disuse, half filled with stones and water, uncorked the bottle and poured the contents down. The look of fear deepened as he watched the gurgling liquid disappear, but he held it there until the last drop had vanished. Next he hid the empty bottle under the well-worn jacket, and hastily walked to the farther side of the meadow, jumped the bars and entered the wood path half under water, and full of briers and stones.

And all the way through that lonely wood he might have been heard whistling, "On the other side of Jordan there is rest for the weary."

. . . . . .

"Oh, it's Ned Bennett! come in, Ned. How do you do? Come for more errands?"

"No'm; yes'm; pretty soon, I mean. Is this the house where they have the good wine?"

"Good wine? Bless your heart! Indeed this is the very place. Come right in." Then as Ned looked down at his mud-covered, water-soaked feet:

"Oh, never mind the mud; it will sweep out after it is dry."

Still Ned looked down and blushed, stepping about uneasily.

"What is it? Isn't it wine you wish?"

"Oh, yes'm!" Ned looked up eagerly and then hung his head again. "Does it cost very much?" He was so afraid she would think he was begging.

"So! that is the stump in the way, is it? Come right in, we will arrange that."

"But—but, if it wasn't too much, I wanted it for pay in advance, you know."

"Well, you shall have errands enough to pay for it; don't you worry."

The glad light that leaped into the boy's face touched the kind woman's heart. The bottle came out from under the jacket.

"You see, Miss Crissie, I poured it all out; it was full—and I expect there'll be a terrible row—'n' I thought if you would fill it with the good wine like they have at meetin', the unfermented wine they call it, it might help a little—'n' if you would write a verse or somethin' good, it might p'raps set him thinkin'. It might make him madder, 'n' it might make him not so mad."

"Write 'Valentine' on it. It's St. Valentine's day, you know, Ned. We used to have such fun with father St. Valentine's day. He sent us valentines and we sent some to him, and he'd always get the April fool on us."

An hour later Ned was at home, with dry stockings on and the muddy shoes under the stove. He was rocking the cradle with one shoeless foot and looking nervously out of the window. There was nothing to see but darkness, not even a lamp-post, but overhead the stars shone calmly down. How Ned wished he might for a moment be a star, that he might watch the man with the swinging lantern coming across the meadow—watch him when he paused by the stone.

All started nervously when steps were heard in the shed. Marcia, on her crutches, was always first at the door; she saw at a glance he was sober, and her pain-drawn face lighted with happiness. "Oh, father! we've got fried-cakes for supper, and Ned has been such a good boy today. He split all the wood and packed it up even; he did all the errands and tended baby."

Dear, thoughtful Marcia! "Father" was so apt to be hard on his only son, Ned. He looked down at her; he knew what made her a cripple; she was not born so. She knew, too, yet she was always kind and patient with him.

He looked about the room. His wife was hurrying the hot supper to the table; the baby, missing his frown, was cooing to be taken; Ned was whittling a pine stick and did not look up.

As they took their seats at the table Mr. Bennett deliberately pulled a bottle from his pocket and set it beside his plate. His wife turned pale; little Marcia dropped her fork and leaned back in her chair dismayed; Ned was hungry and did not look up. His face was very red; he must have been sitting too near the stove.

"I've had a valentine, and I'm going to treat," said Mr. Bennett, smiling grimly.

His obedient wife brought glasses, not daring to open her lips. "He's gone daft," said little Marcia to herself in terror. Ned had stopped eating. He was trembling so he did not want them to see.

The glasses were filled and passed around the table. Not a word was spoken. But what was this; what delicious fragrance filled the room instead of the vile fumes known so well?

"Drink!" commanded the man. Every glass was emptied.

"It's the wine of the sacrament!" exclaimed Marcia, forgetting her fear in this exceeding wonder.

Mr. Bennett poured out more of the cool, sweet, rich wine, so grateful to his parched throat, and passed the bottle to his wife.

"Read the paper," he said. Mrs. Bennett turned the cream-white note tied to the bottle and read:

"Drink ye of it; a blessing is in it.

"Drink—it is health, wealth, happiness.

"Drink—for home and loved ones.

"VALENTINE."

"Some of your work?" he questioned of his wife, watching her from under his shaggy brows. The expression of her face satisfied him that it was not.

"They'll have a lively time of it if they keep that filled."

Mr. Bennett had a grim curiosity to see how long the bottle would be kept filled, and he intended after a little to find out who this interested friend was. The bottle was filled and filled and filled again.

At last Mr. Bennett made an experiment. He left the bottle empty and returned home several hours earlier than usual. Sure enough some one was at the stone.

"Ah, my temperance lady, we shall see who you are now. Pretty expensive, I reckon, I've been."

Then he discovered that the figure was that of a man or a boy. Could it be a boy? Yes, it was, sure. He was putting something down in the grass, then he carefully covered it over, then he bowed his head over his clasped hands and knelt motionless.

The man drew nearer, still nearer. He stumbled a little; the boy startled, jumped to his feet and John Bennett stood face to face with—his son.

There was a moment's silence, then the father reached out his hand and grasped the boy's in it.

"Ned, boy, you've saved me. The valentine did it. God hears such honest prayers as yours."

TRUE life comes through openness toward God. The traditional far-away God is not a "Present Help." The fact must come into human consciousness that the soul is in God and God is in it. Dwelling with such a presence the world becomes a living theophany, the soul substantial rather than the body, and nature so transformed that it seems ready to melt into spirit. Character is a solid entity, while wealth, power and pleasure are ephemeral appearances. Communion with heaven is through inward states, and by way of tidings and messages from without. The highest proof of immortality comes not from external evidence, reason, or analysis, but from the fact that man can become thoroughly emancipated from the dominion of the body while still using it. "Our conversation is in heaven," and that is an internal, spiritual life and illumination, rather than a distant locality. "Take no thought for your body." Our ills come from our subservience to its demands, appetites, pride and delusive selfhood. It is well in its secondary place as expression; but when it holds the chief place it becomes an unrelenting tyrant. It will pursue and persecute the fettered soul until the higher part, reënforced by divine consciousness and oneness, turns and achieves a spiritual victory.—Henry Wood.

A COLLECTION SONG.

BY H. LAVINIA BAILY.

Kind friends, we thank you, one and all,
For giving such attention,
While we've arraigned Old Alcohol
And of his faults made mention.
And if you'd like to see him now
Put "in a pretty pickle,"
Just lend a hand and help us on
By giving us a nickel.

He stalks the earth from east to west,
A deal of mischief doing;
But we are "on the war-path" now,
Old Alcohol pursuing.
So if you'd like to see him caught
And punished for his crime, sir,
Just lend a hand and help us on
By tossing us a dime, sir.

He robs our homes of peace and joy,
He fills the land with sighing,
Sets snares and pitfalls for our feet,
He'd better be a-dying.
So if you think he should be slain,
As we believe he'd or'ter,
Just lend a hand and help us on
By handing out a quarter.

He boasts himself a King,—by law
And license well protected;
But now "the children are a-field,"
We'll have him soon ejected.
So if you'd see us tackle him,
And take him by the collar,
Just lend a hand and help us on
By dropping in a dollar.

THE TRANSFORMED JUG.

BY EVA JONES.

I am a beauty now, I know, with my delicate azure tint and spray of apple blossoms, that little Maggie painted on me last summer and the gilded words that encircle me, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," (Mother Seymour's suggestion that was), and this lovely knot of ribbon that decorates the handle. Yes, I'm a beauty, and I am glad and thankful for all my good fortune, but I am going to do as some smarter people have done before me —I am going to astonish you with my early history.

I was not always this lovely decorated jug, standing on the handsome, draped mantel, a petted ornament in a happy home. I was a homely enough, little brown fellow among my brothers in a dark corner of a grocery, down town. Father Seymour bought me for his water jug to carry out to the field when he lived on his farm. A handsome farm he owned then. But little by little the farm went to ruin. Father Seymour would take me to town with him and have me filled with whisky to take home. How ashamed and degraded I felt; for I could see by the harm it was doing the Seymour family and the appearance of the men in the whisky shop, that I was in terribly bad business and disgracing myself.

The farm was finally sold on a mortgage, and the family moved into a dreary, mean, little house in town where matters only went on from bad to worse. I know there was dreadful suffering and shame, and I was often about the only sort of dish in the house that had anything in it, and what I had was poison. Often I had heard Father Seymour promise his wife that he would drink no more; but it would not be long before he would take me to the whisky-shop and be as bad as ever.

But one day Father Seymour came in and sat down trembling, and said, "Mother, I am going to have a chance now to be a man. They carried no-license at the last election, and the rum-shops are all closed, and I won't have to stand the temptation of them any more. And, mother, now by God's help, and your help, I am going to try once more to be the man I ought."

How she cried and kissed him, and how Maggie and Tommy shouted for joy, "No license! Oh, goody, goody!"

"And this old jug of yours now, papa," said Tommy, "don't you want me to smash it so it can't harm you any more?"

And I thought my days were over just as their good days were beginning. But Mother Seymour said, "No, dear, we will put it to good uses just as we will make good use of our lives hereafter. The jug may live to do all the good it can to make up for its past record. What can Tommy do with that jug, father, that will be of good to us? Could you give him a little money to get some milk to go with our bread for supper?"

So Tommy washed me sweet and clean from the filthy, poison whisky, and went and got me filled with fresh, rich milk at a good neighbor's. How proud I was, and how happy all the family grew! Father Seymour soon was able to move his family to a better home with many comforts, and to keep a cow, so that I was no longer needed to carry milk. Father Seymour always looked at me with a sad look, as if he would like to have me give him back the years, wasted in shame and sin, when almost all he had, went for drink.

Mother Seymour noticed it and she thought of a plan on Valentine's Day which she and Maggie carried out; with the help of Maggie's paints and brushes, I was made the pretty thing you see. This bow is a ribbon Mother Seymour had worn when she was married, one her husband specially liked, and a gilded stopper and the motto in fancy letters made me "just pretty enough, for a valentine," Tommy declared.

When Father Seymour came home that night and saw it, his lips quivered and his eyes filled with tears as he said, "Mother, we will consecrate that valentine jug to giving blessings as long as we live. Every day we will spare some money to put into it for the temperance cause. I wish I had a million dollars to put into it now. But here goes one, all in little dimes, so they will shake out easy. Now think where it will best go, mother."

"Oh, I know," said Maggie, jumping up and down, "what I think she would like the very first, and that is, to give it to the Temperance Temple, and then—"

"Yes," said mamma, "and then there are lots of other ways that money can help on the temperance work. We'll share our blessings all we can with others."

"I know what is the very best blessing can happen to every body," said Tommy to himself, as he went dancing off, "and that is to have all their old whisky jugs painted up just fine, with flowers and all, so they will hold temperance money instead of saloon whisky, and every body be glad. I wonder if Maggie and I could not paint up a few more for some of the folks I know that need to have them painted so bad. I'm just going to ask her."

THE BEST KIND OF VALENTINES.

BY EMMA E. VOLENTINE.

I once knew a mother and her little daughter who had a pleasant fashion of sending valentines to one another on each fourteenth of February.

It began by Bessie's asking, "What is a valentine?"

Then her mamma explained that on a certain day in the year, persons sometimes send pretty verses to those they love, to show them of that love. And the day is called St. Valentine's Day; and the verses, valentines.

"I wish I could get one," sighed little loving heart.

"So you shall," said mamma.

"And may children send them to their own mothers?"

"Certainly, they may."

After that, one snowy morning, there was found among the mail something that made Bessie glad, while it really came as a surprise, too. It was a square envelope directed to herself; and inside—on a sheet of paper made gay with a border of flowers—were these words:

"Sweet little maid, I have been told
You're true as truth and good as gold.
Be ever thus from day to day,
Give and get good along life's way—
And know while beats this heart of mine,
I'll ever be your VALENTINE."

And under mamma's plate, at the breakfast table, was a little, folded note that she had never seen before. It read:

"I love you,
And always will,
Till I in the grave am still."

Another valentine was this:

"Dear lady, you're like the flowers and trees,
You are so gentle, meek and mild.
May I ev-er-y day be kind to you,
Who nursed so well your tender child."

Just how she was like the flowers and trees mamma, did not know. But she did know what prompted the little offering, and that the writer had chosen the words that seemed to her nicest to describe that happy mother. And every valentine, on these anniversaries, was put away between the leaves of a great "journal" and safely kept.

It was understood between these two that a valentine, to be worth most, must be made by the one who gave it; and it was kept a secret until the very day it was given.

I think, myself, this was a good way, and that there are no better valentines than the kind I have told you of, in this truest of stories.

New Douglas, Ill.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—Are you thinking of St. Valentine's Day and to whom to send valentines? I expect that's the case with ever so many of you, and much merriment and enjoyment can be had if we are good-natured and kind-hearted about it. It's such a good opportunity to give pleasure and to receive it. Is there somebody among your school or playmates, who is not apt to receive a valentine? That's the one you'll be sure to remember, isn't it? And boys and girls of the Cozy Corner, and all the dear little readers, you will promise me on your word of honor not to buy or send a mean "comic," won't you? Yes, yes, because they're always sure to hurt and sting, and that isn't the desire of a Christian temperance boy or girl. Yours, for a good time,

Aunt Jane

COZY CORNER LETTERS.

Mamma takes THE UNION SIGNAL, and I read the Cozy Corner letters. I would like to join the Loyal Temperance Legion. I am a little temperance girl, nine years old. GENEVIEVE P. BROWN.

Elyria, Ohio.

Is there not an L. T. L. near you, Genevieve? I am sure they would like to have you belong.

I am a temperance girl. I go to the L. T. L., and am ensign of it. I got lots of pretty Christmas gifts.

Broadhead, Wis. NELLIE STAIR.

Choicest blessings for the little temperance girl.

We have no L. T. L. here, but I am a temperance boy and would like to be a member of your Cozy Corner. I am thirteen years old. THOMAS GANNON.

I am a temperance boy, and like to read the stories on the Children's Page. I am ten years old.

Trempealeau, Wis. JOSEPH L. GANNON.

Our Cozy Corner salute to the temperance brothers!

Before I joined the L. T. L. I would take a glass of cider once and awhile, but now I have taken the pledge and never mean to break it. When I am old enough I am going to join the W. C. T. U., and work for God and home. I am very much interested in the Cozy Corner, and wish to join you. SUSIE E. JOHNSON.

Fort Bragg, Cal.

I hope you will grow up, Susie, helping the great world to grow better.

I am a boy ten years old. Will you accept me for one of your nephews? FLETCHER MCFADDEN.

Harvey, Ill.

Most heartily, Fletcher. Come right into our circle.

PRESIDENT ELIOT ON "POPULAR EDUCATION."

The article of President Eliot in the December Forum, "Wherein Popular Education has Failed," is naturally exciting a great deal of comment. We hesitated to criticise so high an authority on educational matters, yet, after a careful re-reading of the article in question, it impresses us as singularly indiscriminating and misleading. This is not the place for an exhaustive criticism of a lengthy magazine article, yet such is its influence upon the most vital interests of our times, including those of moral reform, that we cannot let it pass unchallenged.

The article begins with four pages of wholesale accusations of the failure of popular education to improve the condition of mankind. True these complaints are given as the sentiment of men in general, and after stating them the author says that they exaggerate existing evils and leave out of sight certain improvements which he mentions. Nevertheless, they are practically left unanswered. The weakness in the argument is this: popular education, in the sense in which the term is used by President Eliot, ought never to be expected to accomplish the things which it has failed to do. If by education we mean that ideal, which, because of the antagonistic popular views on religion, our public school system can scarcely even aim at the symmetrical development of the whole nature, moral, spiritual and intellectual—then indeed we might reasonably expect from such "popular education" greatly improved relations between employers and employed, the cessation of all kinds of lawless violence and the equalization of both the burdens and the blessings of life. But from intellectual education alone, which is the sense to which, by his use of it, President Eliot restricts the term popular education, we have no right to demand any such results. Mere intellectual education will lead to the invention of wonderful machinery; it will take no thought for the wage-earner. It will greatly increase the production of wealth; it will not make men one whit the more anxious to have that wealth equitably distributed. It will increase the terrible engines of war; it will not diminish war itself. Hence, while many of his suggestions for the improvement of our educational system are excellent, they will not at all affect the matter at issue, because they are simply improvements of the system by which the intellect is trained, while the object sought is to be gained only by the development of the moral and spiritual powers.

President Eliot takes the view that, if men's reasoning powers were only correctly trained, they would cease to follow the delusions by which the many are now led astray, would cease to reason that because one event precedes another, therefore the two stand related as cause and effect. From this standpoint he proceeds to give suggestions wise and otherwise, concerning the training of the reasoning faculties. Among the otherwise are these, that some teachers will best train their pupils to reason by means of geography, others by zoology, others by Latin, etc. And this, that mathematics is not a good training for the reasoning powers for its reasoning is necessary, while in the practical affairs of life the reasoning is probable. It would seem to us quite as rational to say that some teachers would teach their pupils painting most successfully by means of music, while with others the best instrument would be geology. It is an undeniable fact that mathematics is a product pure and simple of the reasoning powers and is therefore as peculiarly fitted to develop those powers as breathing is to develop the lungs, or seeing to train the eyes. Making due admission of the difference in subject matter and even of the different use of the faculties employed in the reasoning of mathematics and in the inductive reasoning of the natural science and the practical affairs of every day life, it nevertheless is true that all inductive reasoning (so far from being independent of it), must constantly be accompanied by the deductive reasoning of mathematics. The power, too, of concentration, of vital importance in all lines of work, is acquired nowhere so well as in the study of mathematics. Newton, a king among scientists, and Alexander Hamilton, one of the greatest statesmen our country has produced, each attributed his success to his power of concentration. Abraham Lincoln when first entering upon the practice of law, shut himself up with a geometry until, as he said, "he knew what a demonstration was." President Eliot would doubtless scoff at the idea of a geometrical demonstration having any counterpart in the science of law. Nevertheless, from that study Lincoln learned what it was to know and be able to state definitely his premises and what it was to reason from them clearly and logically to a conclusion.

However desirable it may then be to include inductive sciences as a part of the training of the reasoning powers it can be but the height of folly to dismiss mathematics as a useless part of that training.

But weak as these suggestions seem to us, it is not in them that the vital error lies. It is in the idea that men go astray chiefly because of badly trained or even defective reasoning powers. Every reformer knows that it is not men's brains but their hearts which are at fault. No one has any difficulty now, in seeing that the feudal system is not a desirable state of society, but the old barons could not be persuaded that any other condition of things was possible. No person of moderate intelligence doubts the existence of Jupiter's moons, of the planets unknown to the ancients, the rotundity of the earth and its two motions, but when these facts were supposed to conflict with the accepted religious belief, their proclaimer was punished for heresy. The temperance battle would soon be over if only men's heads were to be convinced. Alas, it is their pocket-books which befuddle their reasoning powers. Remove from every moral, political and economic question of the day all purely selfish, personal interests and the questions that remained might be settled in a country debating school.

It is certainly true that "popular education" has failed to make men gentler, more unselfish and has therefore largely failed to ameliorate the conditions of society. Men have grown gentler and better but the influence which has brought this about is something very different from President Eliot's "popular education." It is however very unfortunate if people should conclude that popular education is therefore a failure. Intellectual education, which is up to date by far the greater part of popular education, has brought its own beneficent results and is an essential part of the complete ideal education. We will reach the full results we desire, not by throwing away what we have nor even by a radical revision of our present system, but by adding to it the education of the moral and spiritual faculties.

ANOTHER MILE-STONE PASSED.

The twenty-fifth annual convention of the National-American Woman Suffrage Association met at Metzerott's Music Hall, Washington, January 15. The executive committee gave its consideration to the various fields of work opening before the association this year. New York and Kansas, with the prospect of constitutional conventions, were discussed freely as to the relative importance and relative prospects and possibilities of success in these two states. The almost new southern field presented its claims to the consideration of the association, and asked for the assistance and sympathy of the central organization.

During the entire convention the president, "Aunt Susan," as Miss Anthony is affectionately called by many of her co-workers, was in her happiest presiding mood, and her casual remarks, comments upon what was being done and introductions of the speakers, were among the most spicy and interesting occurrences. At the close of Wednesday evening session she read to the audience, with an indescribable manner, her appointment, by Governor Flower, as manager of the state industrial school of New York, and brought down the house by the emphasis with which she placed upon the word "him," where in the form of appointment, it refers to herself; she said this was the first time that she knew of "him" being "her" when it came to a matter of privilege, though in a matter of taxpaying "him" meant "her" whenever "her" held any property.

The Hon. Carroll D. Wright, for the past six years a resident of the District of Columbia, though associated with Massachusetts labor statistics in the mind of the general public, gave an address on "The Industrial Emancipation of Woman." Mr. Wright's address was that of an entirely unbiased outsider, not committed to the advocacy of woman's suffrage by personal preference or affiliation with the association upon whose platform he spoke, but by the inevitable trend of the industrial forces, of the development of which he has been and is such a close student. The value of such an advocate cannot be overestimated. Mr. Wright says he believes, with Prof. Lester F. Ward, that "there is no fixed rule by which nature has intended that one sex should excel the other, any more than there is any fixed point beyond which either cannot develop. Nature has no intentions, and evolution has no limits. True science teaches that the elevation of woman is the only sure road to the evolution of man."

He feels, however, that woman's industrial emanicipation, must and will precede her political emancipation on which point the main body of the suffrage army is at variance with him. For one of his utterances especially, Mr. Wright earned the gratitude of all women who revere the true sanctity of marriage. He did say, as the newspapers have widely reported, that he believed the industrial freedom of women would decrease marriage and increase divorce, but he also said, what the newspapers omitted to report, "This does not frighten me in the least; it will be but a temporary effect. The increasing ability of women to support themselves will decrease the number of purely mercenary marriages. I cannot see much difference between the woman who sells her freedom and her soul in order to be supplied with certain conveniences for life, and the one who sells her freedom and her soul for a limited time for a renumeration; except that the former is infinitely worse. The ability of women to support themselves will also render it possible for them to take refuge in divorce, when the marriage relation is made the cover for hideous and indescribable cruelities. . . . As woman has the power given her to support herself she will be less inclined to seek marriage relations simply for the purpose of securing what may seem to be home and protection. Industrial independence, which will secure such results, must lead to the recruiting of the human race from the very best elements, instead of from the lowest, as is now so largely the case."

One of the speakers, not before heard at any of the annual conventions in Washington, Mrs. Ruth C. D. Haven of the District, is especially worthy of mention. Her address upon "The Girl of the Future" was a remarkable union of wit and pathos, in a comprehensive setting forth of the limitations and drawbacks with which the girl of the past, and alas, too many girls of the present day, have been and are condemned to struggle, in their endeavor to fit themselves for professional life, or indeed, to make themselves capable of filling worthily any position which commands the renumeration and respect which men of the same class are taught to strive for.

An interesting feature of this year's convention was the grouping of the reports of Southern work, and the addresses upon this department into one session. Perhaps the most effective part of this program was the report of Miss Laura Clay, the chairman of the committee on Southern work. Miss Clay's manner, her intense interest in what she was telling, and her fervid appeals for the interest and aid of the convention in furtherance of this work for the Southland, made a strong and deep impression.

Space forbids more than a mention of the other addresses given at the convention. "The Best Methods of Interesting Women in Suffrage," by Mrs. Ellen B. Dietrick, of Massachusetts; "Comparisons are Odious," by Carrie Lane Chapman, of New York; "Presidential Woman Suffrage by Statute," by Henry B. Blackwell; "The Present Political Status of Woman," by Harriet May Mills, of New York; "The Work of the Board of Lady Managers," by Mary S. Lockwood, member-at-large of the Board; "The World's Congress on Representative Women," by Kachel Foster Avery; and "The America Undiscovered by Columbus," the closing address of the convention, by Rev. Anna H. Shaw. These were all delivered to interested and appreciative audiences.

Lack of space precludes giving any details of the business of the convention, but it will be of special interest to the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL to know that at the final business session of the convention, a resolution was passed recommending the woman's lecture bureau, which is now under the management of Miss Lucy E. Anthony, at Somerton, Philadelphia, Pa.

A memorial service of exceeding interest, especially to those who have worked in this cause for any great length of time, was held in a convenient interim. So many of the friends of equal rights for woman have this year passed on, that it is possible to give only a mention of the names spoken with reverence and appreciation, and in testimony to the merit of their sacrifices in this all-embracing struggle for the uplifting of humanity; George William Curtis, John Greenleaf Whittier, Ernestine L. Rose, Abbie Hutchinson Patton, Francis Minor, Gen'l. Benj. F. Butler, Sallie Holly, Dr. Harriet N. Austin, John L. Whiting, Mrs. Jennie F. Holmes, Mrs. Isabella Hedenberg, Hon. Edward Eldridge, President Jonathan Allen of Alvord University, New York, Mrs. Lydia Emerson, wife of Ralph Waldo Emerson, and Rev. Anna Oliver,—these were spoken of in fitting words by A. G. Riddle, of the district, Frederick Douglass, Clara Barton, Henry B.

Blackwell, Mrs. Warner, of Nebraska, Rev. Anna H. Shaw and Miss Anthony.

There was much discussion upon the propositions to so amend the by-laws as to allow the annual delegated convention to be held out of Washington, D. C. As all know, who have watched the annual meetings of this body, it has been the rule to hold them at the National capitol. This was done with a view to influence National legislation upon the subject of woman's enfranchisement. According to the views of the older workers, this should continue to be the policy of the association, but among the younger element now making itself strongly felt, there has been demand steadily growing within the last few years, to have the conventions migratory.

Finally a harmonious settlement was reached by the passage of the amendment proposed by Mrs. Avery, a compromise measure, which provides that the annual meeting, which occurs during the first session of each Congress, shall be held in Washington, and leaves the association free to hold the alternate year meetings either at Washington or elsewhere as may be decided by the executive committee. According to this arrangement, the meeting of 1894 will be in Washington, and it is expected that there will be presented at that convention a number of invitations from various large cities asking for the convention of 1895.

EDUCATION VS. STRIKES.

The labor movement is feeling its way toward the light, as indicated by a resolution of the American Federation of Labor, embodying the conviction that strike and boycott having failed as weapons of organized labor, a campaign of education should be inaugurated by the federation. This shows an advance from the lower forms of warfare to the higher. The weapon recommended will prove correspondingly more effective, as the needle gun is more effective than the bludgeon. The order everywhere is "first the natural," that is, the material, and the coarser forms of matter have the initial trial.

There has always been more or less oratorical effort to reach and raise the masses. Now the downtrodden of ages purposes self-help, and announces the true uplift from within. Let monopoly and charity alike give room for labor to lift itself up and stand erect. It asks no other favor. Our workingmen have had noprecedents to guide them, but have been obliged to forge and temper and test their own tools for this work of cutting their way to higher ground. They are not less than others if some of their plans abort, and some of their methods fall short of what was expected. They are greater, if, having proved the lower range of forces unavailing, they acknowledge their fallibility and turn to something else.

It takes the best quality of mind to conduct experiment. Most of us are warped with prejudice. The natural sciences, which applied to common things, now place more comforts in the cottage of the mechanic than could be found in the palace of a king a hundred years ago, have waited from the foundation of the world for men to cast the beam of prejudice from their eyes in order to see clearly the rich gifts within reach. As a rule those who formulate and adopt a plan, support it to the end of their lives, however futile it may prove, so that "movements" are apt to run along in one rut for a generation until those determining that groove die out. The American Federation is indeed strong if its internal forces prove able to turn its course in the direction this resolution points.

The strike has come to be well understood. It inspires less hope on one side and less fear on the other than it used to. During the past year it has proved a terribly losing game all round, both at home and abroad. Notably the farther the scene from the centers of civilization the harder has been the outcome for the striker, as in the Australian mines, where the leaders were sentenced to two years at hard labor. The miners resisted the change from day work to piece work, and when they were supplanted refused to allow the new hands to take their places. For this violence they suffered.

The upheaval in the little mining village of Carmaux was discussed in the French Chamber of Deputies, and the Prime Minister became arbiter. The strike was settled but the controversy excited resulted in a ministerial crisis that nearly overthrew the Cabinet. Some prominent English journals urge the interference of the government to settle labor quarrels in that country, but objection is made that if on the eve of general election, the temptation would be great to decide in a way to catch votes. The Review of Reviews is of opinion that nevertheless "If it came to be regarded as a more notable achievement for a Prime Minister to settle grave industrial disputes during his term of office than to successfully conduct a foreign war, there would not be very much reason to regret such an evolution."

Probably more intelligence, grit and real manhood, if not more money, was involved in the trouble at Homestead than was ever before concerned in a labor conflict. The five months of its duration forms an epoch in the movement of which it is a part. The strike came to final test there under the most favorable circumstances possible. Congress, the governor of the state, the clergy and the press, religious and secular, in large majority expressed sympathy for the iron-workers. It was known that more sympathy was felt than these conservative lovers of order deemed it wise to voice. In the end, labor gains nothing to offset the fearful loss. True, the mill owners have been punished, but that which fills the maw of revenge can never be charged to the credit side of any account. The experience has been educative in itself, to both "boss" and "hand." Property owners had a chance to see what private military forces are not sufficient for, and peace-loving laborers had a chance to see that under the best conditions the strike promotes riot, and in the end no one is benefited. Brute strength has built up dynasties and crowned kings in the past, but steam and electricity have lifted the best modern civilization to the plane where finer forces operate with greater power.

Carnegie and Edison and Gould have not come from messenger service, work-shop and farm to their millions by conquest of arms. Brain, not brawn, must enter the lists with them for justice. There are many kinds of ferment in human nature. Certain habits of thought and action, ordinarily within control of the individual himself, favor the working of the leaven that enables a man to "rise" to high position. This is covered by the purpose of the workingman to substitute history and philosophy for the shotgun and shillalah. It is a great day for any of us when we see that our need is the unfoldment of something within rather than the acquisition of something without. It is often our reward and surprise that, the inward victory gained, all else is "added" without compulsion on our part.

Now let the "campaign of education" be broad and continuous; let it include ethics as well as philosophy. And the school of morals must be graded from the primary up. One man will pass on to the highest room, but there will be two to fill his place who need to learn the rudiments. This must continue while Europe pours her stream of ignorance upon us. Political economy, civil and religious liberty, temperance and purity, are unknown quantities to the average newly-landed. Some one is going to take him by the hand, either the philanthropist or the anarchist. He will go to swell the numbers and forces either of good or evil. Some one will win him to one side or the other. It will be the one who gives him the show of warmest welcome.

The education that leads the workingman to see that he becomes master of situations by being master of himself brings him into right relations with the allied movements for sobriety and purity as stepping-stones to the prosperity he rightly covets. He will support lectures, concerts, clean drama and libraries, rather than saloon, brothel, gambling-hell and variety theatre, because they will give him more pleasure. We hail our brothers in their new march. It may be long and toilsome, but it leads to victory. It will never be in the power of any "company" to keep the best conditions from the best manhood, as it is not in the power of any government or system to confer the one in the absence of the other.

THE wife of England's great premier, Mrs. Gladstone, has devoted her life very largely to works of charity. When a child, about five years of age, her mother and her mother's brother who was a rector of the parish, attempted to improve the moral and physical condition of the poor classes of Hawarden and vicinity, by a system of public schools. The scholars could be obtained only by prizes offered of clothing and etc., as a recompense to the parents for losing the services of the children. In this work Mrs. Gladstone was early associated with her mother and sisters, and it seems to have had its influence over her whole after-life. The following are only a portion of the philanthropic works in which she has engaged during her long life. In 1863, she and Mr. Gladstone started a refuge at Soho, whose object was to afford temporary shelter and assistance to persons out of employment, and help them to obtain work. It is now carried on at Westminster, with an industrial school attached.

In 1866, she provided a home at Clayton, for children left orphans by the cholera epidemic of that year. In this work she was assisted by subscriptions to the amount of twenty-five thousand dollars. Soon after, she established a free convalescent home at Woodford, for those recovering from any disease who specially needed change of air and scene. When our late civil war induced the terrible cotton famine in Lancashire, Mrs. Gladstone established the Hawarden Orphanage. Though the distress, which was the immediate cause of this work, has long since passed away, the Orphanage still exists, chiefly filled by boys who remain there and attend the parish schools until old enough to be apprenticed. About twenty years ago she established a domestic training-school for girls, at Notting-Hill, London, under the management of a committee of ladies. She has been less prominently connected with numerous other benevolences, and her friends say that her private charities are beyond number.

Miss Madden has now traveled 2,000 miles on horseback, in her search for the plant which is supposed to cure leprosy. It is reported that a recent cure has been effected by this unknown plant. A leper who slept in the field came in contact with it, and was entirely cured. Every effort is being made to identify the plant.

The following metrical version of Psalm 31 was adopted by the last convention of the Iowa W. C. T. U. as a state hymn:

To the hills I'll lift mine eyes,
Whence my hopes of succor rise;
From the Lord comes all my aid,
Who the earth and heav'n hath made.

He will ever be thy guide,
And thy foot shall never slide;
God His Israel that keeps,
Never slumbers, never sleeps.

God thy keeper still shall stand,
As a shade on thy right hand;
Neither sun by day shall smite,
Nor the silent moon by night.

One of the best sayings of that wonderful man and thorough-going, Christian great-heart, the father of Hannah Whithall Smith, was this, and she says he was never tired of saying it: "Whatever I do not give thee, Hannah, I am bound thee shall have a happy childhood tucked under thy jacket." She says her childhood was, as he purposed it should be, ideal in its happiness. Real happiness is a sort of religion, and not compatible with selfishness.

Miss Willard thinks that Jean Ingelow should be our poet-laureate. It would mark a forward step in the progress of thought if Queen Victoria's reign should be thus distinguished.

It is a long time since On Duty received a letter that pleased her so much as this one from dear Mother Thompson, the Hillsboro crusade leader. She writes:

DEAR FRIEND:—From the first mention of the Temple I have felt satisfied that it was an inspiration, first, because I could see that it was a necessity; second, because I believed in the woman chosen for the work. "Ignorance is bliss," 'tis said, hence I have been very easy as to all the bug-bears that have been, from time to time set up in the way, for I am not of a financial turn of mind, and consequently did not become alarmed at the immense cost of the building. Neither was my conscience smitten when large contributions were called for, but I simply have enjoyed that blissful faith which believes the thing will be done. But since I read in THE UNION SIGNAL (of January 19, 1893) of the glorious "signs of promise" that are being shown forth in Willard Hall at the daily prayer-meetings, my heart has been all aglow with the old-time crusade fire. And I have, by faith, seen the last dollar paid and the gift of God to the white-ribbon host signed, sealed and delivered by the hand of His faithful builder. "For of Zion and of this house shall it be said, This and that man was born in her: and the Highest Himself shall establish her."—(Psalms 87: 5, latter clause.)

One way at least in which reform sentiment is promulgated was illustrated by a beautiful woman, a New Jersey delegate to the recent convention of National Woman's Suffrage Association in Washington. She had named her baby girl Frances Willard, and the little one, when older, named her three favorite dolls in turn Anna Gordon, Mary Woodbridge and Lady Henry Somerset!

God is patient because He knows the end. He never changes His purpose and is always calm—undisturbed by tidal waves of opposition. So, we too, relying on God's unchanging purpose, should cultivate a calm, cheerful, unmoved patience in regard to all Christian work.

Dr. Döllinger, the famous German professor, has given expression to the following statement, which is doubly powerful coming from such a source: "Tobacco and alcohol are demonical powers. Smokers are barbarians. Tobacco smoking is the ruin of society, and of chivalrous conduct towards women. The tone becomes less refined; conversation suffers from it. For a long time I have avoided any society where smoking is allowed, and often travel first class on the railway solely to escape the disagreeable, unwholesome atmosphere."

MADAGASCAR MOVEMENTS.

Some very successful temperance lectures arranged for by our W. C. T. U. committee, have recently been given in this city, Mr. Kingzett, of the Friends' Foreign Mission Association, being the lecturer in each case. One lecture was given in the Silver Palace, in the presence of Her Majesty Ranavalona III and His Excellency Rainitaiareveny, and a large number of court ladies and gentlemen. The lecture was divided into three parts, and several friends of the cause sang or played in between, which added to the interest of the occasion, the Malagays being very fond of music. The lecture was listened to with great attention. At its conclusion the lecturer and the other foreigners, who had taken part, were presented to Her Majesty. Some pledges were taken by different members of the union.

In various ways temperance work here is spreading. One of our members who lives about a day's journey west of the capital, thus writes: "We had a splendid temperance meeting at Ambohidehibe, lasting from eleven a. m. to three p. m. The chapel was full, and the evangelist gave a capital address. Every one seemed stirred up to the greatest excitement. After the addresses people spoke. A notorious drunkard got up and told us how he had been in prison and used to go about in rags and dirt, but he had made up his mind to give up drink, and would sign the pledge, and his wife, too! There was a clapping of hands, I can assure you.

"Others told how they had lost their clothes and all through drink, and others said they had first taken to it through having a little given to them when visiting at people's houses. What impressed me most was that out of the numbers who spoke—pastors, teachers, etc., only two or three were able to say that they had never tasted any strong drink.

"The governor of Madagascar said he had been in the habit of drinking a little at meal-times, but he would sign the pledge now. We took about ninety pledges altogether, and formed a temperance society then and there. They agreed that they would have a meeting every month for fear they should grow cold or forget."

We are hoping that some of the recently started Christian Endeavor societies in this country will take up the temperance cause, and that many of the members will work among their friends and those whom we foreigners cannot reach. EDITH M. CLARK.

MARITIME LEAVES.

The city of St. John is founded on a rock and on the same solid basis is founded four W. C. T. Unions. One in the suburbs of Fairville, three in the city, each "faithful in a very little" and loyal to the World's W. C. T. U. Twice it has been the privilege of the Central union to entertain the beloved leader, and nowhere is the name of Frances E. Willard more tenderly revered than in this city by the sea.

Of the forty-two departments of work the Maritime W. C. T. U. has adopted twenty-eight, the St. John union twenty. The most successful of these have been evangelistic, prison work, coffee-rooms and kitchen-garden, with industrial schools, mothers' meetings, a woman's industrial exchange and employment bureau. The coffee-rooms are well patronized and proving a strong counter-attraction to the saloon. At a very large cost and with much opposition, this union erected a handsome drinking fountain in the most central part of the city. Until this was done the only places open to the public, where thirst could be relieved, were the drinking saloons. Now we have our coffee-rooms, where, at the cost of a glass of liquor one can have his cup of tea or coffee, with a roll and butter. And the "cup of cold water" is free to all.

The Columbian year was held in remembrance by a "Columbus tea." The tables did not "groan" as tables are supposed to murmur under the weight of good things, but they beamed with brightness and good temperance cheer. The center table in the commodious room had a novelty in the way of decoration. A large, bright yellow pumpkin was hollowed out and filled with bright maple leaves and autumn flowers. It made a brilliant centerpiece and was much admired.

At this table sat our esteemed temperance governor, Sir Leonard Tilley and Lady Tilley, his worship, the mayor, the high sheriff and other city dignitaries with prominent clergymen, editors and teachers. It was a representative gathering of all classes and denominations, such as one does not often meet except on a W. C. T. U. platform. The scene was most impressive when all rose at the request of the president, and united in singing the usual grace.

Bright, temperance toasts were responded to by the governor, the mayor, the sheriff, clergymen and leading editors. The last toast, "Our predecessors" was wittily responded to by a newspaper man who has become popular by his correspondence as the "Milicete philosopher." The Milicete tribe of Indians occupied this portion of Canada before it was settled by refugees from the United States in 1783. "MAPLE LEAF."

St. John, N. B.

THE BEGINNING IN NORWAY.

May the Lord graciously help this cause forward and give his wisdom, strength and love to work in it, but we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that it is a great uphill work. I think every country has its peculiar difficulties. We are very much interested, and indeed do wish to be able, if possible, to bring it forward. It seems just the time to make a special effort, as the last years the drunkenness has increased fearfully, also among young women. The quantity of beer and brandy has almost doubled the past five years. One great hindrance is that very few of the educated classes have any interest in the temperance cause; it has always been worked only among the lower classes, and it is as a new work to begin. May we succeed!

Our difficulty is how to work for the temperance cause and the new society, especially when there is very little money, and I can almost say, no temperance literature. The press is the instrument to break the hardness of heart and remove many prejudices, but to publish a temperance paper would not be of any help; very few would read it. They must first have it in drops before they take a spoonful, and then drink in the principles.

Our thought is now that we could perhaps combine two things; we have already several years worked here in Christiana, and the last year formed a Y. W. C. A. with several branches, but have not been able to publish any paper for the association and the work. We have, during the last two years, constantly prayed about it, and have lately had it laid very heavily on our hearts to begin next year, but we are altogether in want of means for it, and do not know what to decide, as it is for us a great undertaking, and we know it will be a great struggle to work and make it prosper. We want it to be a Christian paper for the Y. W. C. A., and an advocate for woman's work, which still is kept very low, and it could also be an advocate for woman's temperance work.

You will easily understand that we have the clergy against us, not only for temperance work but as preaching women, but we are quite willing to go on also in this cause in the name of the Lord, and hope that the necessary money may come in, as we both agree that with debt it is impossible to work. We have earnestly prayed God about all this, as it is a burden more on our shoulders, that instead of our union to go into a formed society we have been asked to organize.

If we had sufficent money we would start a monthly paper and then make temperance known; now very few have any idea that it even exists and it must be talked about first. The daily papers are against temperance, therefore it must be done outside men's editorial work. Oh, I do hope it so much! I have given my life and all my time to the Lord's cause and within that work is temperance. The work is dear to us all, and the society must have help if it shall be possible to work it up. It is all on common cause for the Lord and I feel sure that we have your prayers also for it. BIRGITHE ESMARK,

WORLD'S WAVE CRESTS.

MISS ACKERMANN was entertained at dinner by the Allahabad, India, Students' Association, when a variety of Hindustani dishes were served.

MISS PASH of the World's W. C. T. U., lectured in the Sanmarga Samaj Hall, Bellary, Madras, India, Dec. 7, on "What women are doing in America and Europe," illustrated by an account of Miss Willard and Lady Henry Somerset.

AT a meeting of the W. C. T. U., of Bathurst, New South Wales, not long ago, appropriate gifts were presented Mrs. and Miss Price, who for seven years, had devoted themselves to the work of the union, and were leaving for another home.

MRS. ELIZABETH WHEELER ANDREW and Dr. Kate Bushnell, will soon turn their faces toward home, via England, and will arrive in America in time for the International Congress for Men and Women, May 15, and the World's Temperance Congress, June 5 to 11.

THE Bible Almanac, by C. S. Adama Von Scheltema, of Arnheim, Holland, which has a sale of fifty thousand copies, contains the story of The Temple. This veteran temperance worker has a deep interest in "Our House Beautiful," and a substantial one, as attested by his investment in its securities.

FROM Mrs. Schnackenberg, president of New Zealand W. C. T. U:—"We have had a most delightful time with Mrs. Andrew and Dr. Kate Bushnell. Meetings were well attended and I feel sure good will result from their visit to us here. Every place included in their route will be benefitted by the addresses they give; workers will be encouraged and the unions generally, much strengthened. We are indebted to the World's Union for sending out such women to represent the W. C. T. U. in so many lands. It would have been of greater advantage could they have prolonged their stay."

LADY ELEANORE DICKSON, a white-ribboner and churchwoman and mother of Miss Beatrice Dickson, the philanthropist, writing from her home in Ofveras, Sweden, says: "The temperance cause is getting along wonderfully in Gothenburg. We have about four hundred members enrolled on our Ofveras books belonging to only our part of Orgrgte parish. I have read in the Gothenburg paper that the United States Congress has offered a grant of $5,000,000 for the Chicago Exhibition, conditionally that it is closed on Sunday and no spirits sold on its premises. If they can carry out such a desirable plan, it will be an example for the whole of Europe."

MISS Ackermann visited Calcutta on her journey round the world the second week in November, and addressed large audiences on the origin and purpose of the W. C. T. U. Her first appearance was on Sunday evening, November 6, in the Dhumtola M. E. Church, where she was greeted by an audience of nearly twelve hundred people. Miss Ackermann preached from the text, "Come unto me all ye that labor, etc.," and held her audience so well, that a large congregation remained for an after-meeting. She spoke on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, and on Thursday night gave a lecture on "Alaska, or the Land of the Midnight Sun." The days were interspersed with ladies' meetings, and the branch of the W. C. T. U. was reorganized.

FROM Mrs. Elizabeth Brentnall, president of Queensland, Australia, W. C. T. U.:—"Our dear sisters, Mrs. Andrew and Dr. Kate Bushnell, were with us before and at our annual convention much to our delight and profit. We were only sorry that they were compelled to hurry along to other colonies. Their visit has been a source of spiritual help and uplift besides giving us instruction and information. I wish we could have had them six months. They were unable to go at all to North Queensland, which very much needs the help such a visit would have given it. The work—ours—is most specially needed there, but we cannot get the women to sustain it. Climatic conditions and want of sympathy and interest have caused nearly every northern union to collapse. Very great financial depression causing removal of prominent workers has also contributed to this."

SOUTH CAROLINA.

THE "SNOWY SOUTH."

My news will be this time from the "snowy" instead of the "sunny" South. Our little state is robed in a strange new dress of white and about all that we can do is to try to keep warm and wonder at the snow. I meant to have sent you a regular Christmas report—for a little bird in the air had whispered to me of many things that was to be done down here, there and all about by the South Carolina W. C. T. U. at Christmas. I know these things have been done, and when we all get thawed out and the women send me their reports I will let you have them in full.

Spartanburg commenced its Christmas gifts by presenting to Mrs. Blake, our efficient local president, a copy of Miss Willard's "Glimpses of Fifty Years." Miss Sallie Carlisle, the superintendent of L. T. L. gave an exhibition of her little army one evening in the lecture room of the Central Methodist church. The recitations and songs did credit to superintendent and children. It is a true saying, "A little child shall lead them." I saw in the audience that evening, women who had come to hear their children who would not attend one of our other meetings. A nice collection was made to be given to our Southern assembly at Waynesville. A feast of good things in the shape of cake, candy, oranges "and so on" was given to the temperance Sunday-schools in the W. C. T. U. chapel.

Last but not least, one bitter cold day, two of us went in a phaeton loaded with all sorts of Christmas things, "over the hills to the poor-house." We can scarcely believe that it is the same place we visited for the first time some ten years ago. It is so much improved, and a county commissioner frankly says the W. C. T. U. must have the credit of the improvements, for it was through its efforts, that attention was drawn to the existing evils. Comfortable houses are now furnished for the inmates; men and women have separate apartments. In some cases we have found an aged couple in a room by themselves, homelike and at rest. This annual visit is made year after year by our union until now it has become a settled fact with the paupers. We are Christmas to them. They all vie with one another in getting their rooms ready for our visit. It is touching to see the sprigs of cedar and pine and holly with the cards and pictures we have given them on the walls. This year we were late in going to them and I asked one of them if they had not given us up and she replied, "Oh no! we knew you would come before Christmas was gone." We came home in the snow, but we never felt the cold, but we were so glad we had gone. Sisters, don't neglect your poor-houses. It takes so little to brighten the lives of those who must drag out the remnant of life there.

Mrs. McCown has been on a visit to the Beaufort and St. Helena unions. At Beaufort she held a meeting with the union. The special topic discussed was the W. C. T. U. home in Charleston. They asked, What do you think is best for us to do to help the home? She says she only wishes all the unions would ask her that question and the home would soon be ours. The Charleston local union leased the old Planters' hotel for a number of years; the last year begins in January. The expenses of this home is very great and unless the state union will take it as a part of state work, it will fall heavily upon the Charleston union. Mrs. McCown says: "We must buy that home." And I say, "We must indeed. All in favor will show it by the usual sign."

From Beaufort, Mrs. McCown went over in a small ferryboat to Ladies' Island. On landing, she asked the ferryman who that kind man was who had come over on the boat, and behold he was a bar-keeper. She had talked temperance all the way across and now she felt it was "scattered seeds by the wayside." She was met at the church by Miss Ellen Murray with a sister's greeting. She gave a short talk to the congregation and then to the Sunday-school.

Mrs. McCown was received at the beautiful home of Miss L. Town and Miss Murray, and as she heard of their earnest labors she could but think what a beautiful crown awaits these two consecrated women who have given their lives and their means for the advancement of the colored people of that section. She addressed a large crowd, and never in her long years of temperance work was she so impressed as she was when looking over that vast assembly of earnest listeners. The most of them were industrious farmers, raised and educated by Miss Murray and Miss Town. She visited the jails and poor-house, and found them in good condition.

Mrs. Sallie Chapin has been closely confined at home for some time by ill health. She has spent her invalid hours in fighting with her pen for prohibition.

Our state is greatly stirred at this time over what is called the Gary Evans Bill. The spring and summer was spent in trying to get men to vote only for candidates who would promise to work for temperance. By a very large majority the state voted for prohibition, and sent men, who in most cases, had promised to work in the Legislature for prohibition. We women stayed at home and prayed. The question has been decided for the dispensary law, and scarcely anything else is talked of now. It is discussed by all classes, and good temperance men and women disagree about it. It was introduced as a substitute for the prohibition bill which had passed the House. It was rushed through at the eleventh hour, signed by the governor and is now a law.

It is not what prohibitionists wanted or expected. One of our religious papers in speaking of it says: "It is the liquor business dignified, protected, monopolized. It is a powerful politic-liquor ring, and yet if this remarkable law can be enforced, the saloons will be closed and there are restrictions thrown around the business." Another writer says: "When I was a boy and used to shoot squirrels in high trees, I always knew that I had missed a squirrel if he lay still on a limb after I had shot. But when at the crack of the gun he jumped up and shook his tail and wriggled about I knew that I had hit him. The Evans bill has hit the whisky men."

Here are some of the leading features of this law:

Section 2. The governor shall appoint a state commissioner who shall purchase all intoxicating liquors for this state and furnish the same to the dispensers. He shall have a salary of $1,800 and a book-keeper with a salary of $1,200 and shall live in Columbia. The governor, attorney-general and comptroller-general shall constitute the State Board of Control, who shall prescribe rules for carrying on the liquor business and shall appoint the county dispensers.

Sec. 3. The state commissioner shall ship all liquor to the dispensers in packages of not less than a pint, nor more than five gallons, and the dispensers shall sell it in the unbroken packages and it shall not be drunk on the premises. This does not apply to lager beer and other malt liquors.

Sec. 6. Persons can manufacture wine for their own use but cannot sell it in this state except to the state commissioner nor ship it out of the state except by his permission.

Sec. 18 appropriates $50,000 to buy liquor and carry on the business.

Sec. 26 authorizes the governor to appoint constables at two dollars a day to enforce this law."

We can only wait and watch to see the issue, and leave it all in the hands of our Father.

MISSOURI.

NEW YEAR RESOLUTIONS.

"Oh happy house, where man and maid pursue
Their daily labors as unto the Lord,
Desiring only that what ere they do
May be according to His will and word;

"As servants yet as friends and brethren, too,
Their love with deep humanity combined,
No less in little than in great things true,
They serve him gladly with a willing mind."

The new year has arrived and with it the new resolutions are made, to do more and better work for the Master than ever before. Siftings from all along the line of temperance endeavor in our state, bring to view much that is encouraging. New members is the watchword for 1893.

St. Louis closed the old year by holding its most successful district convention. The W. C. T. U. of this city has made for itself, in the hearts of St. Louis people, a place which it never before attained. From being an almost obscure organization it has come to the front and is now a recognized force in ethical work of all kinds.

Each Sabbath, during the year, prominent workers have spoken at Jefferson Barracks to the garrison and have thereby influenced many of these soldiers to take the pledge.

Mrs. F. H. Ingalls, district president, presided, while our appreciated state president was the honored guest and efficient helper during each meeting. Reports showed an increase of knowledge in the work as well as heretofore unknown enthusiasm. The first day's session closed with a banquet at which over three hundred members and guests were seated.

After partaking of a bountiful supper, there came the intellectual feast of toasts and responses, Mrs. F. H. Ingalls, acting as toast mistress. In response to the first toast "W C. T. U., Organized Mother Love," Rev. Dr. George very truly said that the W. C. T. U. had adopted the good features of the banquet and rejected the bad and that he was surprised at the magnitude of the organization.

The second toast "W. C. T. U., Catholic Woman's Temperance Union" was a surprise to many as it is a young society. It already has seventy-five members in this city who wear a white ribbon with a small silver cross attached. Mrs. S. Sales responded to this toast and her speech was among the finest of several fine addresses. Rev. G. E. Martin very wittily responded to the toast, "Our Honoraries," and Miss Helen Peabody responded to the toast, "The W. T. P. A. and its Home."

The toast, "Frances Willard, Best Known and Best Loved Woman in America," could have had no better response than that given by Clara C. Hoffman. This delightful program closed with a recitation by Mrs. Mary Hogan Ludlum, "Sail on, and on."

The second day's meeting was devoted principally to department work, and the election of officers and superintendents. Mrs. F. H. Ingalls was unanimously reëlected, the members pledging that they would work more faithfully the coming year if she would again be their leader. On Saturday, evening Prof. Edward P. Perry, of Washington University, gave two selections, which were highly appreciated, as he is an elocutionist of rare merit. Mrs. Hoffman then gave one of her matchless addresses, and thus closed St. Louis' eighth annual convention.

In Mrs. F. H. Ingalls' annual address before this district convention of the W. C. T. U., she gave a brief account of how she with Miss Mekeel and Mrs. Adams, had personally visited some of the dance and concert halls in St. Louis. At once it was suggested that these three well-known and estimable ladies, in following the call of duty in their efforts to lift up the fallen, had made a similar tour to that of Dr. Parkhurst, of New York. Mrs. Ingalls said, "The places visited were terrible. In one part is the saloon, in the other side the theatre. Women sing and dance on the stage, then they go with the men into the gallery. This is partitioned off and curtained into very small rooms with two chairs and a table. Here they drink and make engagements for the night. The only pay they get is a commission on the liquor they drink. So you see, the more they drink the better their living.

"We were horrified. Witnesses were subpœnaed to go before the Grand Jury to testify against these dive-keepers. The Grand Jury found true bills against these places, but the assistant Circuit attorney, Mr. Jachritz, made a mistake in each indictment, although he had been Circuit attorney and had drawn up a great many correct bills, but in these particular cases he made mistakes. The next Grand Jury found new indictments and some of these men were tried and convicted."

If there is any line of work that needs pushing, it is woman's work for women. Springfield is doing excellent work in the purity department. Their home for fallen girls has been a soul-saving home for many a poor, erring girl.

The eighteenth W. C. T. U. district comprises five counties and has only two organizations, both in Bonne Terre. One of these is a colored union, and is in a flourishing condition. The White union has a membership of nineteen and is rapidly growing in interest. The local meetings are well attended and it is hoped enthusiasm may spread throughout the district and that before our next state meeting it will be fully organized as a district. The L. T. L. is growing in members and interest. On Christmas the local union, assisted by the L. T. L., gave an enjoyable entertainment and presented Mrs. Eliff, president of the local union and superintendent of the L. T. L., with a rocking chair. Literature, press work, purity, Temple work and narcotics are among the departments which are in the hands of efficient superintendents, and this union is doing excellent work.

The evangelistic department is receiving more attention in the state than ever before. Meetings are being arranged for in many places, and through the efforts of Mrs. Hall, our state superintendent, we shall be blessed.

Immense gospel temperance meetings have been held at Sedalia, Kansas City, Springfield, St. Joseph and St. Louis under the able leadership of Miss Jennie Smith, railroad evangelist for the National W. C. T. U.

Shall we hold a school of methods this year? The Missouri Chautauqua Assembly meets this year, and will hereafter, at Sedalia, instead of at Pertle Springs. The management of this assembly have given us a cordial welcome in the past, and an invitation to meet with them in the future. Will the workers who favor holding our school of methods and accepting this most earnest invitation, write to Miss Morris, that she may begin planning to make this a great meetings?

Mrs. Hoffman will be ready to answer all calls in Missouri after the first of March. Unions wishing her should secure dates as soon as possible. She has spoken to packed houses in many places in the state, and there has been a large gain in membership.

After the first of March, Mrs. M. F. Pitts, state superintendent of colored work, will be ready to answer all calls, and we are expecting this department to receive much attention this year.

Our new state superintendent of juvenile work is Mrs. Fred G. Udell, 1221 Taylor Ave., St. Louis.

MRS. MARY E. JONES,
State Reporter, Humansville.

NEW YORK STATE NEWS.

Chautauqua county W. C. T. U. held its convention at Sherman, and a fine report of it has been sent me. After the devotional exercises and the appointment of committees, a history of the first six years of W. C. T. U. work in this county was given by Mrs. Rose Putman. It had a very encouraging effect as it revealed so plainly the steady growth in the great and broadening work.

A lively discussion on the duties of officers was opened by Mrs. Almy, the corresponding secretary, which was full of ideas, advice and rules that are essential to the success of unions. The text, "Study to show thyself approved of God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed," seemed a wisely chosen motto.

A report of the state convention was given by Miss Bertha Knight and was gratefully received—especially so, when Mrs. Mead, the county president, stated that Miss Knight had deferred entering upon new school work in order to attend the state meeting. Miss Knight is about to take a course in the training-school for nurses in Buffalo, and her numerous friends wish her success in her noble calling. Miss E. U. Yates, of Maine, was present and added to the general interest of the occasion. Miss Blanche Hazlitt was also present and both of these workers spoke cheering and encouraging words. Mrs. Mead was presented with a beautiful gavel inscribed with her name, and although taken by surprise she was equal to the emergency and responded charmingly.

Mrs. Twing gave a glowing report of the Denver meeting in a carefully prepared paper entitled "From Chautauqua to the Rockies." She carried her audience with her from beginning to end.

The report of standing committee on the Temple fund given by Mrs. Danforth, of Jamestown, showed, after counting all receipts and pledges, an arrearage of one hundred and ninety dollars on the thousand dollars pledged to Mrs. Carse, of Chicago, for the Memorial Fountain. Several pledges were then given which reduced this amount materially and the outlook is for the liquidation of this debt before the winter is over.

During the second day, a discussion on scientific temperance instruction was ably conducted by Miss Lillian Phelps, of Toronto, after which Mrs. Mead presented a resolution which was adopted, to use our influence to support Mrs. Martha R. Almy in her candidacy for the office of school commissioner.

The convention, feeling great respect for the teachers of the public schools, sympathizing with them in their responsible positions and desiring to aid them, adopted a resolution petitioning the faculty of Fredonia Normal school to give more attention to scientific temperance instruction in the training of our future teachers.

Several interesting papers were read and the singing during the convention was especially fine. Miss Phelps delivered a telling address to a large and well-pleased audience.

Ithaca, Tompkins county, has recently had a series of meetings with P. A. Burdick for the speaker. All who know of his work will feel sure that a great awakening will follow these meetings. As is usual, no place was large enough to hold the crowds who came to hear him. Ithaca is looking forward to a new coffee-house which will be under the supervision of the W. C. T. U. A building is to be erected by Mr. Charles Kellogg, for the accomodation of lake passengers on the Kellogg line of boats and as the location will be much better than that of the present coffee-house, the W. C. T. U. will remove to the new quarters. Tompkins county, although recently organized, is booming and bids fair to stand among the first, for efficient work. Miss Vandelia Varnum has lately spent several weeks in the county with good results. The reports of her work are very gratifying.

In this county, much to the surprise of many of the politicians, a lady, Miss Ella Gale, of Groton, has been elected school commissioner. Miss Gale is preceptress of Moravia high school and also a white ribboner. She is the first woman elected to fill that office in our state.

In Medina, Orleans county, a union service of all the churches was held, at which time Dr. Myra A. Gillette delivered a very able address on the subject of "The Medical Profession and Non-alcoholic Medication." The Medina Register gives a fine account of the meeting and of the lecture, which contained many valuable points and suggestions, all based upon the best medical authority. Mrs. E. A. Bowen presided over the meeting and the various pastors assisted. The choir gave some excellent music which added to the general interest.

Erie county held one of its fine conventions at Hamburgh. A "president's conference" proved to be an encouraging and helpful exercise. The corresponding secretary, Miss W. E. Yurann, conducted a Bible reading in a new way on the topic, "What God is able to do." The welcome was most hearty and came not only from the members of the union, but from the clergy and from the editor of The Independent, who advised the women to vote on the school question, look after school matters, and be ready for full franchise in the near future. A report of the state convention, with music and recitations were given in the afternoon. In the evening Dr. Sarah H. Morris, of Buffalo, delighted the large audience who listened to her on the subject, "Woman's Influence on Public Opinion." Erie county is very proud of Dr. Morris, its vice-president, whom they call "our Mary A. Livermore."

A school of methods occupied the early morning session after which the routine work was carried forward in an able manner by the county president, Mrs. A. A. Shaw. During the session the startling announcement of the death of Mary Allen West was made and the program was set aside for a time while a beautiful and impressive memorial service was held.

A parliamentary drill was conducted by Mrs. Otis; Mrs. Williamson read an excellent paper called "Equipment"; Mrs. Taylor reported the National Convention, and six of the ladies made bright, spicy talks to the Loyal Temperance Legion who marched in with banner and song.

Mrs. Hawthorne made a report of the Silver Lake school of methods, which greatly interested all present and gave them a desire to share its benefits and privileges. Many interesting items must of necessity be omitted in reporting these meetings, but a "large and profitable gathering" was this Hamburgh convention, to use the words of the secretary. The next meeting will be held in East Buffalo in March.

The W. C. T. U. of Oneida, Madison county, has recently resumed some of its lines of work that were discontinued for a season. A temperance school which meets on Sunday afternoons in the Presbyterian church, opened with one hundred and ten pupils present, while subsequent meetings have had even larger numbers in attendance. This branch of juvenile work has been successfully carried on for more than five years. Last winter a young man who had been a pupil, was very ill but refused to take stimulants when ordered by the physicians, even when told that by refusing he was taking his life in his hands. He said to his mother, "If I am to die let me die sober." Contrary to the doctor's predictions he improved without the liquor, and is a well and useful young man to-day.

Mothers' meetings are in successful operation here, and a plan is now being formed for a series of union services to be addressed by the resident pastors.

A Demorest medal contest has been held with good results and a second contest is being prepared for now. The W. C. T. U. is hoping much good may come from these efforts.

Four of the unions in Niagara county held a one day conference at Pekin, which was a profitable and instructive meeting. In spite of bad roads and cold weather a goodly number were present, and the program was carried out almost to the letter. Excellent papers were read and discussed, and an able address by the county president, Mrs. Frost, was most thoroughly enjoyed. The question-box, in charge of the state corresponding secretary, who also gave a few "bits of experience," from her ten weeks' work in West Virginia.

A memorial service for Madam Willard was held which was very tender, a brief history of her life being read by Mrs. Carl, of Pekin. "Lead, Kindly Light" was sung to close this service. The choir rendered efficient aid throughout the entire day. A paper "Am I my brother's keeper?" by Miss Helen Fuller, deserves special mention.

NOTES.

Our state president, Mrs. Mary T. Burt, will in the future spend Friday of each week from ten a. m. to five p. m. at state headquarters, 30 West 23d St., New York City. This will be pleasant news to very many of Mrs. Burt's friends.

Mrs. Mary J. Weaver, state superintendent of evangelistic department, is at work constantly. She has recently spent some time in revival work in Buffalo and with the W. C. T. U. of Oswego.

A beautiful banner hangs in the state headquarters, the gift of Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, to the state which has introduced the department of scientific temperance instruction in the greatest number of local unions the past year. Much of the credit of this belongs to Mrs. Lytie P. Davies who has been very faithful and efficient in this work for the past four years.

At a prohibition social reunion and banquet held at the Columbia, New York City, the evening of December 15, Mrs. Burt represented the W. C. T. U. and responded to the toast "The Relation of the W. C. T. U. to the Prohibition Movement," and Mrs. E. Frances Lord to the toast, "Woman's work in Temperance Reform."

Many new unions have been organized since our state convention and the good work is going steadily forward.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

A SUCCESSFUL medal contest was held in Thomasville, Ga., recently.

THE state superintendent of juvenile work for Missouri is Mrs. Fred G. Udell, 1221 Taylor Ave., St. Louis.

A NEW union of thirty members, the second in Phœnix, Arizona, named the Willard W. C. T. U., was organized January 3.

THE state L. T. L. banner of Nebraska has been won by the seventeenth district for organizing the greatest number of L. T. L's.

A MASS-MEETING at Princeton, Ill., M. E. church was addressed recently by Miss Wintringer, the state superintendent of L. T. L.

MISS CARRIE LEE CARTER, Dexter, Mo., state superintendent of Y's, who has proved herself a valiant worker, is again president of the thirtieth district.

MRS. CLARA REIDER, Tipton, Mo., has accepted the presidency of fourteenth district. Mrs. Clark, former president, was obliged to give up the work on account of failing health.

THE Detroit Central W. C. T. U. issues a convenient form of pledge and invitation card, bearing the apt motto, "We mean to go straight on, we mean to be as good-natured as sunshine, as persistent as fate."

THE Malden, Mass., union celebrated its eighteenth anniversary, January 16, by a public meeting, which was highly successful. This union has two hundred members, who have unanimously reëlected Mrs. P. S. J. Talbot president each year.

THE flower-mission work in southern California is progressing finely, 3,000 bouquets being distributed last year and seven souls brought to the Kingdom. The department being a popular one, it was voted at the last state convention to make it an evening topic, and the state superintendent was invited to give the address.

THROUGH the efforts of the white ribboners at Port Matilda, Center county, Pa., the revised physiology has been adopted in the schools of their township and in use a year. Unfermented wine is used in all the churches, and petitions have been pushed. The Y's gave three silver contests, and are preparing the fourth. The L. T. L. gave a successful public meeting.

THE demand for the Quarterly Temperance Lesson Leaflet for December 25, prepared by Miss Lucia Kimball, was so great it could not be met at the last. For the benefit of those who did not secure the lesson leaflets for Christmas, and any others who may desire it, it has been revised and adapted to general use, and can be obtained of the Sunday-school department secretary, Mrs. Julia A. Bidwell, Deposit, N. Y.

MR. JAMES MCCASKILL, of Columbus, Miss., is a young man who has been of great value to the prohibition work of Mississippi, and one who has relinquished his mercantile business to enter the field for home protection against the saloons. Mrs. Mary McGee Snell warmly commends him as an aid to the W. C. T. U. workers of the nation, and he is prepared to go now to any part of the country to which he may be called.

HARRIET FRANCENE CROCKER (Mrs. W. E. LeRoy) a writer and poet, whose name is a familiar one to the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL, passed through Chicago with her little one recently on her way to join her husband in a new home at Santa Paula, Ventura county, Cal. She paid a visit to the Temple, whose beautiful interior and exterior found favor in her.

A SPLENDID temperance revival has just been conducted by the Streator, Ill., Y's under the leadership of James M. Dunn, of Milwaukee. About one thousand signed the pledge, many drinking men were redeemed, many who had been indifferent to the cause became aroused and about three hundred dollars was raised to carry on the work. Mr. Dunn is commended as an eloquent and tireless speaker, full of wit and common sense.

MR. DANIEL BANNERMAR, a former saloon-keeper in a town of Northern Michigan, became converted not only to the faith of the Baptist church, but to that of gospel temperance as well. He has dedicated his bar-room to this service, and now gospel hymns are sung and prayers are uttered in the room whose walls formerly echoed sounds in great contrast to those now heard. A good influence will go out from the place where the forces of evil held sway.

THE new constitution of the state of Kentucky empowers the Legislature, when it shall see fit, to provide for the establishment and maintenance of houses of reform for youths under eighteen years of age. The W. C. T. U. realizing the great need of such institutions, has appointed a committee to secure as much home-life as possible in these houses, and the chairman of the committee, Mrs. Frances E. Beauchamp, of Lexington, Ky., desires that all white ribboners in other states having such institutions would send her a copy of the governing by-laws, and any special information concerning the weak and strong points of discipline.

Official Communications.

IMPORTANT OFFICIAL NOTICE.

It has been extensively advertised that during the week of the "International Temperance Congress" of the Columbian Exposition, on the 8th and 9th of June (days assigned by the World's Congresses committee), a convention of the World's W. C. T. U. would be held: but after Miss Willard and Lady Henry Somerset, president and vice-president-at-large of the union, had left for England, the Gentleman's World's Temperance Congress Committee made a radical change. The time was lessened, but one day being allowed and that Saturday, the last day of the week. This has led to the following official communication, which we hope will be carefully read by every W. C. T. U. woman.

57 GORDON SQUARE, LONDON W. C., Jan. 19, 1893.

Dear General Officers of the World's W. C. T. U.:

After much reflection and conference it seems to a majority of the general officers of the World's W. C. T. U. that in consideration of the change of time and date for the holding of the proposed convention of the World's Union and for other reasons that we will give, it is far better to let the day set apart for the World's Temperance Congress be utilized by the World's, the National, and the Dominion W. C. T. U's in making as good an expression of our spirit, methods and plans as possible—and to hold the second convention, that of the World's W. C. T. U., next October, either just before or directly following the convention of the National W. C. T. U. In the first place, if the World's W. C. T. U. met in June, it could not legislate in a legal way, because it is authorized to meet only once in two years, and though it is the memory of several of us that we agreed to meet at the Columbian Exposition, with the supposition that such a meeting would very likely be in the spring, there is no record to that effect in the minutes of the World's W. C. T. U. held in Faneuil Hall in the autumn of 1890. If we meet next fall we shall be free to legislate in any way that is for the interest of the society and to elect officers.

Besides this, it is now evident that May and June are months in which we cannot so well secure the attendance of delegates from foreign countries. So far as we can learn, distinguished English women are not going over to the Woman's Congress, although Lady Henry Somerset and others are doing all they can to secure such attendance. May is the great anniversary meeting month in London. The Women's Liberal Federation League meets in that month, and Parliament will be in session through the summer, and great events are pending for temperance and other work in the action of that body. In the months of July and August the English people will be going over, and our "beautiful autumn," of which they have heard so much, will make them willing to remain to meetings at that season.

The men and women interested in the subjects that convene us are of the same type as those that will attend the religious congresses of September. This will be one opportunity to make a first-rate World's Convention; it will be a hundred times better in the autumn.

The proposition of the general officers of the World's W. C. T. U. is then as follows: That we do not change the date in the spring, but let it be announced as a day set apart to the World's and National and Dominion W. C. T. U's, but not as a convention. This will make no great change to the general public, but we should like to have this letter sent to every president and leader of the World's W C. T. U., so that it will be perfectly understood that the delegated convention is set down for October, say the 15th, and as many dates following that as may be necessary. This will be much more interesting to the World's delegates, as they will then see the National W. C. T. U. in its regular annual session.

With this arrangement, Mrs. Woodbridge, as secretary of the World's W. C. T. U. and recording secretary of the National W. C. T. U., would confer with Mrs. Buell, Miss Esther Pugh and Mrs. Stevens, and by correspondence with the president of both societies, as to a helpful, popular and attractive program for the 10th of June, which should adequately represent our movement at the World's Temperance Congress. It might be a delegated meeting but the delegates could not legislate; they could adopt resolutions of recommendation, make addresses, etc., and the general effect upon those gathered there would be worthy of the white-ribbon movement.

We think we have made the subject clear and will leave it with you, hoping that this change will be immediately announced in THE UNION SIGNAL and other leading temperance organs, and that this letter may be duplicated as we have said, and sent to all our leading women in the World's W. C. T. U., also to every member of the Executive Committee of the National W. C. T. U. We are confident that the other two members of the World's W. C. T. U. general officers, will heartily acquiesce in this view of the subject on account of the reasons herein set forth.

Hoping, praying and believing that we may have next autumn the best "feast of tabernacles" that the white-ribbon movement has ever known, gathering our women from all lands, we are yours with warmest affection,

WOMAN'S LECTURE BUREAU.

During the last week many new names of lecturers have been added to the bureau and it now includes the following talent:

Susan B. Anthony for February; Rev. Anna Howard Shaw for March and April; Frances E. Willard; Lady Henry Somerset; Messrs. Wolfenbarger and Huckins; Miss I. C. DeVelling; Sarah M. Perkins during March; Anna Gordon, the World's W. C. T. U. superintendent of temperance work among children; Mary Sparkes Wheeler; Carrie Lane Chapman; Clara C. Hoffman, New Jersey, in February; Lyda J. Newcomb, lecturer on vocal and physical culture, in vicinity of Lancaster, Penn., from January 30, to February 7; Lillie Devereaux Blake; Elizabeth U. Yates in vicinity of Washington, D. C., the last week of February.

On account of the postponement of the New York constitutional conventions, because of Columbian year, Rev. Anna Shaw may be engaged for March and April. As the state has cancelled the time, these months are now open for engagements.

For dates, terms, etc., apply to

Our Library Table.

In the February issue of DEMOREST'S FAMILY MAGAZINE, under the heading "Demorest's Editorial Flashes" are published over thirty prohibition paragraphs. These apart from their most commendable one-sidedness, are characterized by their cheeriness of expression. Pessimism never fights well. If editors all over the country would drop minor-keys and head the march with songs of victory, Victory herself would soon be in sight. The magazine in question has some sixty pages of good reading matter, but in this issue the best of all are the sentiments just referred to which appear on the last two pages.

Office of Publication, 15 East 14th St., New York City.

Everything about the World's Fair to date is magnificently illustrated in the EXPOSITION GRAPHIC of Chicago. Number 3 of the great series is just out, and consists of fifty-two large pages, with colored supplement. Fine views of the principal buildings are given, portraits of officers, illustrations of the dedication ceremonies in October last, including an imposing double-page engraving showing the ceremonies in the colossal Manufactures Building, with the largest audience under one roof in the history of the world. The number also contains fine representations of the principal groups of statuary and views of nearly all the state buildings.

The Graphic Company, Chicago.

Two of the leading articles in THE HOMILETIC REVIEW for February are "Training Men to Preach," by Prof. E. G. Robinson, D. D., of Chicago, and "The Pastor and The Inquirer," by T. L. Cuyler, D. D., of Brooklyn. The former is a thoughtful review of the ways in which preachers have been educated, the flaws or perfections therein, and a clear statement of the essentials in preparation for the preaching of the Gospel. Dr. Cuyler's article is simplicity itself but deep and strong and the thing needed to be read and inwardly digested by hundreds of preachers who have not yet learned the secrets of successful "altar work."

Funk & Wagnall Company, 18 and 20 Astor Place, New York.

THE MESSAGE AND DEACONESS WORLD, under the able editorship of Lucy Rider Meyer, and department editors, Esther Tuttle Pritchard and Margaretha Dreyer, is the organ of the deaconess' work, giving practical consideration to social problems, the aggressive work of the church, with especial thought for the neglected masses. It is a sixteen-page monthly of wide scope. The February number, among other urgent pleas, utters one for a National Deaconess' Rest Home. Besides reports of work from various states, contributed articles, editorial notes, etc., "Miss Toosey's Mission," by the author of "Laddie," is being run as a serial. This is perhaps one of the most touching missionary stories ever written, and will, without question, open the hearts of many who read it for the first time in this paper.

The Message, 229 Ohio St., Chicago.

Among the choice articles in the February ATLANTIC MONTHLY may be especially mentioned, "Under the Far-west Greenwood Tree," by Louise Herrick Wall, a sketch of a logging camp "ten miles up a tortuous river, full fed and brackish with salt of the Pacific," including the preparations for and cutting down of a fir-tree: "Two hundred feet of clean, shapely trunk without limb, knot or blemish, stretching across the road and far into the tangle of underbrush beyond; all the proud top torn and broken, lying shattered among tons of the tossed débris of its own green plumes." "Books and Reading in Iceland," by William Edward Mead, is a revelation to those who imagine the inhabitants of that ice-bound region to have a tithe of the book-wealth of the warmer countries. "Alexander Randall's Conversion" is a pathetic story, strong in portraiture, by Margaret Collier Graham.

Houghton, Mifflin & Company, 11 East 17th St., Boston.

The most homelike corner of THE PANSY magazine is the "P. S. C. E. Corner" where Mrs. Alden gathers her blossoms about her and they have heart talks together. There is the Pansy Society Pledge:

"I promise, for Jesus Christ's sake,
To do all the good I can,
To all the people I can,
In all the ways I can,
As long as ever I can."

Also, the Christian Endeavor Pledge, with its promises of faithfulness to Christ and His work, the Bible Band Pledge, which binds those who take it "to love His Book, and every day to read its words," and last, but not least, the Loyal Temperance Legion Pledge—"Trusting in God's help, I solemnly promise to abstain from the use of alcoholic drinks, including wine, beer and cider; from the use of tobacco in any form, and from profanity." Then comes the mother Pansy's letter to her buds and blossoms, the "Golden Text Thoughts," the "Bible Reading for March," the "Sunday afternoon" column, a budget of letters from the Pansies, the "Spelling Reform" and "Our Pronunciation Match."

OUR DAY.

February Our Day is a notable number. The frontispiece is a photogravure of Cardinal Manning from a late photograph, and is pronounced a remarkable likeness. In contributions we find "Jay Gould as Wrecker and Pirate," Wm. O. McDowell; "Scientific Temperance Education of the Masses," Mrs. Mary H. Hunt; "The Progress of Indian Education," Senator Dawes; "Allotting Lands to Red Men," Miss Alice C. Fletcher; Joseph Cook continues the Boston Monday Lectures, and gives the latest thought on "Sources of Infallibility in Scripture"; Book Notices give reviews of the best current books; Rt. Hon. Joseph Chamberlain expresses his ideas about "Municipal Institutions in England and America"; Commissioner Morgan writes on "Indian Citizenship and Education," and Miss Tsuda, of Tokio, tells us of "Japanese Female Education." Among the timely topics in Editorial Notes, are: Congressional Hearing on World's Fair Sunday Closing Law, Agitation for and Against Sunday Closing of the World's Fair, Suppression of the Social Evil at Pittsburg, Pa., Homestead Rioters Before the Courts, New Platform of the Knights of Labor, British Imperial Federation, A Daily Newspaper Owned by the Churches, and Mrs. Mary H. Hunt's Leaflets on Scientific Temperance Education.

A Sanitary Necessity.

A large per cent of sickness among women and children is attributed to the use of outdoor closets in cold weather. Necessity for improvement has led to many inventions; earth closets, etc., all comparative failures; they have been too complicated, too expensive, not odorless, etc. Our overcomes all objections. It is absolutely odorless, and can be set up, in any room having a chimney or stove pipe, by anyone. Needs no expensive plumbing, costs nothing to keep in order. It is indorsed by doctors and users, who say it is a

Boon to Women and Children.

Affords all the comforts and conveniences of the most elaborate water closets without deadly sewer gas. Particularly desirable for the country and small towns where there are no sewers. The effect on health is so great and the expense so little that every family should have one. Made of hardwood, panelled, finished in antique, with galvanized buckets—will not corrode—and all necessary piping, elbows and thimbles, complete, price $12. Guaranteed as represented or money refunded. We refer to THE UNION SIGNAL as to our responsibility. This commode is not a luxury; it is a necessity, and a "saver of doctor bills." Send for free descriptive pamphlet.

Rub In Rub Out is the way you wash clothes with soap. First you rub the soap in; that's work in itself. Then you rub it out again over the washboard. If your strong and rub hard enough, you may get the dirt out, too. It's hard work, and women know it. But it isn't the women only that suffer. She's wearing the clothes out, rubbing them to pieces, all the time. It's just as hard for every thing as it is for every body.

Soak In Soak Out is Pearline's way of washing. Put it in the water and it does its own work—yours, too. It brings the dirt out easily and quickly—no hard work, no wearing rub, rub, rub, no washboard. Doesn't that seem better? Saves strength and clothes. And, what some women can't believe, it's just as safe as any good soap. 377 JAMES PYLE, N. Y.

Manitou

MINERAL WATER.

It flows from the celebrated soda springs at Manitou Springs, Colorado, and is naturally effervescent. In the spring house it noisily churns and bubbles like a thing of life. The American Indians looked upon this as the one great fountain of life and a cure for all their ills. Hence they called it "Manitou Spring" (the Great Spirit spring).

People who use it for the first time exclaim,

"Such a Draught."

It hisses and bubbles when poured from the bottle, just as it does at the spring, being heavily charged with its own surplus gas. It should be drank with meals as a table water.

Publisher's Notes.

A REMARKABLE OFFER.

It requires no extravagant language to emphasize the offer which we make to-day to our readers in connection with the greatest educational enterprise of the age. This offer stands without parallel.

As announced on another page, 10 cents a day for a very short period will enable our readers to acquire a complete set of that greatest of all Reference Libraries, the Revised Encyclopedia Britannica. This work is beyond question one of the grandest monuments of scholarly research and patient endeavor in the whole realm of literature.

The first edition of this comprehensive work was published more than a century ago, and the last or ninth edition was issued about fifteen years ago. In this revised edition the Britannica has been condensed, revised and added to with the intention of adapting it especially to the needs of American readers, and at the same time bringing it within reach of the purses of many who could not possibly obtain the original work.

In the process of condensation, superfluous matter has been taken out in order to make room for a large amount of matter not to be found in the first edition, dealing with most important American affairs. This Encyclopedia, which we have the pleasure of offering to our readers, is the Revised Britannica, complete in 20 octavo volumes of over 7,000 pages, 14,000 columns and 8,000,000 words, printed on a fine quality of paper, from new type, and is strongly bound in heavy manilla paper covers, which, with proper care, will last for years.

The most wonderful fact in connection with our offer is that we send the entire 20 volumes with all charges prepaid, on receipt of only one dollar, and allow you to pay the other $9 at the rate of 10 cents a day for 90 days, payable monthly, thus placing it within easy reach of every one.

To encourage your children in habits of economy, and for that noblest of all purposes—economy for the sake of an education, we send with each set a dime savings bank, wherein a dime can be deposited each day. This is certainly a golden opportunity, and one which our readers should take advantage of at once.

THE BEST YET!

At this time, when all the world is anxious to learn about Columbus, we are glad to be able to announce that we have just issued the best, simplest and most accurate account of him and his discoveries that has been produced, entitled

Columbus, and What He Found,

BY MRS. MARY H. HULL.

Do not fail to secure a copy without delay! Very desirable for parents and teachers!

Prof. S. R. Winchell, Manager of the National Young Folks' Reading Union, says: "I am placed under renewed obligations to you for the beautiful volume "COLUMBUS, AND WHAT HE FOUND." This seems to me like a successful attempt to tell the story of Columbus so that a child will be attracted by it, and be interested in reading it. I hope it will be persistently pushed so that the parents of children will provide it for their sitting-room table. Where ten persons try to write a book nine fail to produce a work of merit which will endure. Mrs. Hull is the tenth."

THE FEBRUARY CRUSADER.

The Young Crusader for February is a number of special interest. It contains the first chapter of "Baby Christopher," the story of Columbus for the little ones, and its temperance stories are better than ever, if possible. We call special attention of L. T. L. superintendents and state W. C. T. U. papers to its supplement, which contains the latest advices relative to L. T. L. plans for the World's Fair, and receipts for the Willard Fountain Fund up to December 1. Haste is now necessary in order to have this work completed in time for the opening of the Exposition. If your L. T. L's are not well represented in that list, will you not make a special effort that they may have suitable showing in the next?

is only one day out, and passengers arrive at Denver, Pueblo or Colorado Springs early the second morning.

The "ROCK ISLAND" has become a popular Colorado Line, and the train above referred to is Vestibuled, and carries the "ROCK ISLAND'S" excellent Dining Car Service.

CALIFORNIA.

The fame of the climate of California draws to that charming state new friends every year, particularly from sections where long, severe winters, followed by trying spring seasons, work such disastrous results among the weak and debilitated.

The great improvements in passenger train service, higher degrees of comfort in the cars, and shorter time required on the trip, combined with the cheapness of the excursion tickets now being sold to California and back by the Santa Fé Route, make the journey agreeable and, one can almost say, economical. The many delightful resorts now established in California afford every comfort and luxury desired by the fastidious, and present unique attractions.

The Hotel del Coronado at San Diego, the Raymond at Pasadena, the Redondo at Redondo Beach and the hotels at Santa Barbara, Monterey, Riverside, Los Angeles and many other points, have grown as famous as any on the Atlantic Coast—and a fact that should not be forgotten is that they are resorts all the year around, although the greatest number of people from the East are in California between the months of November and May.

Write to John J. Byrne, Asst. Passenger Traffic Manager, 723 Monadnock Block, Chicago, Ill., if you are interested in California, and he will send you some reading matter.

FIVE HUNDRED CAR-LOADS OF STOVE POLISH.

The product of the two leading manufacturers of Stove Polish in the world, for the year 1892, would load more than ten trains of fifty cars each. Of this amount one firm, J. L. Prescott & Co., manufacturers of Enameline, produced 87,570 gross; and the other, according to published statement, 79,280 gross. Enameline has been on the market only about five years, and the fact that it has already outstripped all competitors, is an evidence of its wonderful popularity.

QUARTERLY TEMPERANCE LESSON.

The temperance lesson for Sunday, March 19, will be issued as usual as a supplement to the March Crusader.

READY FEBRUARY 15.

The Scripture chosen is Proverbs 23: 15–23. The lesson is written by Mrs. Helen G. Rice, whose work along this line during the last two years has given such general satisfaction. The theme is made more emphatic by the illustrations, which are such that they can be readily reproduced for blackboard work.

Send in orders early, that there may be no failure in filling them. We print a large extra edition, but if orders are delayed until the last minute we cannot always supply the papers to those who wish them. Let us have a grand rally on this first temperance Sunday of 1893, a fitting prelude to the temperance work of the summer, which will be extensive and wide-spreading in its influence. The lesson furnishes an excellent key-note for the times.

TERMS:

For 100, 65 cents; 500 $2.75; 1,000, $5.00; The Young Crusader and the lesson will be sent on the following terms: For 100, $1; 500, $4.75; 1,000, $9; 2,000, $15; 5,000, $35; 8,000, $48. All orders between numbers named at the rate immediately preceding.

CURRENT TOPICS.

The January issue of Current Topics has had a phenomenal reception, and the February number promises to be fully up to its predecessor in literary merit. "Ernest Renan" is the subject of an article from the pen of Rabbi Hirsch; "Municipal Government" is discussed by I. K. Boyesen; Will Carleton contributes a poem; "The Wolfsbane," a novelette by Edwin H. Lewis, is continued; besides, it has its full complement of University notes, books and contributors. Among noted writers, Mrs. Alice Freeman Palmer promises a contribution at an early date.

Sample copy, 15 cents; yearly subscription, $1.

Justice to All.

It is now apparent to the Directors of the World's Columbian Exposition that millions of people will be denied the pleasure of becoming the possessors of

World's Fair Souvenir Coins

The Official Souvenir of the Great Exposition—

The extraordinary and growing demand for these Coins, and the desire on the part of the Directors that equal opportunities may be afforded for their purchase, have made it necessary to enlarge the channels of distribution. To relieve themselves of some responsibility, the Directors have invited

THE MERCHANTS

Throughout the Nation to unite with the Banks in placing Columbian Half-Dollars on sale. This is done that the masses of the people, and those living at remote points, mav be afforded the best possible opportunitv to obtain the Coins.

THE FORTUNATE POSSESSORS

of SOUVENIR COINS will be those who are earliest in seizing upon these new advantages.

$10,000 Was Paid For The First Coin

They are all alike, the issue is limited, and time must enhance their value. The price is One Dollar each.

HOW TO GET THE COINS:

Go to your nearest merchant or banker, as they are likely to have them. If you cannot procure them in this way, send direct to us, ordering not less than Five Coins, and remitting One Dollar for each Coin ordered.

Send instructions how to ship the Coins and they will be sent free of expense. Remit by registered letter, or send express or post-office money order, or bank draft to

THE New Testament in Hindu can be bought for one anna.

MEMBERS of the Salvation Army are forbidden to use intoxicants or tobacco.

IT is stated in English papers that 1,113 persons have been buried in Westminster Abbey.

THE six hundred and thirty-two ministers of the Free Church of Scotland are total abstainers.

TWENTY thousand ships came into the forty miles of docks in and around New York last year.

THE kindergartens presided over by Mrs. Sarah B. Cooper, of San Francisco, have cared for over fifteen thousand of the street children of that great city.

WHEN it was found that the non-smokers continually took highest grade, while the smokers lost grade, the use of tobacco was forbidden in the public schools of France.

IT is stated by the secretary of the Railway Mission Christian Association, London, that ninety-five per cent of the seven thousand members of that society are pledged teetotalers.

THE United States government is blinded by the same argument as England on the opium question. Five million dollars revenue, from the drug imported into San Francisco in one year, assumes great proportions in the politicians' eyes.

DR. RICHARDSON, the senior physician in the Temperance Hospital, London, says that it is a remarkable fact that the patients who are non-abstainers rarely ask for their accustomed drinks. He says that the absence of the temptation seemed to lead to a moral revulsion against its use.

THE following is posted on the walls of the railway stations in and about London: "Public Notice. Foggy weather. Trains suspended. The Public is respectfully informed that during the foggy weather some of the trains will be suspended or altered in their working. Every effort will however be made to run the trains required by the traffic, but the company cannot hold itself responsible for any delay that may occur."

THE Earl of Kimberly, Secretary of State for India, in replying to a deputation from the society for the suppression of the opium-trade, excused the Liberal Ministry from carrying out the reform, by saying that the Chinese government is not compelled to receive the opium exported from India, but on the contrary is glad to receive the revenue from the sale. He also gave as an argument that a large number of people believed most decidedly that opium was not injurious in its effects, but rather beneficial. So blinded by the revenue argument does the Indian government seem to be, that there is danger, as some one says, of opium-eating becoming one of the beatitudes of the administration.

The Czar's Consumptive Son.

The Grand Duke George, the Czar of Russia's second son, was recently obliged to return from India because of serious pulmonary trouble, and has since that time been undergoing a very remarkable course of treatment in the Caucasian Mountains. The walls of his apartment are bare and unpapered, the furniture of plain wood, without upholstering or covering of any kind, while his bed has only the thinnest kind of a mattress. During the coldest weather, only a very low fire is kept up, while the windows are continuously open. This treatment has caused his attendants dreadful suffering, but his medical advisers hope by this means to destroy the bacillus and prevent the formation of tubercle, and they predict that in two years their distinguished patient will be restored.

Even should this very unusual treatment of consumption prove a success, it seems very unlikely that it will ever become popular. People in any stage of Pulmonary trouble, who have neither the time, money nor fortitude to have the disease frozen out of them, should interest themselves in the natural cure, by which thousands of persons have been cured of Consumption, right in their own homes. We refer to the Compound Oxygen Treatment of DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, which has been before the public twenty-three years, founded on common sense, inviting the closest scrutiny, and in the possession of thousands of such letters as this:

"DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.:—Your Compound Oxygen is all you claim for it, and more, too. Not only in my own case, but in W. B. Hinton's case it has done wonders. We were both given up by our friends and physicians as hopeless consumptives; to-day, after two months' use of your Compound Oxygen Treatment, we are almost as well as ever in our lives. Dr. Hicks, a friend of mine, tells me he has used your Compound Oxygen Treatment with the best results. Through the blessing of God it has saved my life and restored me to health.

L. A. PEACOCK, M. D., Smithville, Ga."

Persons with pulmonary trouble should lose no time in writing to Drs. Starkey & Palen, 1529 Arch street, Philadelphia, or Chicago, San Francisco, New York, and Toronto, Ont.

Desiring to give the admirers of Ivory Soap an opportunity to contribute to its literature, the manufacturers offered prizes for the best twelve verses suitable for use as advertisements. 27,388 contributions were received. To the following was awarded the

SECOND PRIZE.

THE printer's "devil," for a joke,
The office towel put to soak.
With Ivory Soap he rubbed it well,
And hung it where the sunlight fell;
So clean, so white, so fair to see,
The ghost of what it used to be.
The editor threw wide the door,
Then almost sank unto the floor,
Aghast at that unusual sight,
An office towel pure and bright.
"Explain yon mystery," he said;
The guilty "devil" hung his head
And cried, "'Twas only for some fun,
With Ivory Soap the deed was done."
The editor his sanctum sought
And penned this editorial thought:
"It ne'er has been our policy
To give a reading notice free.
We break the rule for Ivory Soap;
What other one can with it cope?
Our office-towel, black as night,
By Ivory Soap grew pure and white.
Its rivals all before it sink,
Since Ivory conquers printers' Ink."

SELF-DENIAL WEEK, APRIL 3-10.

Each white ribboner the world over is asked to deny herself something to which she is accustomed, and give the money that would have been used in its purchase to the treasury of the World's W. C. T. U., sending the same directly to Mrs. Ella F. M. Williams, 26 Chomedy St., Montreal, Canada.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

The annual Mardi Gras Carnival at New Orleans, La., began Monday.

The German Reichstag spent five days last week discussing socialism.

The Irish Home Rule Bill was introduced in the British Parliament by Mr. Gladstone on Monday.

February 12, the anniversary of Lincoln's birth, was celebrated in many cities by appropriate exercises.

The address in response to the Queen's speech was heard in the British House of Commons last Saturday.

The large exports of gold during the past week have attracted the anxious attention of American financiers.

The president of the Western Union Telegraph Co. for fifteen years, Dr. Norvin Green, of Louisville, Ky., died February 12.

The Pennsylvania Sabbath convention opened last Monday evening in the house of representatives at Harrisburg, Governor Pattison presiding.

Ferdinand de Lesseps and his son Charles were sentenced at Paris, February 9, with five years imprisonment and three thousand francs fine, the utmost legal penalty.

Dispatches from Brisbane, Queensland, tell of the great damages caused there by recent floods, which swept away bridges and submerged buildings, the loss amounting to $15,000,000.

A dispatch from Berlin last Monday states that most of the European powers have accepted the German government's invitation to an early international conference concerning cholera.

Last Thursday afternoon, the United States Senate and House met in the House of Representatives, at Washington, D. C., and after counting the electoral votes formally declared Grover Cleveland elected President and Adlai Stevenson, Vice-President, of the United States.

A committee of three senators and four representatives appointed by the Illinois legislature, guided by Mrs. Florence Kelley, and attended by a squad of newspaper men, started on a tour of investigation among the sweat shops and dens in Chicago, last Friday morning. The results of their examinations will be used in furthering legislation to remove the present evils of this system of labor.

The Allen line steamer Pomeranian met with a fearful accident in mid-ocean, February 4. A tremendous wave dashed over the ship carrying off the deck saloon, chart house and the captain's bridge. Ten people were washed over-board and drowned and two others, including the captain, were fatally injured. This is the most fatal accident that has occurred to a transatlantic steamer for many years.

THE Philadelphia Record is authority for the statement that, "at several bar-rooms in the fashionable part of the city it is now possible to get morphia cock-tails." Medical authorities assure us that, dreadful as is the whisky habit, the opium habit is incomparably worse, both from the greater moral degradation which it entails and from the greater difficulty of breaking the habit. We had thought that the saloon could hardly be worse, but this new device of the devil shortens fearfully the road between the saloon and the bottomless pit.

MR. AND MRS. JOHN G. WOOLLEY will sail in the Umbria, on March 4, for home, after a most successful and helpful temperance work in England, under the direction of Lady Henry Somerset. The English press has done justice to Mr. Woolley's high order of talent and original presentations of his subjects.

THE students of Princeton requested the faculty to do away with the custom of appointing supervisors at the examinations. The faculty have granted the request, and leave the students upon their honor, requiring them to sign the following pledge: "I pledge my honor as a gentleman that during this examination I have neither given nor taken assistance."

THE Long Island Railroad company has informed all its employés that the mere fact that a man drinks will be considered by the company sufficient reason for his discharge. The division superintendent of the Illinois Central in company with a policeman visited the saloons and gambling dens of Fort Dodge, Ia., and the next morning a number of the employés of his road who were found to be habitués of those places were discharged.

"ON earth, peace, good will to men" is the key-note of our World's and National department of peace and arbitration so ably superintended by Mrs. Hannah J. Bailey, of Winthrop Centre, Me. The fifth annual report is replete with information regarding the progress of amity and arbitration among nations and brother-love among the people. Surely "the blood-feasts of inhuman war will cease, and the trumpets of the nations sound the jubilee of peace" so long as such efforts are put forth.

THE children's fountain, a Columbian gift to the city of Chicago from the temperance children all over the world, is to represent, in bronze, a little child offering a cup of cold water to the passers-by, the overflow falling into a trough for animals. It will be executed by the noted London sculptor, Geo. E. Wade, and will be most charming to all beholders and beneficiaries. This fountain is to be a part of the temperance exhibit at the World's Fair, and the names of all donors will be recorded in a book to be kept among the temperance archives of the Temple. Such is the beautiful plan set afoot by Miss Anna Gordon, World's superintendent of juvenile work, and which can be carried out by the contributions of dimes from the children all around the world. Let every L. T. L. member, and interested little one send ten cents with her name as soon as possible to Miss Anna A. Gordon, Evanston, Ill.

THE National W. C. T. U. has met with another great loss. This time the death angel has entered the ranks of superintendents and removed the beloved head of the flower-mission department, Miss Jennie Casseday, of Louisville, Kentucky. The Savior's call, "Come up higher," came on Wednesday afternoon, February 8, and gladly did this "white ribbon saint," as she has long been honestly termed, respond. It is well known that Miss Casseday has lain on her bed from a spinal difficulty for more than thirty years and that she has for the past ten years carried on the enormous correspondence of her very important and well systematized department. The last two summers she has spent at the Rest Cottage Home for working girls near Louisville, enduring the agony of removal, although conducted in the easiest manner possible, with a Trojan fortitude. The extreme illness which preceded her departure lasted less than a week. Her body lay in her sister's, Mrs. F. C. Duncan's, home in a silver grey casket amid a profusion of flowers. The funeral occurred Friday morning, February 10, from Warren Memorial church, conducted by several city ministers. The pall bearers were the young men who carried her to and from Rest Cottage. We hope to have a fuller account of her life and translation next week. Her investment in life was princely; what must her heavenly inheritance be?

THE New York Voice contains an interesting account of the way in which Dr. Burchard's famous alliteration, "Rum, Romanism and Rebellion," which is generally conceded to have lost Blaine the vote of New York, came to be so quickly spread. John B. Finch was standing on the outskirts of the crowd; with no particular object he jotted down in his note-book the three R's. The next instant a hand reached over his shoulder and tore out the page from his book. He turned and beheld Dan Manning of the National Democratic committee, the leaf in his hand, making rapidly off with his prize. Manning went to the nearest telegraph office and soon the news was the possession of the entire country. One cannot but admire the quick-wittedness of the politician who saw at a glance what the effect of those words would be upon the Catholic voters of New York. At the same time there is abundant food for reflection that upon so small a matter hangs the fate of a Presidential candidate; that a few ill-considered words appealing to the prejudices of a part of the voters prove of more affect than all the issues of the party platforms.

MRS. HOFFMAN, Missouri's grand president, sends the following excellent suggestion: "Everywhere in my travels I meet the inquiry from W. C. T. U. women, 'How can we introduce more of the social element into our union?' 'What form of social meeting can we have?' There is no doubt that the W. C. T. U. is too grave to win its way among many classes of people. Our women are so 'dead in earnest' that some folks are repelled because they think there is nothing but solemnity with us. We need to multiply both private and public entertainments; first, to gain access to many people who are not with us now, but may be induced to come with us; second, to put money into our always empty treasuries. Some women and some unions are fertile and ingenious along these social lines. If all unions could know the pleasing and profitable entertainments that some unions give, could know the 'how' to give the same, there would surely come to them a most wonderful uplift in strength, popularity, numbers and money. Now to this end, every union that has had a pleasant and profitable entertainment, private or public, is urged to write out a description of the same, and send it to Miss Ella Harrison, Carthage, Mo., who will correct, condense and classify for publication in pamphlet or booklet form, that all may be benefited by the knowledge and experience of the few."

"THE World's Fair and the Death-rate of 1893" is the very suggestive title of an article in the December number of the Engineering Magazine by James C. Bayles, Ph. D. The article takes the ground that even with a most ideal sanitary condition in Chicago, the death-rate will be fearfully increased by this "great pilgrimage." Multitudes of persons who are physically unfit to endure the strain of such a trip will visit the Fair, and even among the strong and healthy a high rate of mortality will be induced by excessive fatigue, uncomfortable lodgings, bad food and water, the distribution of contagious diseases, especially among children, and exposure through accident or imprudence. The article includes the following suggestions to those who propose to attend the Exposition: 1. Determine whether you are physically able to see the Exposition, and can afford it. 2. Take with you none for whom you are responsible, without the approval of your physician. 3. Make it your first business to secure wholesome and comfortable lodgings. 4. Avoid excessive fatigue. 5. Eat regularly, lightly, and frequently, keeping strictly to plain and wholesome food. 6. Drink moderately and carefully, avoiding unknown and unaccustomed beverages. The article makes this further valuable suggestion, that while comfortable lodgings can be secured only at great cost if arrangements are postponed until one arrives upon the ground, persons of very moderate means can obtain wholesome and comfortable accommodations by availing themselves in time of the opportunities now offered.

PATIENCE.

(Pati—to suffer.)

BY ELLA GILBERT IVES.

Sweet Patience! who thy worth can sing,—
Thou plant whose root of suffering
In earth doth start?
Heaven hath no need of thee; and yet,
He who would Heaven win must get
Thee in his heart.

Thou growest best in rainy weather;
And like the humble Scottish heather,
Thy modest grace
Is lovliest when clouds o'er head
Pavilion thy lowly bed
And resting place.

Sweet Patience! in my garden grow,—
Thou dearest "treasure of the snow"
'Neath wintry skies!
Let other blossoms wait for spring
Or summer's gentle fostering;
From earth's hard bosom do thou wring
Thy fragrant prize.

THE CAMDEN READING CLUB.

A True Story.

BY ELIZABETH CUMINGS.

"What would I do if wakened at night by some one prowling about my house?" Mr. Josephus Blinn spread out his broad person to its broadest, "Why gentlemen, I'd arm myself, follow the sounds, and shoot the invaders in their tracks."

"Would ye aim to shoot 'em spang dead?" asked Amsi Dyer, a spare man with a tuft of hay-colored beard on his thin chin.

"Well sir, I'd have no scruples, though I do admit, my intent would be to cripple," admitted Mr. Blinn smiling condescendingly. "My idear is, however, that these fellows now a pervadin' this village are old hands, reg'lars as you may say, and mercy o' any sort 'd be quite thrown away on 'em."

"Wall, blessed be nothin," said Enoch Sutton, spreading out his thin hands before the fiery nose of the round, high stove that was the center of the group. Enoch could mend anything on the face of the earth, could make carpets and soft soap, and in his sect was quite a famous exhorter. "I don't expect they'll come to my house for my bank stock or my spoons, but if they could tell me where my boy Ab'm got a book I found yesterday out in the barn, I'd like to see 'em."

"Why my boys b'long to a readin' club, I think they call it," said Amsi Dyer bending forward. He invariably kept his hands in his pockets, which made his movements seem constrained, "and I thought your Ab'm had jined."

"He's spoke about a readin' club, Ab'm has, and I've give him a dime or two for it, off and on," said Mr. Sutton wagging his dry-looking head, "but this book didn't have anything to do about any club. It wan't the wust kind of a book," the father in him felt the need now of defending his son, "but it was about a pirate." The tone was of deep disgust. "I felt bound to know what Ab'm thought ought to be stored up in th' hay, an' I went through it kind o' skippy like, and I made out 'at th' pirate had killed some seventy odd, in cold blood, besides makin' no end walk th' plank, and that he had as many wives as Solomon, or a Mormon."

There was a brief silence about the stove. Mr. Blinn having no children yawned behind his hand, feeling somewhat bored. Into the heads of those men who were fathers of boys was coming a vague discomfort. Enoch Sutton though not much to look at, inspired his neighbors with respect. "I'd a felt bound to keep that book to myself, ef it want that sech things is like fire in dry grass," he went on. "Of course, I burned the book up, and I flaxed Ab'm, after I'd talked with him. But I got awful little out him, so I thought I'd speak of it. I ruther suspect that Dow Weaver, the post-office newsman, keeps the stuff."

"He ain't any too good," said Dyer, drawing up his long legs with a snap, "and," (again the prevailing interest took possession of him) "that makes me think, it was his wife's folks' house that was broke into last night. The thief clum up an old leach bar'l on the shed, an' into the back shed winder, and there he was, and he took all manner o' things, includin' a pair of big shears, an' a b'ar skin rug."

"It's sing'iar they've never been to your house," said Mr. Tolley, the owner of the grocery, at which all the village affairs, small and great, were discussed. He was a discreet man, knowing that to keep one's ears open and one's mouth shut is good for business. He now addressed himself to Mr. Blinn with great respect, as was due to the president of the leading bank, and the richest man in Camden: "I s'pose it's because they know you'd be liable to be prepared for 'em."

"I s'pose so," said Mr. Blinn pridefully, and drawing his handsome top coat closely about him, he stalked away.

It had been a trying winter. The burning of the Excelsior woolen mills had left many people out of employment, and the early closing of the canal had brought to want the improvident class who followed its peaceful waters for a livelihood. Coal and flour were dear, and the keen cold kept up a persistent demand for both. In February an epidemic of thieving and burglary had set in. The grocers dared no longer to make refrigerators of the pavement, and housekeepers lay awake at night tormented by fears for the cellar windows and the woodshed door. Money and silver were taken of course, but so were other things, as witness the shears and bear-skin rug. Sometimes a victim thought he heard something in the night, at least he so admitted the next morning, but a month had passed and the thieves were as yet in full possession, though Camden had two big constables and a courageous deputy-sheriff. If Mr. Blinn was as brave as he talked, Mrs. Blinn made no pretense at bravery, though she was the daughter of General De Kamp whose performances in the Mexican war had made him the great man of the county. It was indeed whispered at sewing societies, and at other gatherings where knitting needles clicked, that "Mrs. Blinn did not dare to say her soul was her own." It was also whispered that "with such a husband such self-assertion was unnecessary." The big white pillars of the De Kamp homestead made a fit frame for Mr. Blinn. His broadcloth was of the finest, his watch was massive, and so were his nose and his very double chin. There were acrid-minded persons who remembered when Mr. Blinn delivered parcels in a barrow for Bildad Scrann who kept a store of general merchandise. They recalled the fact that the old general had stormed over his daughter's marriage, and even hinted that Josephus was no such being as his manner seemed to convey, but they were felt to be lacking in public spirit.

Family resemblance is an illusive affair. At first glance there was little likeness between tiny Mrs. Blinn's blue eyes, flaxen curls and delicate figure and the dark, old general, whose portrait hung in the long drawing-room, but as one looked the likeness appeared. Hannah, the cook, who had lived in the De Kamp house thirty years, and Pat O'Finuken, who had lived there but six months, were like Pomp, the mastiff, perfectly sure that when the mistress spoke they must pay attention. Details happily escaped Mr. Blinn. It never had occurred to him that Pomp's feeble flop of his tail, when he spoke to him, as contrasted with his ready obedience to his wife, was a subtle indication of anything.

It was snowing fast when Mr. Blinn entered his house the evening after his visit to Mr. Tolley's grocery, and he found his wife looking very small and tired in the depths of an easy chair. "Josephus," she cried, before he could speak, "I am worried to death. Somebody has thrown meat into the yard. Pomp only got a little of it, but he's still a very sick dog. Patrick found one big piece, and suspecting something brought it in, and Dr. Hartson says it's poisoned, and he's poured something like a quart of of castor-oil down Pomp, and he thinks he'll live."

Mr. Blinn sank heavily down into a rocking-chair and listened wearily, while his wife continued:

"My opinion is the burglars intend to come here tonight, and I have got together all my dearest thing, the pearl necklace that belonged to Aunt Ann, mother's rubies and the set of topazes Uncle Jonathan gave me and my diamond brooch and finest laces, with the small silver. I want you to take the things to the bank."

"I'm almost sick, Sarah," said Mr. Blinn, putting his head in his hand and sighing, "and I should have to go after Mr. Jackson for he's the only man who can unlock the safe. Moreover, I might be attacked on the street, and it seems to me that sometime those fellows will go for Jackson themselves, and that valuables are quite as safe out of the bank as in it. I don't think you should worry. You have me Sarah to protect the property and—yourself."

The little lady slipped back in her horse-hair-covered chair, and looked at the fire meditatively. She did not say that she was assured by her husband's presence, though in all Camden there were few men as large as he. But she may have been. Silence is said to mean consent.

As the night deepened the storm increased, and the wind filled the spacious old house full of uncanny noises. Mrs. Blinn, when she had tied on her laced night-cap, slipped her precious bundle of valuables into a rag-bag, but even that did not calm her fears, and when she slept it was, as we say, with one eye open. About twelve o'clock she had her reward; Pomp, after a hoarse bark, set up a growling that indicated his mouth was full. Hannah was quite deaf; beside she slept at the back of the house. Pat, who was supposed to be asleep in the basement gave no sign.

"Mr. Blinn," cried Mrs. Blinn springing out of bed like a cricket, and giving her lord a sharp poke with her little fist, "Do you hear Pomp? Get up this instant minute!"

"I—'m kind of sick, Sarah. I don't hear anything unless it is the wind. You'll get the neuralgia. You'd better lock the door and come to bed," said Mr. Blinn feebly from the depths of the feathers.

"Lock the door! There isn't any lock! The man who owned this house once felt brave." The little woman almost sobbed, "Oh, Josephus, be a man. Father's sword is under his portrait, and his pistols are in the library."

"I feel dreadful faint, and as if I were going to have cramps," pleaded Mr. Blinn, doubling himself up a trifle tighter. "If you'll wait a minute—you are always so impatient—perhaps he'll go away. In my present condition I couldn't protect myself against a babe. I—"

Mrs. Blinn had now armed herself with the poker and a tall silver candle-stick, and rustled off in her thick dressing-gown and felt slippers. Pomp's long, snoring, savage growls filled the house; but as Mrs. Blinn, now armed with her father's sword, (still in the scabbard) entered the sitting-room, Pat O'Finuken entered it from the kitchen. Pomp held his prisoner fast by the trousers, and the tail of his coat, and he was—alike to the amazement of mistress and man, the chunky, rosy-cheeked son of Amzi Dyer.

"Why, Tommy!" exclaimed Mrs. Blinn, holding her candle high and dropping the sword, "Why,—"

"I'd a been here sooner me'm, but I was wakin' Mike Ryan a bit, wid th' Widdy McShane," cried Pat humbly to his mistress. "Faix, I seed the craytur's lantern in the cellar afoor I could find the kay, I was that flustered. Sure, me'm, I'm coortin' th' Widdy McShane, wid a nate property an' not a child, praise glory! Yes'm, an' Mike bein' brother to her first husband's step-feyther's brother-in-law, Nora said she must go for respict, an' seein' it's to a wake we all come at last."

"What on earth did you get into our house this time of night for, Tommy?" demanded Mrs. Blinn still holding her candle high, and paying no attention whatever to Patrick. Pomp still held the boy, contented to roll his big eyes about. It would be time enough to release him when ordered, he believed.

For answer Tommy put up his arm and burst into a passion of tears. "I wish, oh, I do wish you'd let me go home, Mrs. Blinn!" he whimpered. "Oh, if you will, I'll do anything! I'll run away to-morrow! I'll do anything!"

"I'll take him home, me'm," said Pat, "barin' your permission. I'm thinkin' he'd better be kept oot o' any other cellars to-night."

"Do so," said Mrs. Blinn after an instant, "and when you return come upstairs at once, Mr. Blinn is very ill."

It was not many minutes before Patrick was home again, and Mrs. Blinn had prepared a mustard plaster as big as the biggest turkey platter would hold. They found Mr. Blinn in the middle of the bed very red and sleepy. "Come Josephus," said Mrs. Blinn firmly, "there's nothing like mustard for cramp."

"I think I feel easier now," said he moving heavily.

"The pain will return unless the source of the trouble is reached."

There was no mercy in the pleasant, firm voice, and in another second Mr. Blinn felt himself suddenly under a a sheet of hot coals. "It's well, sor, ye wur took as ye wur," said Pat, when he had mended the fire and seated himself at the foot of the bed to watch with Mrs. Blinn the effect of the plaster. "There was Tommy Dyer in the sittin' room as big as life, wid Pomp a scrunchin' in the back o' him, an' whin I come along past Mr. Tolley's, I hears a great scritchin', an' I run in, or sort of bust in as ye may say, an' there was Ab'm Sutton wounded loike in the head wid th' top of gran'ther Tolley's cane, for that there young imp had got in somehow, an' was all loaded up wid plunder—a gold watch, an' thimble, not to spake of a dozen or two doughnuts in his clothes."

"Who discovered him?" asked Mrs. Blinn, as she noted that Mr. Blinn was squirming under the bed-clothes, and believing he was freeing himself from the mustard, rose and pressed it into place.

"Oh, gran'ther himself; an' 'twas a clip I tell ye; 'twas misilf wint for Dr. Hartson to sew up the hole, an' 'tis a wonder the screatch he gave at the stitches didn't wake up th' very slapers in th' buryin' ground. I holt him, bein' strong, an' sez I to 'im, sez I, 'A'bm, thim as gits a livin' by warkin' for the Auld One is bound to git his pay fust or last,' sez I; an' unless me head's a cabbage, Tommy was here on the same business, an afore to-morrow's night we'll be larnin' the names av the Camden boorglars."

The next morning Camden hummed like a beehive. Ab'm Sutton, whose head ached so very much he believed he was going to die, turned state's evidence, and disclosed the fact that the reading club had headquarters in an old canal boat far down the canal basin, and that there, along with something like a bushel of books never seen in any reputable book-sellers, was all the stolen property, eatables and coal alone excepted. Just why no father or mother had inquired into that queer reading club, and discovered why it was always going to meet at some other boy's home cannot be told. The parents did not like to think about it, for one and all were so very respectable.

It was a solemn time when the fifteen members were brought face to face with their fathers. Two ministers were present, also the president of the village and Dr. Hartson, who was anxious about Ab'm Sutton's head.

"It stheems dreadful to think of now," falteringly lisped Jack Wimple, aged fourteen and the youngest member, "but it wasth funny, and smart, we thought, when we begun, and not plain stealing at all. Dow Weaver said it wasth fun to have a thirculating library, and we each gave ten tsents, and had a book, an' met to discuss 'em last tsummer in our barn, an' when we read th' Stolen Ruby, or Magdalena Cadawaleder's Crime, we got up th' band. There wasth just such a band in that book."

Dow Weaver's news office languished after this, and in self-defense he had to go away, but Mr. Blinn, moved by reasons I will not go into, came out very strong for a public library, and gave a thousand dollars towards starting one, and offered to give the use of a second story of the bank building, rent free, for twenty years. There he finished off a room especially for the boys, and though ten years have passed and no new burglars have come to Camden to revive old memories, the juvenile reading is carefully watched. "Ye see," explained Enoch Sutton to one of the present committee, "young folks can take in badness as we take in malary, but there's this difference, whereas malary and them there mis'able, contemptible backsillusises you read about ain't visible to the naked eye, old folks know badness. Sometimes it seems to me the wust thing about growing old 's the kind o' wisdom we git."

As for Mr. Josephus Blinn, he has given three thousand dollars more to the library, and is esteemed Camden's most eminent citizen, and at mite societies, pink teas and such like places it is still whispered that Mrs. Blinn "don't dare to say her soul is her own."

REFORM MOVEMENTS: WHAT SHALL BE DONE?

BY REV. D. C. KELLY, D. D

Let us look first as carefully as short space will allow, to the question: Where are we? The churches have already, by resolutions, committed themselves to prohibition, moral and legal.

True, they say and do not, but they cannot stand in this contradictory attitude. The world will laugh them into consistency, or turn for moral and spiritual leadership to some other organization. Since there has been great practical advancement in the temperance habits of preachers and church people, we may reasonably hope that the churches will move forward to the right use of the ballot.

Next let us look to the attitude of parties. Many leading Republican papers have set down the recent overwhelming defeat of that party to the absence of any great moral issue to create and sustain party enthusiasm. Except the party take up either the prohibition or labor issue, it must disintegrate.

The Democratic party has gone into power with pledges impossible to be carried out, and the increased expenditures of the government will effectually prevent material reduction of tariff duties. They have no currency methods likely to give the people the increase of money demanded; they offer the laborer no substantial aid. The party is a negation on the two most important issues before the American people—and helpless on the third. The disastrous failure the party is sure to make in dealing with the tariff question, will go far toward frightening parties away from the tariff as a party issue and, we may reasonably hope, relegate tariff questions to the only wise disposition to be made of them viz. to a tariff commission. May we not hope that the Prohibition party will be the first to use this as the best thing practicable?

The People's party centers around a live issue and one which in morals and politics alike is destined to live; it will never down until there is a radical change in the present relation of capital to labor. Labor divided from prohibition on grounds of expediency alone, a majority of the party are Prohibitionists. The Southern wing of the party proposed in the last election to capture the Democratic party in a number of the Southern states, as they had captured Tennessee in 1890. To accomplish this they persuaded the convention, which met in St. Louis, to steer clear of prohibition. The same reason can never recur, there is therefore hope for a solid ground of union of forces between the Prohibition and People's parties. If this can be done without the least compromise of principle this is the best thing to do.

If these be facts as to the status of to-day we may look forward and begin to plan for the future. The Prohibition party ought certainly to press forward its efforts for organization more persistently than ever before; an open field lies before us. It alone stands for two questions of stupendous interest to humanity—Prohibition and woman's suffrage. The only other question of like importance in the political horizon is the labor question. This Prohibitionists hold in common with the People's party. It is manifest that the whole heart and brain of the Prohibition party should be put to work to formulate the ideal plank on this question. It is not difficult to get a better plank than any party has ever yet constructed; the question in its full import has just come to the birth; the best solution of the problems to be solved is yet to be suggested.

The Prohibitionist untrammelled by old traditions, uninfluenced by mere expediency, with thorough devotion to the right, has the best possible vantage ground from which to study the question and lucidly present the issue.

His pathway then is plain:—Hold by the two principles already announced; make a better solution of the labor and capital problem than has as yet been offered to the masses; retire the tariff discussions to a non-partisan commission; keep aloof from all entangling alliances; allow no party to use us for mere party purposes; hold to principle; promote organization, and—win.

For organization, Prohibition must look more than anywhere else to the W. C. T. U. There is to be found the most constant and reliable element in the prohibition ranks.

THE MOST URGENT NEEDS OF OUR COUNTRY.

BY JOSEPH RODES BUCHANAN.

"The greatest good of the greatest number" being the aim of good men, I would offer what I think would attain that aim.

The first and foremost demand of the time is the emancipation of woman, by giving her financial independence through industrial education and a more liberal public sentiment, which will, to a very great extent, prevent that marital unhappiness and marital despotism which perpetuate and intensify human degradation through coming centuries.

Marriages based on love alone will produce nobler generations. But the industrial education of woman implies also the industrial education of man; and a thorough industrial education, giving a full mastery of five or six lucrative occupations (which is easily practicable) would vastly increase our productive power and national wealth; would put an end to the enforced idleness which now impoverishes and demoralizes, and would thus contribute largely to mitigating the terrible and dangerous strife of capital and labor.

Moreover, the industrial education of both sexes is the strongest foundation for substantial virtue in society, and naturally blends with that ethical education which is to me the gospel of salvation for all humanity, and which I should have placed before all other things, but for the fact that it seems at present so far off. The cry for ethical education, which I have long been sending forth, meets but little response, as if it had gone forth into limitless darkness and silence.

Good souls here and there, benevolent and intuitive, do respond with enthusiastic expression, but the great mass of self-satisfied, corporate authority, of salaried labor, and of established institutions and habits seems to be utterly unconscious of the agonizing necessity of this ethical education to arrest the downward progress of society, its increasing moral and physical degeneracy, its vast increase of insanity, crime, dissatisfaction and turbulent unrest.

All the power of churches and governments exerted upon adults barely restrains the turbulent tendency to demoralization and universal ruin, and utterly fails to elevate, for statistics show that instead of elevation, degradation is the tendency of the century. That degradation is leading us, surely on to a time of social bloody convulsions and a carnival of crime, when mobs and not war shall supersede civil government.

Adults are not formed of plastic material, but infants are; they are absolutely creatures of their environment, ready to be developed into criminals or saints, Christians, Mohammedans, Buddhists, Nihilists or sanguinary fanatics, according to the environment that we give them.

What intelligent person would doubt or deny this? And yet, where are the intelligent people who take it home to their consciences and realize that they, as representing society, are responsible for all the crime and misery of the coming centuries? So little do these thoughts occupy the popular mind, which is led by a flippant or cold-blooded literature, that the whole subject of ethical cultivation and elevation for the young seems to rest in a dark twilight, where nothing is distinctly seen; and the brilliant example of the Fellenberg school and of several reformatory schools in America, England and France do not seem to shine through the cold joy of indifference. and penetrate the intelligence that controls our school systems, in which conservative officialism is the rule and progress the exception.

Yet through all the clouds that obscure the light to-day and through the smoke of the coming terrible conflicts which I forsee, I look to a future period of sunshine when the truths I have been urging shall bear rich fruit—for truth is ever growing as the years glide by—when an ethically educated race shall sustain a righteous government, when labor shall be steadily employed and well rewarded, and when both sexes, living in prosperous independence, shall unite only in love, and every family shall be a happy nursery of virtue.

It was with great pleasure indeed that I found sentiments such as I have expressed, appearing in a semi-official way from our national commissioner of statistics, Carroll D. Wright, in an essay in the Forum, containing the truthful expressions following:

While divorce may grow temporarily more frequent and marriage less frequent, as the industrial emancipation of woman progresses to completeness, the purity and the sacredness and the happiness of married life must be correspondingly increased, and the result must be that marriage will take place only when companionship in the holiest sense is intended. Industrial independence, which will secure such results, must lead to the recruiting of the human race from the best elements, instead of from the lowest, as is now so largely the case.

One of the greatest boons, and one of the surest prophecies which can be afforded as the result of the industrial emancipation of woman, will be the frank admission on the part of the true and chivilric man that she is the sole, rightful owner of her own being in every respect, that whatever companionship may exist between her and man shall be as thoroughly honorable to her as to him.

When children shall no longer be born in the atmosphere of selfish apathy or infernal discord, the dawn of the millennium will be approaching. The measures that I suggest are not only humanitarian and rational, but easily practicable and already demonstrated. The schools of Fellenberg, of Mr. Wietern at Hamburg, of Mr. Howe at Lancaster, and a score of others have fully proved that the most depraved youth can, with very few exceptions, be converted into good citizens, and that children of good parents can be reared to a higher ethical condition than their families.

Moreover, the industrial feature conquers every financial difficulty, for it was more than half a century ago that Mr. Rich, in his industrial school, demonstrated that during the minority of youth, their labor rightly directed, in connection with their progressive education, was entirely sufficient to meet the expenses of both their education and their subsistance; so that their education during their entire minority, would in the aggregate cost absolutely nothing, imposing no tax on either the parents or the state. And yet this most glorious discovery ever made in the field of education has been utterly neglected and forgotten; but I shall continue hereafter to call attention to this grand discovery, for it is to be the emancipation and redemption of posterity.

PRACTICABLE SOCIALISM.

BY REV. C. H. ZIMMERMAN.

There are socialists and socialists. There are those who are extremists in theory and method, believing that the entire program of state socialism is practicable and that it must be carried out by a violent ex-propriation of private capital.

There are those who are equally radical in theory, but believe peaceable methods will suffice; and there are those who believe that the socialistic program as a whole is impracticable; that private capital is necessary to industrial progress; that only those industries which have semi-public functions and the monopolies which abuse their power to exploit the people should be put under government control.

The limits of an article will permit only a brief outline of the program of radical socialists. Its fundamental principle is that all wealth is produced by labor and therefore, rightfully belongs to the laborers, that is, to the community in general as represented by the state. It is claimed that private capital is robbery; that it is acquired by the unjust appropriation by individuals of the products of labor, and that the state or community of laborers, should take possession of private capital, and become the collective owner of the land and of all the instruments of production, transportation and distribution.

In the work of production and distribution, the directing head is no longer to be the private capitalist. He may become a fuctionary or paid official of the state; but he is to work under the direction of a government bureau of industry and not according to his own judgment. Instead of stores for the sale and distribution of goods owned by individuals or private corporations, there are to be government warehouses, where all products ready for consumption are to be stored until workers of all kinds send in their claims on them, which claims are to be measured by the number of hours they have worked, and for which they will have received official labor certificates or orders, exchangeable for the goods they want. These labor certificates are to be the only money in the socialist state. Banks are to be abolished; both gold and silver are to be demonetized and used for other purposes.

Such in brief is the scheme of state socialism. That it is impracticable is obvious for several reasons. First, its fundamental positions are false. Labor is not the sole agency in production. Capital is an essential factor in production and is as much entitled to interest and profits as labor is to wages. Capital is not robbery. It is often the result of special skill and greater industry and economy than the majority are willing to practice; and in such cases it rightfully belongs to the individuals who have accumulated it. Its appropriation by the state would be unjust, and would take away the necessary stimulus to diligence and the development of skill. Extreme socialists are correct in the assumption that the nationalization of capital could only be accomplished by a violent exercise of the power of a majority.

Second, the principal objections to the state acting as the sole producer and distributer, are that it would require a vast and cumbrous system of state officialism, would endanger liberty, repress individuality of character and diminish production. Competition and personal interest are essential to the greatest activity and success in business. The socialist scheme proposes to destroy the first and would as certainly destroy the second. The government managers of industry would have no competition and none of the stimulus of personal interest in the gains of business, which now impel capitalist managers to intense exertion in pushing business, and in searching for improved processes and new inventions by which to increase production. The result would be less energy and skill in the management of industry and a smaller product than under the present system.

If, then, it would be impracticable and unjust for a state to adopt the socialistic program as a whole, the question is, What socialism would be practicable and just? In considering this question, we should dismiss from our minds the common prejudice against the idea of socialism. We should remember that Christianity, as originally taught and practiced, had in it an element of socialism—that of common property. The ideal of the Christian society, as taught by its Founder and practiced by His followers, was that of an equality of social conditions. There was to be no competition, save in doing the greatest good; no private property—the disciples had all things in common.

We should remember, too, that popular government—indeed, every form of government that is not despotic—is more or less socialistic. Any government for the people and by the people, as distinguished from government by a class and for a class, is socialistic. Many of our institutions and much of our legislation is socialistic. Our post-office is national socialism, pure and simple. The ownership and management of city water-works, lighting facilities, telephones and street cars, is municipal socialism. Every extension of national, state and municipal management in the sphere of industry, and all legislation to that end is socialistic. So are our arbitration and factory laws, our interstate commerce laws, the law against railroad pooling, the anti-option measure now before Congress, and all laws for restraint of monopolies.

The people who favor any of the above-named institutions and laws are socialists, and state or government socialists at that. The only socialism that is not of the government is coöperative industry, in which the coöperators are not aided by public funds or by special legislation. As respects industry in general, every government which does not adopt a strictly laisser faire, "hands off," policy is in some measure socialistic.

The tendency now in this and other countries is to a larger extension of state management in industrial affairs. The success of much that has been done in this direction shows that it is desirable, and indicates the lines of practicable socialism. It aims to improve the present political and industrial system, instead of seeking (as extreme socialists do) its overthrow, by either peaceable or violent methods. Instead of demanding the ex-propriation of capital, practicable socialism asks that government control the operations of capitalists within the limits dictated by public welfare. Instead of the nationalization of all land as the cure for land monopoly it proposes that vacant land held for the "unearned increment" shall be taxed sufficiently high to make holding unprofitable and force it on the market. This would be socialism, having for its object the welfare of the landless masses, and is as practicable as any kind of taxation.

Instead of making government the sole producer and distributer of the necessaries of life, its functions in this direction should be limited to those industries which are of a public character and those which are natural monopolies. The national government ought to own and operate the interstate telegraph and telephone systems. This might necessitate the purchase of the present plants. Their confiscation is not to be thought of, but if the corporations which own them refuse to sell on any reasonable terms Congress might justly require an appraisement, and force a sale at the appraised price.

The English government owns the telegraphic system of that country and manages it successfully and economically. Other countries own and work their railroads. This may be the final solution of the railway problems in this country. There are good reasons why the mining industries, especially the production of coal, should be under government management. We should then not have restrictions upon the output of coal, such as in the past year, for the sake of raising prices. But railroad and mining interests are so united that if either should be nationalized the other would have to be. There ought to be national legislation to prevent such oppressive monopolies as the Reading combine.

A further extension of municipal socialism is most desirable. It is generally limited to municipal ownership of water-supply. Cities might as easily own their lighting and telephone systems. The ownership and management of intramural railways would require a larger working force, but might be made a source of great revenue to cities. Nothing can be more shortsighted than the prevailing policy of giving away valuable municipal franchises to private corporations. If Chicago, for example, owned and managed its lighting, telephone and street car systems, it could make more than enough to meet all the expenses of the municipality. But it gives away these valuable franchises, and depends largely for its revenue, upon the license fees paid by its saloons, which are an unmitigated curse to the community. Could anything be more suicidal?

To determine what socialism, municipal or national, is practicable, there must be experiment. Even if the ideal of the radical socialist were the true one, which is more than doubtful, it would be a great mistake to attempt to realize it all at once. Try one thing at a time—the nationalization of the telegraph, for example. If that works satisfactorily the government might then be justified in undertaking the management, and perhaps the ownership, of the railroads, and so on to the mines and possibly to some other industries, the abuse of which by monopolies it cannot prevent.

ENGLISH WOMEN IN POLITICS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Liverpool has recently been the rallying ground for the members of the great Liberal party. Delegates from Scotland, Wales, Ireland and all parts of England have there assembled in their thousands.

The men have been holding their sessions in a large hall known as the Rotunda, while the women have assembled in the lecture theatre of the free library, where, sitting in a compact body they have utilized every moment in keen debate.

Since the "split" in the Women's Liberal Camp, new life, fresh air and more enthusiastic spirit have been admitted. The number of delegates has never before been so numerous anywhere inside the metropolis. Our May gathering in the Memorial Hall, London, is naturally the biggest and most important affair of the year, and women to the number of six or seven hundred will there assemble. But for a provincial gathering the one just held is the largest on record, the increase being more than threefold, so that two hundred and seventy delegates answered to the roll-call.

There was a time in the history of the political movement amongst British women when it seemed as if the tendency was for women to allow themselves to become mere political puppets of the Liberal party, but this danger has been overcome; the malcontents and retrograde members have seceded and now it is abundantly evident that, while loyal in every respect to true Liberalism, women are realizing that their true order of being is to be women first and Liberals second.

Both Mrs. Gladstone, the president, and Lady Aberdeen, the chairman of the executive committee, were unavoidably absent, but their places were filled by many other able women. Mrs. Broadley-Reid, the Hon. Secretary, took the chair, and in a statesmanlike fashion, reviewed the events of the past year, which have at the general election converted the Liberal minority into a majority and returned Mr. Gladstone once more to power. To this grand consummation women—by their labors in committee rooms, by canvassing the men electors, and addressing them at public meetings—have contributed no inconsiderable share; and it was a glad moment, when for the first time after the battle had been won, the women could assemble in mutual congratulation.

Speedily, however the delegates launched into business, and took for the first subject of discussion the "Reform of our Registration System and the Corrupt Practices Act." Mrs. Maitland, who for many years was a member of the London school board—that most important body which controls and directs education amongst five million of people—moved the resolution, and as an experienced politician drew attention to the many anomolies which exist. You in America can hardly realize a state of things, which on the household basis enables a rich man to have five, ten or even twenty votes, all of which he may have the opportunity of using in different parts of the country, for the reason that the elections spread themselves over a period lasting from ten to fourteen days. Strange is it not that this old abuse should still be tolerated in a free country, while all women are excluded from exercising any vote at all? But the Liberals are pledged to reform in this respect, and the women expressed, too, the unanimous opinion that the polling should all take place on one day, and that further, every public house should, for the time being, be closed.

Miss Whitehead, who for many years had served as a Poor Law Guardian, moved the resolution in favor of poor-law reform. She spoke from the depths of experience, but in cool, moderate fashion. There are now one hundred and thirty-six women serving in this country as guardians of the poor; and one woman, Miss Mason, holds a most important and highly-paid post under government, as the inspector of those pauper children who are so extensively boarded out in cottage homes.

I can remember the day, ten or twelve years ago, when women—just a few here and there—were timidly feeling their way into politics, and together with a friend I have not infrequently found myself one of only two women in a political gathering of men. But now all things are changed, we are no longer timorous, and we have passed, too, through the stage when, the pendulum swinging to the opposite extreme, we were apt to be too bold, rash and inconsiderate in our suggestions for reform. We have at length reached the true womanly stage of feeling and acting as responsible politicians who, appreciating the difficulties and dangers of any given situation, move with calm deliberation and statesmanlike foresight. This is the point of advance which has chiefly impressed me, when, after an absence of nearly two years, I found myself once more amidst my old Liberal colleagues.

The Chronicle, one of the leading, and certainly the most advanced and independent of the London daily papers, in a leading article which appeared next day, makes so notable a comment upon the proceedings that it seems worth quoting in full:

> Yesterday's meeting of the National Liberal Federation at Liverpool was of the nature of a good, hearty "send off" for the government, as the Americans would say. Side by side with it there was, however, another gathering—one of ladies with Liberal leanings in politics—which gave unexpected piquancy to the proceedings. We hope Dr. Spence Watson and his friends will forgive us if we say that the best men in this combined demonstration were the women. They were practical—intensely, we might almost say, fiercely practical—the men on the other hand were only political, and on some points a trifle windy and "viewy." Of course, yesterday's meeting was only the first of a series, and those that come after it may offer a more nutritious bill of fare for the hungry Democrat. But we have to report on the facts of the hour as we find them, and therefore we are compelled to say that so far as yesterday's proceedings go they indicate that the virility of real, as distinguished from mere party Liberalism has for the moment passed from the stronger sex to the so-called weaker.

Next day, by ten o'clock, we were again at our post, and Miss Riley, of Southport, opened the debate on the question, "Unequal Sentences at Our Assize Courts," where, judging by the verdicts, property is still a more sacred thing than human personality.

Mrs. Wynford Phillips, Mrs. Weinbolt and the writer of this sketch led a most animated discussion on the burning question of "Women Factory Inspectors." Mrs. Weinbolt is a member of the executive committee and a wage-earner, and she, together with other women direct from the loom, spoke with much force, and from practical experience, on the need for more inspectors. American women will be glad to learn that the report which I was able to present of my experiences in American factories with women factory inspectors, excited much interest, for the English women feel that in what their American sisters have succeeded, they will surely not fail. We were, however, each and all agreed that the inspectors must be bona fide wage-earning women, or, if middle-class women, they should qualify by at least five years' work in a factory.

The interest growing from house to house, now culminated as we reached the all-important and final subject on the agenda, the "Woman's Ballot." Of course we are all agreed on this subject, the point at issue being: How can we be both consistent Liberals, and at the same time suffragists, when the Liberal party as a whole is not in sympathy with our demands? There are indications not a few that here and there are some who would fain form a woman's party, pure and simple. At this juncture Lady Carlisle, who is practically the leader of the Federation, rose, and, in an eloquent and statesmanlike speech, urged the women not to divide the ranks of Liberalism on women's questions as the laborers are threatening to do on labor questions.

Time does not allow me to dilate upon this very vexed point, nor would it interest you if I did. But it is plain to the most casual onlooker that we, like America, like France, Germany, in fact, every civilized nation, are at the fresh parting of the ways, when the most ignored factors in the state, the woman and the laborer, will become the most prominent forces in politics.

The session having closed, in the afternoon we adjourned to Hope Hall, where a large audience assembled, and, re-enforced by Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Willard (who had come on from a conference in Leeds) a public meeting was held. Lady Henry moved, and Mrs. Wynford Phillips (an eloquent and rising young politician, the wife of a member of Parliament) seconded, the following resolution:

That this meeting pledges itself to work for Home Rule for Ireland; for temperance reform, including local option and the direct veto; for Welsh and Scotch disestablishment; for payment of members of Parliament and registration reform; for poor-law reform; for the extension of local government, including the system of district and parish councils; for the reform of the land laws, and for the establishment of international courts of arbitration. Furthermore, this meeting determines to use every effort to secure for women the right to sit on all existing town and county councils, and on such local boards as may be created; and lastly resolves to work for the extension of the Parliamentary franchise to women.

This was supported by Miss Willard in an entertaining and stirring address, enriched by anecdote and apt illustration, and also by Mr. D. Naoroji, the first Hindoo to be returned by a constituency to the House of Commons.

It was a grand and soul-stirring time, not even eclipsed by the mass-meeting held three hours later in the vast Philharmonic Hall, when Mr. Asquitle, the home secretary, spoke. During one point of his address he alluded to what he intended to do for women; and the liberal women—who lined the boxes and filled up the front seats of the hall—quickly divining what he meant, arrested his utterance with a perfect ovation. So much startled was he that he forgot to complete his sentence. But we are sure that he means to appoint women factory inspectors, and on deputations from the W. W. C. T. U., the Trades Unionists and Liberal Women will wait upon him to emphasize their desire.

It is worth noting that the two points which elicited the main applause at the great evening meeting, were the reform of the House of Lords and the granting to the people the direct control over the liquor traffic.

A WISE-HEARTED LETTER.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—During the summer months I did not get to see your welcome face regularly, being on the wing continually, and felt that my loss was great. But for the last three months my work has been of a local nature and it is with pleasure that I greet you every Monday morning as you emerge from the bag of the mail carrier.

Upon returning from Australia I chose Parkersburg, W. Va., as my headquarters and came here for rest after a year's continuous work. The Baptist church invited me to become co-pastor with the Rev. R. B. Smith, who anticipated holding special evangelistic services. Thus the door was opened into a field of labor during the winter months, when it is almost presumptuous for me to travel, occupy "spare beds" etc., though I did so last winter and was wonderfully preserved. For six weeks the meeting has been in progress and there are added to the church daily such as give evidence of being saved.

It is such a treat to be called from the field of battle into the "banqueting house where His banner over us is love." (Sol. 2:4.) We W. C. T. U. women are called to proclaim God's wrath which is upon the world, because of national sins, and it is sweet to stop awhile, mend our nets and do a little fishing of men.

God willing, I expect to travel in West Virginia during the spring months, having promised to give the summer again to Virginia.

An earnest, loving appeal comes from Victoria, Australia, for my return, but as I have not recovered from the effects of my last voyage, I do not feel led to do so yet. Should it be the Lord's will the way will be made plain. The W. C. T. U. of Victoria was delighted with the mission of Mrs. Andrew and Dr. Kate Bushnell. I have received a letter from Mrs. Wallace (wife of the United States consul) with so many good things in it that I copy a few of them for your pages.

Mrs. Wallace says: "In the plan of the World's W. C. T. U. to send out missionaries, messengers I would call them, I trust they will make no mistakes. I fear they will fail in the ends desired should they send persons to remain permanently. In India, caste distinctions are as prevalent and marked among the Europeans as among the natives, and missionaries are ranked as a very inferior caste. Our women who go should act as free agents, belonging to no sect or caste, free to go and be received by all, from highest to lowest. Our best, brightest, most aggressive, most advanced and liberal women are needed for this work; one following another, pouring new ideas fast and thick into these strongholds of superstition."

Dr. Emily Brainard Ryder, of New York, who went with the Pundita Ramabai to India, was in Melbourne when she wrote, trying to enlist the sympathies of the Australian women in the child-wives of India. She attended the W. C. T. U. convention and a resolution was passed making this a part of the social purity work. She is anxious to have them send some one from there to work in India.

The majority of American consuls to Australia have been a disgrace to the United States government, having been led away by the drinking customs of the colonies; but I am glad to say that Mr. and Mrs. Wallace have done much to make the name and credit of the country better than they found it. They have had the courage to hold two Fourth of July receptions without alcoholic drinks. Their dainty refreshments, floral decorations and music, called forth expressions of pleasure from guests whose brains were not disturbed by the drink.

Mrs. Wallace says: "I hold that wine-drinking is unpatriotic, un-American; it is foreign." Ninety-nine local unions were represented at the last Colonial convention, and Mrs. Wallace writes: "Though your resignation was received, and Mrs. McLean was elected president, there is no feeling on the part of the W. C. T. U. to give you up. They cling to you as to a mother, and to the hope that they may yet have you with them again, and elected you their honorary president."

Permit me through your pages to thank them for the honor conferred upon me, but can only repeat what I have already said, "The Lord will lead."

Have you seen their paper, The White-Ribbon Signal? It reflects credit upon the editor and others interested. There is much latent talent waiting development there, as in our own country, and a good paper calls it into service, as has been demonstrated by THE UNION SIGNAL, which should be in every household in the land.

Parkersburg, W. Va. M. M. LOVE.

A CHEER FROM MRS. YOUMANS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—"As cold water to a thirsty soul" so are your weekly visits to the invalid's room. You are ever welcome and yet at times you bring us sad tidings. To say that we sympathize with you in your recent bereavements, does not express the feelings of our hearts, for we too have lost friends beloved.

Madam Willard, like a shock of corn fully ripe, has been gathered home, leaving in her honored daughter a lasting memorial of maternal worth. In the removal of Miss Ames and Miss West, the declaration is verified that "death loves a shining mark." But their work was nobly done, and they have left behind "Footprints on the sands of time."

Miss Willard is winning grand laurels in the old world. She has revolutionized this continent, and now she is electrifying England. Well might the band in Exeter Hall greet her, "See the Conquering Hero comes." With her faithful friend Miss Gordon, and her noble colleague, Lady Somerset, what may we not expect? The liquor monopoly must be exclaiming "These women who are turning the world upside down have come hither also."

Never were the Stars and Stripes, and the Union Jack, so lovingly blended as at present. Nor were the lion and the eagle so regally caparisoned; while reined by bands of ribbon white in gentle woman's hands, they roll the prohibitory chariot smoothly over obstacles that hitherto obstinately impeded progress.

But when Miss Willard completes the tour of the British Isles she will have won a chaplet of the rose, the thistle, the shamrock and the maple leaf, in which the knots of white ribbon will shine brighter than the "kohinoor." Quoting from the memorable telegram sent by Madam Willard to the National Convention at Boston, Mass., I will close:

"As one who stands upon the shore,
And sees the life-boat speed to save,
Altho' too weak to take an oar
I send a cheer across the wave."

God bless you, sisters, beloved.

Toronto, Can. LETITIA YOUMANS.

REITERATION IN PREACHING.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The writer has been in intimate contact with many or most of the successful evangelists in England, within and without the Established Church, as also with those in America and on the Continent; and so far as he is aware, they all repeat the same addresses from year to year, some of them through the whole course of their ministry. I remember the remark being made: "Mr. Moody still preaches the 'Daniel sermon' that he has preached for twenty-five years."

Out of a number of addresses, a speaker finds a proportion which produce certain results, and, if he is wise, he will drop the less effective ones, and repeat certainly those more effective. Each repetition makes them more clear and pointed, both in expression and illustration. The familiarity with them leaves him at more mental liberty to concentrate his attention on his hearers, and to use those oratorical adjuncts which increase the effectiveness of speaking. More earnestness and emphasis can be thrown into an address which, from its familiarity to the speaker, requires less mental effort in the arrangement of thought.

What success the writer has had with multitudes in every country, from Oregon to Berlin, he attributes largely to having laid aside the personal gratification of variety of composition, and to having confined himself to the repetition to fresh audiences of those addresses which he has found most effective in definite results. It is the general experience of the evangelist that his own subjective experience, at the time of delivery, is no measure of the effect produced. The times when he most deeply feels a sense of mechanical repetition and failure and humiliation, are often those of most manifest success, judged by the results; while elation and joy in giving his message are often accompanied by the smallest impression on his audience. He that is faithful in that which is least is faithful also in much; and he that is unjust in the least is unjust also in much. If therefore ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches? Luke 16: 10 and 11.

The leader who has faithfully filled this column for years, has been running on nerve force too long—like so many zealous ones who see more of the world's needs in a day than an army of workers can relieve. At the almost imperious entreaty of friends and family, Mrs. Carse has sought the relaxing breezes of the Pacific slope in California. In a few weeks, with the vigor and restfulness of orange groves and roses in her veins, and the undertones of great sea-swells—calming like God's eternity—in her spirit, we expect to rejoice with her again in the Temple, and to find her ready for growing works.

In answer to Rev. Watson Tranter's postal inquiries scores of replies have been received to the following questions: How do you regard this coming event of the dedication of the Temple by our Christian women? Will you endeavor to arrange a gospel temperance service or services during February, March or April in honor of this event? The succeeding are fair samples of the responses: Rev. T. N. Barkdull, Toledo, O., in answer, says: "Dedicate it from foundation to turret, let it be as prominent as a saloon on every corner, a sky-high menace to the liquor fiend." Second question, "Yes, one every month until dedication." Rev. Joseph Cook, Boston, replies: "A strategic and inspiring triumph for woman's work for temperance. I have no church but will remember your request as I give lectures." Rev. D. C. Vance, Xenia, Ohio: "I regard it a greater event than the Columbian Exposition. It means more for the world of humanity;" and to the second question replies: "Most cheerfully I will." Rev. J. Myers, pastor of Ninth Street Baptist church, Cincinnati, Ohio, says: "As a good sign of the times and a splendid achievement of Christian womanhood. Rev. D. W. C. Huntington, Lincoln, Neb., answers: "A precious sign of the times." Rev. Geo. D. Herron, Burlington, Iowa, writes: "I believe the Temple a prophecy of better civilization."

Thrilling testimony is given of the "power of the spirit" manifest in the Willard Hall noon meetings. "There is no place in Chicago where I would rather be between the hours of twelve and one o'clock than in this hall," said one man. Some days the fast-falling snow has been driven by the wind in the faces of half-blinded pedestrians on the street, yet in the "hall of prayer" a goodly company has gathered. Said one man from a distant state, "I was led to the meeting because my wife is a W. C. T. U. woman and my little girl works for temperance. It seems like coming out of the storm and stress of life into the warmth and shelter of the love and care of God." "I want to thank you for inviting me to that meeting," was the earnest word of a strange lady to the leader. "My path was there made plain, and I learned God's plan for me." And in answer to the fervent prayers there are coming those who here find not only spiritual blessing—light, life and salvation—but here also friends have been found for the friendless, homes have been opened to homeless girls, work has been found for the unemployed. Many reformed men testify to the power of the gospel cure for drunkenness. "Unto the uttermost" is this salvation. Commander Ballington Booth will lead a meeting at an early date.

A good sister from Bardolph, Ill., sends two gold dollars found in her father's pocket after death; she writes: "They do no good hoarded away. I have thought there was nothing I would so much delight to give them to as the Temple." Another sister from Blunt, S. Dak., sends $2.50; she writes that she lives in an out-of-the-way place and she could not secure others to help fill her mite-box, she had no money of her own to do it with, but she had some old rags in the house and her little girl and herself went to work and made rugs out of them; these she sold for the $2.50 she enclosed, promising to send the balance soon. Will not the Lord be well pleased with such gifts? Miss May Robinson, Lumberton, N. J., sends $5.25, Mesdames Olinda Sly, Mary Vennum, Emeline Knox, Jane Parnhain, Morrison, Ill., each send $1.

Three dollars have come from the Findlay, O., Union, for the Whittier and Willard memorials; $1 from J. M. Barrington, Mt. Vernon, Md. and $1 from Miss Mary C. Boston, Cleveland, O., for Whittier clock. Mrs. M. E. Peel, Yankton, S. Dak., sends for Whittier and Mary Allen West memorials $2; from Mrs. Evelyn Graham, Newark, O., $1 for Mary Allen West memorial. Henry and Laura Thompson, Greensburg, Ind., $11.75; of this amount $1.75 is to be used for the Whittier and Ames memorials. The W. C. T. U. of Freeport, N. Y., sends $10 to the Willard window; also the following persons send amounts noted for the Willard window: $5 from Howard and Anna, Evanston, Ill.; $3.35 W. C. T. U. Pendleton, Ore.; $2 from the W. C. T. U., S. Rogalston, Mass.; $1 from Miss H. E. Palmer, Churchland, O.; $1 from Miss J. M. Barrington, Mt. Vernon, Ind.; $1.50 from Mary Gaskill, Minneapolis, Minn.; $1 from Miss Mary C. Boston, Cleveland, O.; $1 each from Mrs. B. S. Burnham, Waldwick, N. J., and Mrs. Jennie Gates, St. Louis, Mich., for the Abraham Lincoln memorial.

A two-cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, the Temple, Chicago, will secure a mite-box, descriptive card and bulletin; remember, all who fill a mite box ($3.65, before next April will receive a photographic group consisting of Lady Henry Somerset, Miss Willard and the founder of the Temple. All drafts should be made out in the name of Miss Esther Pugh. All matters pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Carse.

DIVINE SERVICE.

BY LOUISE MANNING HODGKINS.

The Master walked as evening shadows fell,
By Galilee;
He saw beside her pulsing ebb and swell
Another sea,—

A sea of upturned faces that He scanned
In loving quest,
If haply one among that chosen band
His power confessed.

"A lad is here," cried one, "with fish and bread
A scanty store."
"Bring them to me!" was all the Master said,
Nor wished for more.

Nor wished for more, yet wanting only this,
His work unwrought;
And weary, famished souls forever miss
A child unsought.

Ye who behold and fain would satisfy
The unsufficed,
Remember still beneath the sunset sky
Walketh the Christ.

Not ours to bless and break the living bread
In surplice clad;
But ours to find amid the throngs unfed
That little lad.

—The Golden Rule.

A LOST OPPORTUNITY.

BY VIRGINIA B. BASH.

It was a little town of perhaps not more than three or four thousand inhabitants, but it was a live town and an energetic town, and withal, a pious town. It had a half-dozen pretty churches, and a Y. M. C. A. building, and a gymnasium and a school-house for every few blocks.

Of course with all these advantages it was a temperance town. Scarce a saloon dared show itself, or if it did, it was in some obscure corner, and any respectable young man would have blushed for a week if caught in the vicinity. Altogether, it was just such a community as anxious fathers and mothers, seeking a healthy, moral atmosphere in which to rear their boys and girls, gravitate toward as surely as the needle to the pole.

As time went on the largest church in the town outgrew, or thought it outgrew, the building that had sheltered it for years, and by a mighty effort a new one was erected, handsome and fashionable—none too good for the worship of the Lord—no building can be that—but a little too expensive for the worshipers, and so a mantle of debt overshadowed it, which reached beyond the new roof and overlapped the eaves and tucked under the cornice. The original plan had been to retain the old building as a mission chapel, but under the new state of things it seemed inevitable that it should be sold.

The grief of the membership was great; the aged remembered the joys and the sorrows which had culminated within these sacred walls and wept to give them up; while the young and the aggressive, who gloried in dealing hard blows at Satan's bulwarks, felt that this was a step backwards. Still that dreadful debt remained and if a purchaser could be found, here was an easy way out of the embarrassment.

The citizens generally regretted the proposed sale. It was such a friendly community that what hurt one hurt all the rest, and so by way of compromise, an effort was made to raise the purchase money and dedicate the building to the young people for a reading-room and lecture hall, the whole to be under the supervision of a committee drawn from the various churches. For days the scheme was eagerly canvassed and then reluctantly abandoned. So much money had gone into the new church that no more could be done at present.

But although it was given up in the form proposed, one man caught an inspiration from the failure. He was an importer of wines and liquors in the city, who spent his summers in this delightful suburb, and now saw an opportunity to do a stroke of business in his own peculiar line. When the interest in the first proposition had somewhat cooled, he went quietly among the business men, expressed his sympathy with the debt of the church, and proposed that they should relieve it by purchasing the old building for a club house—an institution that so progressive a town could no longer do without. The idea was popular from the start, and the money quickly raised, not only for the purchase but for the necessary improvements.

A few months later the club was opened with all the éclat that beauty, fashion, brilliant lights, and choice music could bestow. A few joined from local pride, some from the glamour that surrounded the fledgling, and others from the love of sociability, but the result was the same in all cases. It was but the little entering wedge. Young men who had once been regular attendants at church and prayer-meeting no longer came within the sacred doors; wine drinking brought stronger liquors into good repute; saloons began to flourish on fashionable corners and Sabbath driving and racing were no longer exceptional. The whole tone of the place was changed and mothers who had looked with pride on growing sons now trembled for their future.

The church had missed her opportunity and Satan hastened to occupy the vantage ground.

DUMPING.

BY J. FOWLER WILLING.

The coal man "dumps" his coal. We understand that. Katie says she could not make her fire burn till she had "dumped the clinkers." That is plain English. But when we hear from the pulpit about "dumping," a tepid shiver creeps over our sense of linguistic propriety.

"We get everything by believing," says our evangelist. But the trouble is, our believing is wrong end to. We stare up into the heavens or tear around like the Baal priests on Carmel to get God to give us something, when the fact is, he has exhausted language to show us that he is trying with all his might to give us that very thing. We must begin our believing, not by taking in, but by throwing out. We must dump whatever is in the way, and then grace and power will pour into our souls like air into a vacuum. We will hardly need to ask. God is so ready to give.

There is praying enough done every day in the year to convert the world; yet the world goes on in its own bad way. "But we lack faith. If we had faith enough we could remove mountains." Yes, and the great question is, how to get the faith. Perhaps our evangelist's notion about "dumping" will help us touch the button that will send the electric spark into the Divine dynamite. Let us look at it again. "Throw out your sins and nonsense, and God's grace will rush in."

It looks reasonable. Two bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time. Good and bad, faith and doubt, cannot occupy the same place in the heart at the same time.

We are ill. The good doctors may talk learnedly among themselves; but they tell us common folk that we have taken in malaria, and we must get rid of it before we can get our health back. Their way of clearing the stomach and liver may be gentler than that of the old calomel and jalap boluses, but it is the first thing they set themselves to do.

Our teachers have more trouble to make us unlearn than learn. In music it is "bad fingering," in language "shocking pronunciation." "Dumping" has to precede the taking in of right principles.

This is emphatically true in religion. Our spiritual life begins, and goes on by the giving up of bad habits. Peter puts it plainly: Wherefore, laying aside all malice, and all guile,and hypocrisies, and envies, and all evil speakings, as new born babes desire the sincere milk of the word, that you may grow thereby.

Christian workers desire new graces. They read of Barnabas. He was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith, and "much people was added unto the Lord." A given result from a given character. How many thousands have been thrown into a tumult of prayer by that text! And yet the majority fail. Let us fall back on the "dumping" method.

We are Christians. We need say nothing about whisky, tobacco, Sabbath-breaking, hates, grudges, and the like. But have we no prejudices, dislikes, fears, doubts, whims, notions, that are in the way of the Lord's sweet grace? You haven't liked to hear Mr. A. preach since you were told the naughty thing he said about you. You "can't abide" Mr. B's interminable prayers, or Mrs. C's execrable singing, or to see Mr. D. take the collection with such an air, when he is really no better than he should be; and all along down the alphabet are those who have done you some small personal damage, the memory of which is like sand in the eyes or gravel in the shoes.

You want our Lord to come into your heart. Do you make ready for him? When you invite a friend you clear the guest room of all rubbish, all odds and ends of common work. Even the dust must be wiped from the furniture, the stale air blown out and the dainty odor of flowers brought in. If Christ delays his coming, instead of begging and begging him to come, and half blaming him because he does not, would it not be well to see if you have thrown out all pride and selfishness and love of the world? He said that if your hand or foot caused you to fall into sin you must cut it off and cast it from you.

A whim may hinder our faith. Martha's overdone sense of propriety would have kept our Lord from working his greatest miracle and giving her back her brother. She had a faint hope that Jesus would raise Lazarus, yet she objected to having the grave opened, the very thing that was necessary for the dead man to be called forth. She had to lay aside that notion before her prayer was answered.

When we make up our minds to "dump," it is not such a difficult thing to do. A good man was shown how wrong was his dislike of a brother minister. It took three mortal hours of prayer to get his courage up to the point of going to the other to be reconciled. The adversary insisted that he would meet an ugly rebuff. At last he seized his hat and rushed off to the duty as if it were the bayonet charge of a forlorn hope. Before his confession was half out the other grasped his hand: "You'll not get the start of me on that, old fellow. I've been ten times meaner than you have." The result of that "dumping" was a large incoming of grace.

Since hearing that evangelist, when a shadow falls over my soul, instead of "battering the gates of Heaven with storms of prayer," I look for something that ought to be laid aside. When that is attended to, it is easy to ask and receive. When we make up our minds to let nothing remain in our hearts that will hinder God's work, it is not hard to believe that He who shows us our faults, will Himself remove them if we consent and trust.

EDUCATE AGAINST WAR AND ALL FORMS OF CRUELTY.

BY GEO. T. ANGELL.

President American Humane Education Society.

I have no doubt the time will come when the great Woman's Christian Temperance Union will take the greater name which rightfully belongs to it, and become "The Woman's Christian Union of America, and the World;" a name which, while more effective to promote the special object for which the organization was founded, will cover all others into which it has since grown.

If this world is ever to be redeemed from barbarism and cruelty of every form it must come through the influence of woman, and there is no organization of women at present more powerful to redeem it than the W. C. T. U.

The attention of all nations should be directed to the Congresses to be held at our great World's Exposition at Chicago, where two of the most important questions to the progress of civilization and humanity will be presented, viz.: (1.) How can we stop wars? (2.) How can we humanely educate all nations for the prevention of every form of cruelty both to our own and lower races that depend on our protection and care?

I believe Ruskin was right when he declared that if whenever war threatens between two nations all the Christian women of those nations would put on mourning apparel, and wear it until the danger ceased, there would be no war. I believe, too, that if whenever war threatens between two Christian nations all Christian people in those nations will offer daily prayers in their churches, in great union prayer-meetings in all their cities and towns and in their homes, and call upon their fellow-Christians in other countries to join in their prayer, that the Almighty will be pleased to avert the great calamity, there will not be a politician in Christendom who will dare to stand up in Congress, Parliament or elsewhere and advocate war.

I am exceedingly anxious that from the Women's Congress of our great International Exposition shall go out an appeal to the Christian women and Christian churches of the world to stop wars between Christian nations; also that they shall throw their mighty influence into efforts to humanely educate the children of all nations for the prevention of every form of cruelty that now curses the human and lower races.

Boston, Mass.

In 1879, Mr. Gladstone in an impassioned appeal to the electors of Midlothian said, looking into the faces of the women, "I read before me the words, 'Peace, Retrenchment and Reform.' These words are connected with human happiness: and what a desert would be the world, and especially the political world, if we could not hope that our labors are addressed to the increase of human happiness. Therefore, I think that in appealing to you ungrudgingly to open your own feelings and to bear your own part in a political crisis like this we are making a no unimportant demand, but are beseeching you to fulfil a duty which belongs to you; which, so far from involving any departure from your character as women, is associated with the fulfilment of that character and the discharge of those duties."

THE WASHINGTONIAN PLEDGE.

A pledge I'll sign in tune and time
No drunkard I'll be, oh no, oh no!
I'll keep it true as one should do,
And I'll be alcohol's foe.

When I grow up I'll be at the top,
Some truly great person I'll be, I'll be,
But not by wine for the pledge I'll sign
And keep from alcohol free.

BY WASHINGTON'S MONUMENT.

BY ADA M. MELVILLE.

There were three of them and all three were ragged from top to toe. But they did not seem to mind that. Indeed it was rather handy than otherwise, for "nothin' kin hurt holes," as one of the three said.

Number One was a boot-black and answered to the name of Shiney. Number Two was a newsboy, and no one ever thought of calling him anything but Newsy. Poor little lad, he only had one arm. But he did not seem to mind his loss very much for he was heard to say more than once, "It's a good thing in winter—there's only one to get frost-nipped." Number Three was just a beggar. It was his regular business. He was too lazy to work, the boys said. They nicknamed him Scraps.

There they are, Shiney, Newsy and Scraps, a tattered little group, sitting together one afternoon in February, at the foot of a great stone monument that stood at the entrance to one of the smaller parks of the city. Scraps had found an old cigar and had lit it. The other boys begged to share it, so they all went behind the monument, out of the wind, and were "taking turns" smoking the stale, filthy stump.

While Scraps was waiting for the others to get through their smokes, he stared up at the tall stone figure above him, and when Newsy handed him the cigar, he held it up toward the stone face and said, "Have a smoke, old fellow?"

"Who is he, anyhow?" asked Newsy, "and what's he here for?"

"Aw!" cried Shiney, in scorn at their ignorance, "him's George Washington. You don't know much. He's called the father of his country. He lived an awful long time ago, and did somethin' or nuther and they've kep' his birthday ever since."

"What'd they call him 'father of his country' for?" asked Scraps, climbing up until he could clasp his one arm about Washington's foot.

"I dunno. Say! maybe Mister Patent Leather over there kin tell us. Let's holler to him. Hi, you, there!"

The little fellows were evidently not very well mannered, but their faces were merry and the boy who was passing on the other side of the street thought he would cross over and see what they wanted. Shiney called him "Patent Leather" because he had on a pair of bright, new overshoes, making the little lad feel as if his feet were very badly dressed indeed, since at least three red toes were out in the cold.

"What is it?" asked the newcomer. "I guess you meant me, didn't you?"

"Want ter know somethin' about this feller," said Scraps, patting the monument. "Shiney here, says he's the father of some country 'r other and has birthdays. Do you know any more'n that?"

"Oh, ever so much!" answered the newcomer. "Why, that's George Washington, one of the best fellows that ever lived. Don't you know about him? His birthday is day after to-morrow. I thought every one knew that. Tell you what! You come over to my house to-night and mother'll tell us all about it. Only you must leave that behind," pointing to the dirty cigar.

"There won't be any left to bring," said Scraps sadly. "Where d' you live? We uns don't often have swell invites. Boys, how are our dress coats?"

They thought this was very funny and laughed loud and long. But the boy with the new overshoes told them not to bother about dress and gave them his street and number. "Be on hand at eight sharp. If you want to you can bring some more fellows with you. Got any sisters? Bring them too."

Andrew Gardner, for that was Mr. Patent Leather's real name, had a good home and he knew exactly what he was about when he invited the boys to visit it, for did not his father and mother live to help just such boys?

At eight o'clock the door bell rang. Andrew opened the door himself and there was a little company of ten, five boys and five girls.

When Mrs. Gardner came in they were a little shy, but she shook hands all around, asked them their names and seemed to know just how to make them feel "at home." After they had all talked together for a little, she sat down to tell them the promised story about the man whose statue stood two blocks away and whose birthday all the United States would celebrate in a few days. It was a splendid story. All THE UNION SIGNAL boys and girls must surely know it, but these children did not. A few of them had heard a little about Blaine and Harrison and Bidwell and Cleveland, for they heard them talked about on the streets, but somehow they had not heard about this great man who did so much to help our beloved country to her freedom and who was her first president.

Just as the story was closing, Andrew slipped out of the room and came back with a flag which he carried proudly. Newsy was a very patriotic little fellow, and when he saw the stars and stripes he sprang to his feet with a loud "hoo*ray!*" in which all the rest joined. When they were quiet again, Mrs. Gardner, standing beside the flag said, "Boys and girls, this flag means our country—our country—yours and Andrew's and mine; the country, men fought and died for; the country George Washington did so much for. Do you love her?"

They only knew what we call "street words," so when Scraps answered, "You bet!" Mrs. Gardner knew it was his way of saying "yes," very hard.

"Then you can all do something to help her? George Washington was a boy once."

"But we's only girls!" wailed out one of the little sisters.

"Guess sisters are good for heaps," spoke up Shiney quickly. "Mother uster say women had a sight to do with makin' good men." (Poor Shiney's mother was dead and he had not been as good a boy since.)

"We're good for lots," said another girl. "Guess we like our country as well as the boys!"

"Indeed we do," answered Mrs. Gardner, "and our country needs us all. How many would want her to be proud of them? How many want to be as good and honest and brave as George Washington, even though they cannot do the things he did?

"Did he swear?" interrupted Scraps.

"Naw!" said Shiney. "Good men never do—nor smoke neither,—real good ones, I know!"

"Well, children, how many of you are bound to make the dear country proud of you?"

"Don't just see how I kin, but I'll start in," volunteered Scraps; "I kin quit smokin' and chewin' 't any rate."

"'N I won't steal peanuts off'n old Sallie Ann's stand," said another.

"What kin I do?" ventured a timid little girl who clung to Shiney's hand as if she was afraid she'd lose him.

"I'll tell you what we can all do, children," Mrs. Gardner was speaking now. "It was our Heavenly Father who made George Washington the good man he was, and if we'll try to be like His son, Jesus Christ, we can each one be as good and brave as Washington, and if our country needs us we'll be all ready; see?"

Of course they "saw" for though they were dressed in rags and had lived on the streets most of their lives, they were bright, sensible little Americans after all, and could see through anything reasonable.

It ended in their all kneeling down while Mrs. Gardner talked with the Father in heaven for them—the only father most of them had. They were all invited to be at the pleasant home one week from that night and report progress.

There is only room to tell of one more thing that happened. It was very early on the morning of Washington's birthday—so early the stars were not all gone from sight, and the great city was not fully awake. Through the half light three little figures could be seen hurrying to the monument. They were Newsy and Scraps and Shiney. They called this their "mass-meeting in the interest of the country." First, Scraps hurled away his basket, declaring solemnly he was never going to beg again, but would go into partnership with Newsy, and "be another arm for him." Then Newsy turned his pockets inside out and stamped into the snow, grinding it down with his heels, some tobacco he had had there to chew. Then they made a funny ceremony, with their ragged caps in their hands, of dropping forever the old streets names, "so as to be somebody." Their real names were Willis, and Thomas, and Albert, though they had almost forgotten them. Lastly, they threw up their caps, cheered three cheers and a very fierce "tiger" for "George," wished him "many returns of the day," and then ran away to their "business," happier and better boys than they had ever been before.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—Among all the things which you will learn the coming anniversary of "the Father of His Country," beloved George Washington, there is one trait which I wish to impress upon you all. This was his power of self-control. You all know what it is to be angry, to be carried away by a fit of passion and to do things which you would never do if you were not blinded by rage. Washington's anger, when aroused, was so terrible that strong men were said to be cowed by it "like frightened children." And yet so strong was his will that he controlled it perfectly.

His name, then, was a happy and appropriate one to give to one of the early temperance societies, known as the Washingtonian. How was the Washington Temperance Society started? Can you tell something of its work? I shall look for answers to these questions in our Cozy Corner letters. Affectionately,

Aunt Jane

COZY CORNER LETTERS.

Although some of our great men are leaving this world, I think that more just as noble are rising to take their places, for lots of letters which crowd our corner say, "I am for temperance," or "I am a King's Daughter." If there is anything which a ranch boy like me can do for our great cause, let me know. LEON C. RICE.

Lone Tree Ranch, Paxton, Neb.

You can show by your life and example that you are for God and temperance, Leon, and later you can help to vote in Prohibition or to keep the laws enforced. I thank you for the puzzle.

I don't like beer; there are some men that drink it in this town. I have one brother who is fourteen years old, who says he "will never touch the horrid stuff." As soon as THE UNION SIGNAL comes I find the children's page and read the Cozy Corner. GRACIA SPRAGUE.

Hokah, Minn.

May you always continue in the same mind, dear little reader.

I would like to join the Cozy Corner. Mamma takes THE UNION SIGNAL and I like to read the stories. I am ten years old. Mamma is a W. C. T. U.

Nantasket, Mass. MARY E. SMITH.

Plenty of room here, Mary dear, for a little daughter of the W. C. T. U.

I am four years old and a white-ribboner and a Prohibitionist. I want to know can I belong in your Cozy Corner? BERTHA MARIE JONES.

Cisco, Ill.

Come, Bertha, and sit close to Aunt Jane. We'll call her our baby Prohibitionist, won't we, boys and girls?

Every week as soon as THE UNION SIGNAL comes I turn first to the Cozy Corner and then read the rest of the paper. I like it very much. When I was nine years old I raised a Baby Band, and wish to do a great deal more for temperance when I am a woman.

Uray, Col. LULU M. BUTTS.

There's no doubt that you can help the temperance cause when you are a woman, Lulu, but even a little girl can do a great deal. Can she not?

ANNEXATION OF HAWAII.

To be or not to be—this is the absorbing question of the hour; the question receiving universal attention the nation over, from President to school-boy, and which for the time being has thrown that of Sunday opening quite into the shade.

The popular verdict is unmistakably in favor of annexation. Upon first consideration it certainly seems desirable that the United States should have control of this archipelago, but sometimes second thoughts are best, and we have sufficient confidence in our government to feel assured that it will not act hastily in this important matter. "Annex in haste, repent at leisure," we might say. A tie of this kind once formed is not so easily severed perhaps as an American marriage tie.

Aside from the perplexing complications which must arise in the event of annexation, concerning financial and commercial relations, it is not simply the addition of these islands to United States territory which we have to consider. Accepting the Sandwich Islands involves an entire change of policy with regard to colonization. It establishes a new precedent for this government, and a new interpretation of the Monroe doctrine. If the United States annexes Hawaii it must be prepared to go on annexing.

One refreshing feature in the discussion of the Hawaiian question is the absence of all partisan spirit. It proves that there are occasions upon which all party lines may be wiped out, and the people stand solidly as Americans for America.

The dominant idea among a certain class of people in this country seems to be that we must have Hawaii because Great Britain wants it. Anything which Great Britain wants, they argue, must be worth having. Since later developments indicate that England does not want the islands, the ardor of these annexationists has somewhat cooled. There may be a few newspapers in England which clamor for Hawaii, but these are not the mouthpieces of the government any more than the newspapers of this country, which delight in every opportunity to shake their fist at the motherland, are the accredited agents of the United States government. It is a very undignified policy—not to say unchristian and uncivilized—to represent these two nations as holding pistols to each others heads.

If America annexes Hawaii it will be for a far better reason than that of preventing any European power from getting hold of it. With such men as Gladstone and Lord Roseberry at the head of English affairs, and with such cool and calculating heads as belong to both our outgoing and our incoming administrations, we need never apprehend trouble between the two great English speaking nations.

To judge properly of the merits or demerits of the present disturbance in the Sandwich Islands it is necessary to know something of their history. Briefly it is this: When the Hawaiian group was rediscovered in 1778, by Captain Cook, (who named them Sandwich Islands in honor of the earl of Sandwich) each island had its own chief. Some twenty-five years later the chief of the largest island —Hawaii—overcame all the other chiefs one by one and became ruler of the whole group. His successor abolished idolatry and welcomed English and American missionaries, thus paving the way for foreign immigration. The islanders continued to advance steadily in civilization, and in 1842 their King signed a constitution substituting for the absolute monarchy a limited form of government with universal suffrage. From time to time the Hawaiians suffered from the interference of British and French officials—interference not sanctioned by the governments they represented—and in 1843 at the request of the natives these two powers entered into a treaty acknowledging the independence of the archipelago and promising never to take possession of any part thereof. Later on, it is said, the islanders, fearing duplicity on the part of the French, asked the United States to take formal possession of the territory at the first intimation of treachery from that power.

The foreign element has been steadily encroaching on the native population. The race is rapidly decreasing, succumbing, it is said, to diseases brought to the islands by foreigners.

The immediate cause of the present revolution was the attempt on the part of the Queen and her native advisors, to foist upon the people a constitution disfranchising the foreigners and increasing the power of the sovereign. The timely appearance of the United States' marines prevented bloodshed, and deterred the Queen from further action. We note with pleasure the very wise proceeding on the part of the provisional government in closing all the liquor saloons during this period of excitement. To this order, no doubt, is largely due the peaceful manner in which a change of government was so quickly and quietly effected.

The question of the annexation of Hawaii is not a new one to this government. It was talked of during the administration of President Pierce, and some steps taken toward that end. Under President Grant the subject was discussed, both at Washington and at Honolulu, and during Arthur's administration annexation was rigorously advocated.

That there has been much dissatisfaction among the residents of the islands is shown by the fact that within the last six years no less than five uprisings have occurred against the government.

The history of the past reveals the trend of progress. The absorption of the Hawaiian Islands by the Caucasian race is only a question of time. It is for our Solons to judge whether the time has come for America to admit Hawaii into her union of states with all that implies. Whatever the form of government decided upon, state, territorial or protectorate, whether this little group of islands is received into full membership or taken on probation, the outcome can but be advantageous in the end to the native islanders and to the world in general.

The history of the Sandwich Islands might well be cited as an illustration of the theory of the "survival of the fittest." It is a record of the subjugation of the weak by the strong. The large island gobbles up the smaller ones, and in turn is gobbled up by a stronger and more progressive people. The spirit of progress—evolutionary force—fate—whatever we choose to call it, moves on and up in obedience to inexorable law; the lesser succumbs to the greater, the old gives place to the new.

The Hawaiian revolution which is also evolution, has its pathetic side. It is an effort on the part of the native islanders to restore, in part at least, the old order of things; it is a courageous if unavailing struggle of the few against the many; a little handful of Malays attempting to stem the tide of Caucasian progress, to resist th advance of the history-making race of the world. We realize the inevitable, and so perhaps do the Hawaiians. May they take solace in the fact that it is to the interest of every son of Adam that the Caucasian dominate. As the condition of India under Great Britain is vastly superior to what it could possibly be under native rule, so, after the period of transition, with the friction necessarily attending it, has passed, the Hawaiians will undoubtedly be able to take longer steps forward with the aid of Uncle Sam's powerful hand than they could ever take without it.

THE MODERN TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT.

The above was the subject of Miss Willard's address delivered at the great Exeter Hall meeting in London, January 9, which has been previously described in these columns. So great has been the demand for her magnificent address that we take pleasure in making the following excerpts, regretting that space forbids its entire publication.

The difference between the temperance reform in earlier and later times is that between a straight line and a circle. Total abstinence was the sum total of the propaganda when John B. Gough began his work, and its natural offset, total prohibition, came to us with Neal Dow. But the women crusaders of the West, in their sober, second thought and organized form, began less than twenty years ago to study the correlations of the cause.

Richard Cobden had said, long before, that "the temperance reform lies at the foundation of all reforms," and the white ribboners have taken that statement literally. We have set at work to combine this mighty movement with every other that seeks to lift up man. We would make an amalgamation in which temperance should be the mercury combining with every other metal, and we would do this on the mathematical principle that the greater the number of circles intersphered the stronger will each circle be, and the more effective and elastic all.

Our work is classified according to its natural evolution into preventive, educational, evangelistic, social and legal, the department of organization being at the foundation of all, because we must establish the electric groups before the messages can flash from heart to heart. Under these heads are grouped forty different departments, each of which is under the care of a "superintendent," who is an expert, and who plans to advance, from a national point of view, the work entrusted to her. Another superintendent (under the direction of the first) is appointed for each state or province, and she in turn directs the superintendent in the local societies of her territory. All work is reported once a quarter locally, and once a year in state and nation. The World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union meets once in two years, and then the world's superintendents of departments are heard from. None of the departments are binding upon any society, local, state or national. They are suggested, but not obligatory. The only binding rules are these: Pay your annual dues and never drink.

The key word of the movement from first to last has been "Combine." Nothing can transform the present chaos of alcoholized brain into the cosmos of sobriety and reason, except the combination of all reform workers in their separate fields, to help push forward the white car of temperance. For man has nothing until he becomes possessor of himself, and his title to this highest of estates is forfeited when King Alcohol has gained the mastery over King Reason. The drink delusion is entrenched in custom, hence we must follow it into society; it hides behind false theories of science, hence we must follow it into the schools; it is hedged about by the safe-guards of law, hence we must follow it into the realm of legislation. But law is based on the decision of majorities, hence we must seek to swell the number that will vote against the publican. But women as a class, through the natural instincts of self-protection and mother-love, are the enemies of strong drink; hence we would arm them with the ballot and send them to the polls, for we have learned that when Greek meets Greek, the side always wins that has most Greeks.

But the Anglo-Saxon race is the world's young Hercules wrapped in the coils of two serpents equal in power, and their names are Intemperance and Impurity. Every blow dealt at one of these will help to paralyze the other; they are the Siamese twins of man's deterioration—when one dies the other cannot live. In the bewilderment of drink, the sinful woman sells her body and soul; the words, "women and wine" are wedded in the world's unholiest alliance; hence we must clasp hands with those who work for the white cross and purity. And so the battle widens.

But there is another aspect of the modern temperance movement to be considered. It is not content to act on the defensive, but is steadily invading the enemy's country. To antagonize the dram-shop in the prayer-meeting is well, but to do this at the polls is better, for the enemy is not in the first place but is certain to be present in the last. It is well to save the drunkard, but better to close the door of temptation before his footsteps reach its threshold. We have learned that philanthropy and politics, once flowing in wholly separate rivers of influence, will become confluent streams whenever philanthropists learn that they must deal not only with the results but with the sources of crime, and when politicians learn that their functions are assigned them for none other than a philanthropic reason.

God in government is the central thought of good men and women who would apply the principles of Christianity to the elevation of mankind. Disembodied spirits and disembodied principles fare about equally well in this work-a-day world. We must incarnate our idea in steady brains and in a hand whose ballot is its swift witness and skilled weapon. Men will not rally around vacancy, but they will rally around a candidate whose success at the polls means the election of their principles to power. The modern temperance movement is not content to stand in relations of equal friendship with a political party that opposes and another that espouses the cause of prohibition.

It was John Wesley who said, "I would form an alliance with every friend of humanity and God." The modern temperance movement holds the same language. It has proved that a treaty not only of peace, but of mutual co-operation means added strength to both the "high contracting powers." For instance, in its efforts to forewarn and forearm the young against temptation, it turned to the Sunday-school, and by petitions involving millions of names has asked its active aid.

For we believe that temperance reform should conduct towards the church and never away from it, just as a "citizens' league" is but a temporary expedient to be set aside when the duly elected officers will do their duty. So temperance societies will be needless in the exact proportion that the church of Christ comes to be what it ought to be already—the one great temperance society. For myself, I am first a Christian, afterwards a white-ribboner, for movements come and movements go, but the Church of Christ goes on forever. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is not an outside force, but part and parcel of the church. At our National convention in America, with its five hundred delegates, when all who were Sunday-school workers were asked to rise, less than half a dozen remained in their seats. We have asked, and our request is granted, that four Sundays in the year should be specially dedicated to the promotion of personal total abstinence. Sunday is the harvest of the public house at all times, and in almost all our cities children must pass its open door to reach the Sunday-school.

Why is the Mohammedan boy in Bombay better prepared to resist drink than the Christian boy in Boston or Liverpool? Because his Bible (the only one he knows, and he calls it the Koran), teaches him that it is his solemn duty to let alcohol alone. This teaching has come down from father to son; it has been worked into the the warp and woof of his character, and has been engraven upon that childish memory which is wax to receive and marble to retain. "There is a tide in the affairs of men which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune." This flood-tide is the flowing torrent of the soul. The formative period of the mind is gelatinous, an impression once made there is more deeply cut than it can be again; silver workers say that when you can see your face in the melted metal that is the time to work. So it is with the heart of childhood in that impressionable stage when it reflects your character and teaching; then stamp with a firm, true hand the white cross upon the soul, the habits of personal cleanliness of life with total abstinence from strong drink as their basis. We are not willing to time the step of the Sunday-school regiment with its mighty swing of conquest to the slowest foot in the last battalion; we are not willing to leave the defenceless little one, with his mocking enemy of inheritance, and his measureless temptations legalized and set along the street, at the mercy of the luke-warm superintendent or the indifferent teacher. We want the organic methods of the day school and the Sunday-school upon the side of temperance teaching. They have their wheels and levers, cogs, bolts, and bands, all in position; what we ask is permission to "gear on" the temperance wheel and set it spinning round the world from this central motive power.

"To resolute is well, but to evolute is better." Electricity is priceless, but only stored up electricity can make the wheels go round. With the majesty of God's book of nature and God's book of grace behind them, what a power these temperance lessons will become! They will bring the masses and the classes nearer together. The masses say our churches are not practical, that we are not in touch with the every-day sins and sorrows of humanity; but we know better, and we will prove it by keeping step with the reforms that have shone down from the Sun of Righteousness into the darkness of this world.

Total abstinence is in the Bible; it lives by implication in every letter of the Golden Rule; it stands by explication in the Pauline doctrine that "It is good neither to eat meat nor to drink wine whereby thy brother is offended or is made weak." It is involved in the Gospel's philosophy and the trend of the Sermon on the Mount.

The modern temperance reform in my country has gone to the public schools where thirteen million children are being trained, and said, by means of petitions extended over ten years past and aggregating millions of names, "We ask you to put out from your great and costly driving wheel, a belt to turn the wheel of total abstinence," and this is now being done in all our fifty states and territories, except eight, by means of compulsory education in the facts of scientific temperance. Teachers are examined in this branch of study, and children from the primer to the high school class, are regularly taught on the broad basis of hygiene, the evil effects of using alcoholics.

It is useless to say that "these methods may answer for America but not for England." That was the stand-by argument in the days of the Chartist; it did not prevail then, nor will it now. England accepts the American sewing machine, the telegraph and telephone, the electric light and phonograph; America is glad to cross the sea in English liners, and has imported your steam engine and roads of steel. The two countries are more alike than any other two on which the sun shines, and are sure, sooner or later, to welcome each other's best. Long ago you put before us the example of setting free the slave and giving penny postage to the people. From you we are copying ballot reform and the non-political methods of civil service. Is it not possible that in the methods of the youngest, but confessedly the most successful temperance society yet formed, there might be something worthy of your serious consideration? But it is late in the day to ask that question, for at the last annual council of the British Women's Temperance Association (which has been affiliated with the World's W. C. T. U. since 1886) the general outline of the modern temperance movement, with its "do-everything policy," was adopted by the majority. In Canada these methods have been successfully employed since 1883, and by the temperance women of Australia since 1884.

In the morning of its life every movement for man's elevation shines out with a light like that of Rembrandt's pictures, narrow, but intense. As the day deepens the light becomes like that in Raphael's pictures, broad and all comprehending. So it is with Christianity, and so, as white ribboners steadfastly believe, it will be with that great temperance reform which was born of the gospel, and has been dignified by that intrepid leader, Lady Henry Somerset, as "an embodied prayer."

A TIMELY REMINDER.

We take this opportunity of reminding our readers that it will soon be time to send in our lists to the florist and seedman. Those who profess to know tell us that present indications point to an unusually early spring. We would urge all our women who desire to get a "good ready" for flower mission day—June 9—to forward their orders for seed, and cuttings and begin operations as early in the season as practicable. For us habitants of the north, the summer is short at best, and in order to make the most of it we must secure a timely start for our hardy annuals.

It is well, with the mission in view, to make a specialty of the "old-fashioned" flowers—those which grew in such luxuriance in our grandmothers' flower beds. What sacred memories the mignonette, the petunias, the sweet Williams, the monthly roses will call up for the poor, hardened criminal, the prodigal son or daughter, the wanderer in a far country! Those dear old "country" blossoms, so suggestive of mother, home and heaven! Who can estimate the value of the silent message which comes with their freshness and fragrance, and which opens the floodgates of the soul? What stories we W. C. T. U. women can tell of the blessed, holy influences of the flower mission?

In order to obtain an abundance of blossoms by June it is necessary in this northern clime to give them a good start indoors. Those of us who have no conservatories know how to improvise a hot-bed from shallow boxes, which, filled with soil and placed on a shelf near the kitchen range, or in any room having the required temperature, may receive the seed or cuttings as early as February or March. Many of the "old stand-bys" can be sown in open bed in April, will bloom profusely by June, and be available for mission work all summer.

For those to whom outdoor gardening is impracticable we suggest the cultivation of the verbena, mignonette, lobelia, dwarf geraniums and other plants which thrive well in window boxes, only we must beware of crowding our sunny windows so full of plants as to deprive ourselves and our families of the life-giving sunshine.

By exercising a little ingenuity, every woman may do something in the way of flower culture, and in so doing find her soul refreshed and her vague aspirations toward the beautiful in a measure satisfied.

Even the city woman in the tenement house, upon whose windows no direct ray from the sun ever falls, need not be entirely debarred the uplifting companionship of plants.

It is true that few plants will develop flowers if denied all sunshine. Violets, forget-me-nots, lilies of the valley—all whose native habitat is the shady wood, will thrive well with occasional bathings of sunlight, but in an atmosphere which is altogether destitute of sun the best plants to cultivate are those having ornamental leaves, the beauty of which is not dependent upon the flower. These may always be judiciously utilized in the arrangement of bouquets.

Every bouquet tied with the little white ribbon carries to its recipient two messages—one of Fatherly love from heaven, one of sisterly love from 200,000 women. The beautiful manifestation of life in the flower speaks to the sore heart of the tender care the Father has over all His works; its purity and perfection reminds the poor wanderer of all he has missed, and silently beckons him back to his Father's house. And then the joy of knowing that some one cares for him here, that there are those who claim him as a brother and extend to him a helping hand! All this the flowers tell him.

The mission of the flower is Christlike in more senses than one. It points to God and surrenders its life in so doing. It breathes out its brief existence in ministering to man. From the buried seed a new incarnation springs; it grows and expands joyously under the influences of sunshine and rain, it is cut down in its perfection and ends its pure and beautiful life—perhaps in the lowly garret or squalid basement, kissed by lips that are fetid with fever's breath, perhaps in the prison cell, handled with tender and repentant touch by hands stained with crime.

Christ in a woman's heart, Christ in the flower! What wonder that the W. C. T. U. flower mission is blessed to all who come within its sphere?

LONDON expended thirty millions of dollars last year in efforts to help the deficient, dependent and delinquent classes. It is estimated that sixty millions more were expended for the same object through private means. If this could be used under the modern scientific methods of rendering help to these classes rather than in the old fashion of giving bread and coals there would soon be no slums whatever. The law should be, in our judgment, that every human being willing and able to work should be as sure of the work as he is of sunshine and air. Let the tax-payer see that he has work; it will not cost him more than it does to fling his pitiful dole, and if he will but give work to the working man, the latter can retain his self-respect and that rarer jewel that we call manhood. Why do we not act on a principle so reasonable? "What fools these mortals be!"

Mrs. Catherine Booth, mother of the Salvation Army, had read the Bible through from cover to cover eight times before she was twelve years old. Her first public act of kindness occurred at a very early age. "While running along the road with hoop and stick, she saw a prisoner being dragged to the lock-up by a constable. A jeering mob was hooting the unfortunate culprit. His utter loneliness appealed powerfully to her. It seemed that he had not a friend in the world. Quick as lightning Catherine sprang to his side, and marched down the street with him, determined that he should feel that there was at least one heart that sympathized with him, whether it might be for his fault or his misfortune that he was suffering. It was Catherine's first open-air procession; indeed, may we not legitimately call it the first ever held by the Salvation Army?"

Fifteen times in the new testament we are commanded to love one another. It is therefore an important command. There is danger of our neglecting it, or our attention would not so often be called to it. Again, brotherly love is not always spontaneous—it must be cultivated. One of the criticisms we often hear against the W. C. T. U. is that there is too much "gush" at its conventions. It is well to have our demonstrations of affection savored with common-sense and good judgment, yet there is never too much pure love—never too much sisterly kindness there. The whole atmosphere of conventions held in Christ's name should be pure, sunshiny love for each other.

A bright reformer said to a coterie of her own sort, "I wish we did not so much use the expression 'emancipated woman.' Its associations and history are not to our advantage. It would be far better to combine our efforts to make the term 'awakened woman' current coin in the world's great exchange of speech." This is a good idea worth passing along.

I cannot refrain from mentioning the exquisitely rendered poem, by Miss Henderson Daingerfield, entitled, "The Waking South," at the recent Woman's Suffrage convention. Miss Daingerfield is a typical Southern girl and, as she stood there vestured in simple white, holding in her hands a bunch of white roses, her voice low-modulated and sweet, yet clear and distinct, a certain languor in her pose, her poem seemed to express herself, as she seemed to personate the Southland, dreamy yet still full of latent energy. There were tears in the eyes of more than one listener as the gentle voice uttered in touching tones the appeal:

"Oh, friends, look not on our home to-day
Our efforts and failures spurning.
At the feet of Truth and of Justice sits
Our beautiful Southland learning."

Friends of On Duty will remember the cute criticism of Miss Gordon's poem on the mosquito, in which a New Jersey sister, (who ought to know) declared that the personal pronouns were wrong, saying, "Alas, it is the female mosquito who bites and sings." Another friend gallantly defends this occupation as follows: "To bite and sing is what the mosquito is created for, so why 'alas' since she fulfills her destiny so well. It is the female bee only who improves each shining hour and is an example of industry and skill. All the worker bees are females, you see." This mosquito poem seems to have aroused general interest, as the pleasant controversy has extended to Japan. A letter from Yokohama of recent date, says: "Miss Anna Gordon is perfectly justified in speaking of the mosquito as he. It is a mistake (and a common one unfortunately) to suppose that the female only stings. The male is the more frequent plague here, in the east at least, though I have often had a sting from his better-half."

THE BEAUTY OF DOMESTIC AFFECTION.

BY HESTER M. POOLE.

In that inexpressibly sad and powerful book by Mrs. Humphrey Ward, entitled "David Greene," is a minute picture of the influence of domestic affection over the life of an intellectual man.

In marrying Lucy, David found no sort of deep companionship. She could understand nothing of his profound experiences, his literary tastes, his soul agonies, his aspirations. This, from the first, he knew. But, like many another, he made the best of his condition. It was her fond affection which drew him to her in the first place, and this affection, reaching down below their dissimilarities of taste and temperament, kept him true to her until death—and after.

Still more than that. This love, which was true, tender and deep as the very life of the superficial, tiny woman, was the flame which kindled in her latent spiritual nature a true, religious devotion. Under its influence Lucy grew larger, truer, better. Her little life sweetly unfolded, and there fell from it much of the olden vanity, which clings like a burr to undeveloped women. At the last she murmured, "I wish I'd been kinder," and the saying of her husband welled to her dying lips, "It can only be proved by living, by every victory over the evil self." "And," continued the author, "had not her weak life become one flame of love, a cup of the holy Grail, heating and pulsing with the Divine life?"

It is not a happy book, perhaps not for many persons a healthy one, yet it can furnish a text for many and many a sermon. It may all be condensed in that one sentence, "Love one another."

Once upon a time a king, reveling in all imaginable luxuries, grew satiated with the monotony of his blessings. Men do this, it is human nature. Who would appreciate sunshine were there never night and clouds and storms?

In his restlessness, this king sought a physician. Again, human nature! How often do we misinterpret mental sickness for physical, and send for a doctor, when the Divine Healer can only be manifested to and through the spiritual nature within ourselves.

The physician came. He was wise with another lore than that learned through medical schools and the scalpel.

"Your majesty must seek for a perfectly happy man. When he is found, procure his coat and wear it. That will cure you, and that alone," so spake the physician.

And so the king set out in search of man and coat. Up and down he went, here and there and everywhere. Just as he found some one supposed to be perfectly happy, there was disclosed to him, confidentially, the fact that in the heart some hidden wound, some rankling bitterness spoiled happiness.

At last he came to a beggar sunning himself against an old wall. "Art thou happy?" demanded the king.

"Perfectly, sire!"

"Then give me thy coat that I may be healed!"

"I would, sire, gladly; but I have none!"

Then the king rode away with head bent upon his breast, pondering deeply. He went to his kingdom, forgot that he was ill, devoted himself to the welfare of his people, and lived long and usefully.

All of us are kings and queens over the royal domain of self. Many of us have walled towns and cities of domesticity over which we rule with greater or lesser authority. In these do we expect perfect happiness? If so, we shall be sorely disappointed. If we do not find content and peace, blessedness, restfulness and much quiet happiness, it will, under ordinary conditions, be greatly our own fault.

Enough has been written and sung concerning the delights of home. Never can the subject be exhausted. Father, mother, child, loving and beloved, that blessed household trinity which is at the heart of all society! Who believes not that the truest, deepest, holiest affection, that earth can know, dwells in the homes of the race?

"In all nature," says the author of "God in His World," "there are never two but there is a third, the Begotten." Progress as well as perpetuity is the consequence. But neither is attainable without care, perplexity, responsibility. To happiness there is no royal road. The best way, the only way, is that which accepts the burdens of life with cheerful content, which diminishes the friction of travel by exercising humor, by making the best of everything, by the use of common sense and above all by cherishing affection and by bestowing it in double measure.

In the affection developed and sustained in home life, lies the hope of the nation. Not in fine furniture or dress, not in social position or gay assemblies, not in the cultivation of the intellect alone can the wealth of our country be estimated. It consists in the integrity, the morality and the love which exists in our homes.

After the novelty and glow of early married life is past, and children, with the work and anxiety which they entail, come into the household, the wife and mother sees one illusion after another depart forever. Life is prosaic, cold, monotonous. Her husband and little ones are loved, but she realizes nothing of the depth of this love unless danger comes to them. The lover's fervor cools in the practical cares of daily life. As husband he is less demonstrative, he forgets those little courtesies and expressions of affection upon which her sensitive nature naturally counted. He goes to business without a good-by. Perhaps he smokes expensive cigars while he forgets that Katie needs new shoes and that the mother herself, lacks presentable clothing. Even worse than this he may be a drunkard or immoral in various ways. The soul within her writhes in anguish. There is no hope for her except in wrenching her life apart from his,—and how can she do that when there are children?

Even then love may be her salvation—their salvation. The ideal she once loved is still there. God never breathed a soul into a human body without stamping it with His likeness. Buried in the embruted flesh is the Divine image. Some day, cleansed from impurities, it shall reveal the semblance of the author. Whatever be his earthly fate, the wife who has once bound herself by holy and solemn ties to another has taken upon herself, by her womanly, loving nature, a responsibility which she cannot escape.

She may not see fit to live with him. It may not be right. Who shall say that two shall continue bound together when to one it has grown to be a living death? But, if she be a true, deep-hearted woman, she will not leave until there is no hope that he can be won, by her presence, to a higher life.

Even if she breaks away, her good wishes, her desires to be helpful, her prayers, may save him from becoming a total wreck. Again and again have such cases been known.

Things may not have gone so far as this. Between the two may come only indifference or a growing apart of tastes and habits. Here again the womanly tact and love may do much to bridge the widening gulf. The unconscious influence of a good woman, especially if she has quick perceptions, tact and good judgment, is incalculable. If he is outgrowing her she will so simplify her life as to find time to read, study and think, to the end of being his intellectual companion. Should he be beneath her level then the work is hard. Heaven help her then to help him!

But we have wandered from the subject. Domestic affection affords a background upon which all other joys are embroidered. Where there is no home life there is no life at all.

The farther we wander from the enchanted paradise of childhood, the more beautiful it seems. The father's manly tenderness, the mother's more demonstrative care, the homely scenes at morning, noontide and night, the simple, sunny, every day work and play, all these grow precious in memory, as our sun mounts to the meridian. With a kind of wistfulness we wonder that we did not more fully appreciate the blessings then our own. This is realized in reading the early lives of all who write those most delightful of all books—autobiographies. In Miss Willard's life-story who has not hung over the picture of her early days in a trance of charm? I wonder more people do not portray their own immature experiences. It would help grown children to understand the ungrown.

If these words of mine carry any moral, it is that mothers and elder children may try to have the younger members of the family "live, breathe and move" in an atmosphere of affection.

That does not mean indulgence or luxury. It means a frank, full expression of love. Help the unfolding soul to bathe in it, grow in it. Let us cultivate it more sedulously than we cultivate flowers in springtime. Nobody yet had too much love, if it were wisely expressed. It is not pampering and coddling—it is just simply loving. In the words of Lucy Larcom:

"I know that love never is wasted,
Nor truth, nor the breath of a prayer;
And the thought that goes forth as a blessing,
Must live as a joy in the air."

Home affection is both a shield against temptation and a solace in misfortune. How many rough pathways may be smoothed by it, so that the four walls may, indeed, be an earthly heaven. And, at life's close,

"O Pilgrim, but a moment wait,
And we shall hear our darling's call
Beyond Death's mute and awful gate,
And Love shall save us all."

Metuchen, N. J.

MR. WEBSTER being asked what was the most important thought that ever occupied his mind, replied: "My individual responsibility as a man to God."

MARYLAND.

MANY MATTERS.

The record of doings at the memorial building, or state headquarters, during the recent holiday season is varied and interesting. The members of Boys' Friday Night League sang Christmas carols and received gifts of candies and fruit. The Loyal Temperance Legion had appropriate exercises and received similar gifts.

The Free Kindergarten gave its usual entertainment, full of delights for young and old, one end of the long room being crowded with the fathers and mothers of the little pupils of the kindergarten, to all of whom this occasion brings pleasure unspeakable. A number of others interested in the work were present also. A charming program of songs, carols, and characteristic games was given by the children. Then followed the touching little gifts to their parents, the pretty sewing cards and mats, worked and woven by their patient little fingers, and the bed comforts, blankets and other useful articles bought with the pennies deposited in the kindergarten savings bank during the year, and hoarded for this purpose. The gifts to each little one were a toy, or doll, a book and a bag of fruit and sweets.

Rev. Mr. Wharton, of Brantly Baptist church, of Baltimore, gave a talk to the fathers and mothers, and "tearful eyes testified to the power of tender, winning words."

The sewing school, organized and conducted at headquarters by the Be and Do Circle of the King's Daughters, led by those indefatigable workers, Miss Dix and Miss Burnett, also celebrated the festival season here. Candies, cake and fruits were distributed to the children, forty in number, and premiums awarded for punctual attendance and sewing.

The festival for the Sunday-school children was also a great success. Eighty-five of the children belonging were present and received appropriate gifts. The carols and hymns sung were most beautiful, each accompanied by characteristic movements. Rev. Kinley McMillan, of the Presbyterian church, addressed the children. This school is doing an admirable work among poor children who have, as a rule, no other religious instruction. Many of the mothers of the children were at the festival, and entered warmly into the pleasure of the children.

One of the most touching and interesting of these entertainments, if any distinction can be made where all were of such interest, was the supper given by the Mothers' Mission workers to the women belonging to the mission and to their husbands and grown sons. Every effort had been used to make this as bounteous and enjoyable as possible in every sense of the word. About seventy were present, and gave unmistakable evidence of their appreciation of everything that was done for them. Music, vocal and instrumental, brief religious exercises, and an effective temperance talk by Mr. A. W. Hawks, were part of the varied program. The ladies of the mission were assisted by the Children's Friend Circle of the King's Daughters, both in furnishing and serving the supper.

A New Year's reception, given by the East Baltimore Y, closed the list of festivities here. Over one hundred gentlemen friends of the members called, and all seemed to enjoy the occasion greatly. Good music was given and suitable literature distributed.

In closing the records of the year, one of importance, heretofore omitted, should be given here. Among the resolutions passed at the late convention of the state W. C. T. U. was one directing the presentation of a memorial to the great triennial convention of the Protestant Episcopal church of the United States in session in Baltimore, during and for some time succeeding the state W. C. T. U. convention. The following letter, signed by the president and corresponding secretary "in the interests of Christ's kingdom on earth," was sent accordingly to the House of Bishops, the committee having been advised to send to that body instead of to the general convention as first proposed:

"RIGHT REVEREND SIRS:—At the recent annual meeting of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Maryland, representing three thousand women of Maryland, a resolution was passed:

"'That we present to you the need of the united prayers and efforts of God's people in the work of suppressing the liquor traffic, as this iniquity, protected by law is doing more to hinder the growth and power of Christianity than any other cause.'

"'We therefore ask for some decided expression on this vital subject, from your most honorable body assembled under the authority of the Protestant Episcopal church of the United States of America.

"We also respectfully ask your indorsment of the accompanying polyglot petition, already translated and signed in forty languages, and which is to be presented to the different governments of the world by a commission of women, headed by Lady Henry Somerset, of England, who will go around the world within a year or two for that purpose."

The letter was presented to the House through the courteous kindness of Bishop Leighton Coleman, of Delaware, and a reply was duly received, as follows:

"To the Maryland Woman's Christian Temperance Union:

"The undersigned is instructed by the House of Bishops to acknowledge the receipt of a communication from your body and to inform you that the House of Bishops has adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That while this House is earnestly desirous of promoting temperance amongst all sorts and conditions of men, it is not persuaded that the legislation proposed by the petitioners is best calculated to accomplish this result.'

'And I have the honor to be,
Respectfully yours,
SAMUEL HART, Sec."

An effort had been made by the state W. C. T. U. secretary to obtain a somewhat similar memorial from the National Union, as the convention was national in character, and then present that of Maryland with this, but the time necessary for this was too brief to allow of its being done.

The pastoral letter of the bishops, sent out from this body at this time, and made the duty of every clergyman having a pastoral charge to read to his congregation on some occasion of public worship, touches upon "those fallen by the way in the cruel strife of 'competition,' upon the hard 'struggle for existence,'" on "love for the lowly and help and a strong shield over them against the pitiless working of an iron 'economic law,'" on "love for what men have dared to call the 'submerged masses,' love for Christ's lambs drowning in the gutters of our rich cities," on "love and help for all who have no helper but the good Father of us all above and His church and kingdom here below," and on the "plain duty of the church to throw over the home the shield of God's law in its power," but the "pitiless working" of the iron liquor law and the plain duty of the members of the church to throw over the home the shield of man's righteous law have no part in this letter nor in any of the published deliberations of this powerful body.

"Do you hear the children weeping and disproving, Oh, my brothers, what ye fail to preach?"

A great object lesson of this convention was the "smoking tent," erected in the rear of the chapel in which the bishops met, for the accommodation of the delegates. This was pictured twice in one of the large Baltimore dailies, and referred to later in the session by the same daily as being "quite liberally patronized by clerical and lay delegates who require a whiff of the fragrant weed."

The same daily gave an abstract, a short time before this of a paper on "The Sunday-school and Social Morality," read before the conference of the Sunday-school union of the Methodist Episcopal church from which I quote: "This is the age of the cigarette smoker. If all the boys had Godfearing and praying mothers they might be safe, but too few have such." "The church," says the Bishop Letter, "is wiser than her wisest member, holier than her holiest member." The church, this church, thus publicly sets her seal on tobacco smoking—"let your women keep silence!"

The recent gift of $306,977 by Miss Mary Elizabeth Garrett, of Baltimore, in further endowment of the medical school of the Johns Hopkins University on condition that women are admitted there on the same terms, as men enjoy all its advantages on the same terms as men and are admitted on the same terms as men to all prizes, dignities or honors that are awarded by competitive examination or regarded as rewards of merit should be noted here.

Of the $111,300 previously contributed towards this school through the Woman's Medical School Fund, in payment mainly of the $100,000 required by the university trustees before women could be admitted to the school, Miss Garrett had given $47,787; Maryland has raised $21,775; Boston, $20,231; Philadelphia, $8,075; New York, $5,400 and several other cities smaller sums. Towards the entire fund for the medical school the university trustees gave at the time these other contributions were made, the sum of $67,480. The medical school of the university, which was provided by the board of trustees should be opened when a fund had been accumulated of not less than $500,000 will therefore be almost entirely the gift of the women to the university, largely of cause, the gift of Miss Garrett.

Miss Garrett stipulates in the terms accompanying her last gift, that the school shall be opened in the autumn of 1893, and that notice of the opening shall be given on February 22, 1893.

This school is expected to afford to women in America those opportunities for advanced medical training which they are at present compelled to seek in the great foreign schools. M. A. L.

PENNSYLVANIA POINTS.

The local unions of Bucks county are giving prizes for the best temperance essays written by the children of their respective localities. They are divided into three grades, according to age. Those who win under the auspices of the local unions will be privileged to compete for similar prizes offered by the county organization, these also to be graded according to age. The first grade consists of youths from fifteen to eighteen years; second grade, twelve to fifteen years; third, under twelve years. Essays to be written upon any phase of the temperance question that the writers may choose. The successful competitors for the county prizes will read their respective essays at the county convention which meets in Doylestown in April. The prizes are eight, five and three dollars.

From Lycoming county comes the good news that the department of mothers' meetings, under the efficient leadership of Mrs. McMinn, is growing in interest, and that parlor meetings have been taken up with success this year. Mrs. J. B. Green was secured by the superintendent of temperance instruction, to speak on that subject before the teachers' institute.

In the evangelistic department, the following excellent report of work has been done: Eight unions were visited by the county superintendent. Four public addresses were made on the subject of Sabbath observance, Bible readings and talks given on the same subject to the unions. Petitions against "open gates at the World's Fair" have been well circulated and quite an interest has been aroused on the Sabbath question.

The milk dealers of Williamsport petitioned the mayor, through one of the daily papers, for a cessation of milk selling, at least during the cold weather, and the pastors of the city also petitioned the mayor, asking that the request of the milk dealers be granted all the year round. Sabbath observance pledges have been signed and literature freely distributed. The county convention was deeply spiritual throughout. A World's W. C. T. U. service was held, at which Mrs. Wilson spoke on Mrs. Leavitt's work, and the Central union held a memorial service in honor of Madam Willard. An increase of temperance sentiment is recorded in this county.

From Erie county comes the cheering intelligence that the various unions are taking up the L. T. L. work. Mrs. L. E. Baily, of Michigan, a very talented speaker, was in the county for a month's work, and during that time delivered thirty-five lectures, addressed eighteen women's and fourteen children's meetings, and organized three new unions at the following places, Italy, Elgin and Wesleyville. Seventeen new names were added to the members of old unions; seven unions were induced to send for monthly readings and other supplies. She organized a temperance society at Lake Pleasant of thirty-five members which is composed of men, women and children. The Wesleyville W. C. T. U. are just now engaged in the remonstrance. The Mill Village W. C. T. U. have held five medal contests; in February they will hold two more, and after these a gold medal contest. Contests have also been conducted at Plain Grove and Harlinsburg, in Lawrence county.

Mercer county has received the additional reinforcement of a new W. C. T. U., organized at Sandy Lake, of which Mrs. J. M. Foster is president. The efficient county superintendent of temperance instruction was accorded a place on the program at the teachers' institute and made an excellent address to the teachers; she also visited and addressed the Fredonia institute, distributing Standards at both places. She expects to visit at the various schools throughout the county during the next few months.

Mrs. Maude Elliott, the new county superintendent of Y work and our delegate to the National convention, in company with our county president visited the Balm unions and made a fine address. Remonstrance work has been claiming the undivided attention of the Greenville W. C. T. U. and they have been loyally aided in every way by the temperance men of the town, who have given both time and money to the work. Two of the ministers carried remonstrances. All honor to them and would there were more like them. It is not yet known what the outcome will be. Van Bennett, the "Kansas cyclone," as he is called, gave a very fine address on "Our Boys" in the opera house, February 2, and the well-known Stevenson quartette furnished the music.

Cameron county has held its third annual convention, at which the state president, Mrs. Hammer, was present. A school of methods was held; Miss Anna Shaw gave her address on "Fate of Republics." This county published the names of all signers to petitions and distributed the same in book form throughout the county.

The Philadelphia first Y held a "dollar social." An enjoyable program, consisting of prayer, music, speeches and "experiences" in earning the dollar, was rendered.

NOTES.

A long list of graduates of the L. T. L., is recorded for the past month (January). Six counties are represented. Since our last letter eight new W. C. T. U's and three new Y. W. C. T. U's have been organized in our state.

Miss Annie Hefflefinger, president of Green Village, Franklin county Y. W. C. T. U., has obeyed the command to "come up higher" and has gone to be "forever with the Lord."

We have received a copy of the Clinton county White Ribbon, a well-edited paper and the organ of the Clinton county W. C. T. U. Excellent work has been accomplished in the several departments of work, —especially is this true in the prison and jail, juvenile and railroad work.

In order to make this UNION SIGNAL report the complete success that is desired, it is necessary that I have the coöperation of all county presidents and press superintendents, and once more let me "stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance" to send me promptly something from each county if only postal card reports of work done. LOYAL TEMPERANCE LEGION PROGRESS.

Our state has just been favored with a flying visit from Mrs. Ellen A. D. Blair, National organizer, who went through on the U. P. R. R. stopping at each town and in spite of short time did much good work, giving Chalk Talks and organizing Loyal Temperance Legions.

Cheyenne was the first place visited. An L. T. L. was organized with thirty members. Only one meeting was held here. At Laramie, the next point, one meeting was held, and their secretary says, "Although the night was stormy, a large number of children as well as grown people had assembled by the time Mrs. Blair was ready to begin. The children watched with eager interest the pictures growing so delightfully under her skillful fingers."

At the close she organized a band with thirty-two members. "Should Mrs. Blair ever visit Laramie again she will be heartily welcomed by young and old," is the sentiment echoed by the whole state.

At Rawlins she spoke Sabbath morning in the Presbyterian church at the usual time for service, and had a good audience, with singing by the children, who were made to feel that it was their service. An L. T. L. was organized with fifty-seven members.

Rock Springs speaks very enthusiastically of the Chalk Talk, and reports an L. T. L. organized with fifty members. At Green River the audience was not so large as at the other places, but those who heard the talk were much pleased and interested. The L. T. L. was revived with twenty members.

But at Evanston, the last place, it was the best of all. The court house, where the meeting was held, was quite crowded, there being at least two hundred children and about twenty adults. The little ones were determined to see and hear all there was to be seen and heard, and crowded so closely around her that she could hardly find room to work, but they were quiet and orderly. There was an organization effected with one hundred and twelve members. At this place Mrs. Blair had more time and visited several school-rooms, where she gave short Chalk Talks which helped to arouse the children's interest. It was the largest temperance meeting ever held at Evanston. We have now six juvenile bands with about three hundred members besides some L. T. L's in the northern part of the state.

DELAWARE.

THE THIRTEENTH ANNUAL STATE CONVENTION.

A writer in a recent number of The Woman's Column, advises that plans of work "allow for hindrances," and I regret that mine have not been sufficiently "elastic" for an earlier chronicling of our annual state convention held in Laurel last fall. But "better late than never," is a good rule to follow.

The first session opened with the reading of the Crusade Psalm, led by Miss Elizabeth W. Greenwood whose presence is always uplifting and we were also privileged in having Bible expositions from her and another well known National worker, Mrs. Helen G. Rice, and our state superintendent of the evangelistic department, Mrs. Roberta H. Matlack, so that the spiritual tide was not at a low ebb during the convention.

The business sessions were held in the M. P. church and the evening meetings in the M. E. church, thus affording us the pleasure of receiving the brotherly courtesies of Rev. J. W. Kirk of the former and Rev. S. M. Pilchard of the latter. These two brethren with the Rev. A. J. Walter of the M. P. Circuit, expressed their sympathy and interest in our work in their cordial welcoming the first evening meeting.

We were also encouraged by the presence and kind words of Rev. Alfred E. Smith, Rev. F. M. McSorley, Rev. Ralph Coursey, Rev. Aloysius Green and Rev. Edward Davis. Several friends of the laity were present too, among them the husband of our faithful treasurer, Mrs. Hattie H. Phelps. Her predecessor, Mrs. Jennie B. Quigg, one of our pioneer state workers, was gladly welcomed back to our W. C. T. U. council, the itinerant wheel having brought her to us, after an absence of several years in Maryland.

Valuable among the papers read was the address of our president, Miss Margaret S. Hilles, with its broad outlook and excellent recommendations given with characteristic mental force and true devotion to humanity. The report of the president of New Castle county, Mrs. V. L. Culbertson, whose life is shadowed by a deep bereavement, was given by the county secretary, Mrs. E. Elma Pyle, and showed activity within their borders. The two other county presidents, Mrs. Kate E. Smithers, of Kent, and Mrs. Jennie R. Creamer, of Sussex, recounted the success the year had held for the unions of their counties. Mrs. Mary L. Cox, who has served ten years as corresponding secretary (with an interval of several years) gave as a part of her annual summary: Number of unions, forty-seven, which is a gain of twelve; membership, 1,651, an increase of 315 during the year.

The reports of superintendents in most instances indicated progress, among the number that of Miss Bessie Addison Mills, superintendent of the Young Woman's Branch, who was congratulated upon the largest representation of Y's in the history of the state union.

None of the superintendents were more hopeful than the president of the board, Mrs. Martha S. Cranston, who cheerily predicted in her report of the franchise department that it will not be many years before we have the ballot in our hands. Appeals too touching to be forgotten were made by Mrs. N. B. Smithers, superintendent of jail and alms-house work, and Mrs. L. C. Marks, of work for the promotion of social purity, In connection with the former department the flower-mission was again combined, and our sweet singer, Mrs. Mary M. Wolcott, appointed as Mrs. Smither's assistant.

The superintendent of the flower-mission the past year, Miss Mary H. Mather, delightfully told of simple little ministries possible to flower-missioners and others who seek to help and cheer needy souls, inChrist's name. In relinquishing the flower mission Miss Mather takes the position of assistant superintendent of the evangelistic department, her previous work having been the preparation for this development. Two new banners were presented to the convention, one the property of the state W. C. T. U. and the other a lovely L. T. L. banner, made of white satin and decorated with clover blossoms and forget-me-nots, the work having been donated by Mrs. Sylvia Burrows, of Middletown.

The always adaptable and intensely interesting work for the boys and girls, was reported in a prosperous condition by the superintendent, Mrs. Marion H. Price, one town, Odessa, without a W. C. T. U. having an L. T. L. of forty-six members, with the Rev. Henry S. Thompson, pastor of the M. E. church, as superintendent.

Sunday-school work so closely allied to this department has made some advance the past year; the superintendent, Mrs. E. H. Capelle, aiming "that every Sunday-school scholar in the state shall belong to the Sunday-school temperance society of the world."

Two interesting symposiums unexpectedly became a part of the program, one on finance, the presidents of local unions at Miss Hilles' request, telling of their methods of securing money for home work, the convention voting after the stories had all been told, that "each union hold an entertainment by the first of March, and send one-half of the money thus obtained to the state W. C. T. U., or not less than two, nor more than five dollars."

The other symposium occurred after the reading of the report of the indefatigable state agent of THE UNION SIGNAL, Mrs. Mary L. Cox, several speaking of the value of our official organ as a literary paper and exponent of the W. C. T. U. Among others Miss Greenwood told us how the husband of a friend of hers became interested in the temperance question, by the reading of THE UNION SIGNAL sent as a gift into his home.

The three public meetings were quite successful, large audiences being in attendance, and fine addresses having been made by Miss Greenwood and Mrs. Rice; and the choirs of the two churches, Miss Kate Taylor, Mrs. Mary M. Walcott, the Y's and L. T. L. rendering enjoyable music. Beside the addresses of the pastors the first evening the Laurel L. T. L. engaged in a Demorest medal contest, the medal being awarded to Miss Martha A. Riggin.

Both of our efficient secretaries, Mrs. Mary L. Cox and Mrs. Jennie C. S. Price having declined to accept a reëlection, we entered upon the election of officers the closing session, with the necessity of making these two changes in the executive committee. The ballot resulted in the election of Mrs. E. Elma Pyle, corresponding secretary, and Mrs. Marguerite H. Green, recording secretary. Both Mrs. Pyle and Mrs. Green are presidents of their local unions, and have had experience in various lines of W. C. T. U. work. We were thankful indeed, that our president, Miss Hilles, and treasurer, Mrs. Phelps, allowed us to express our appreciation by their unanimous reelection.

The second afternoon of the convention, an impressive memorial service was conducted by Mrs. Walcott, twenty-three of our number having passed into "the land of cloudless day," during the year. With personal reminiscences, Miss Hilles tenderly referred to Madam Willard, and the convention voted to send Miss Willard, then on her way home from England a telegram of "loving welcome."

In harmony with this the second resolution adopted reads:

"That we hereby express our love and sympathy for our National president, and will ever cherish the memory of her beloved mother."

Of the other thirteen resolutions, the one affirming sympathy with the Prohibition party of Delaware, had some practical results in the public meetings held in its interest in several localities, all efforts culminating in 578 votes for the Prohibition party of the state. In consideration of the opportunity the meeting of the legislature would afford, resolutions were adopted asking for a bill to prohibit the sale of tobacco to minors, petitioning for a compulsory educational law, and asking for an enactment and appropriation for the establishment of a state industrial school for women and girls. This is now the third week of the state assembly and I hope soon to write you of our legislative work.

Many homes of Laurel were opened to us in gracious hospitality beside those of the members of the W. C. T. U. The president of the union, Mrs. Euphemia Hitch, in her loving welcome contrasted the number of delegates and visitors, more than a hundred, with the representation of about thirty when the convention met in the town nine years ago. One thought in Mrs. Hitch's address and in the response made by our new secretary, Mrs. Green, "the bond of our service" impressed itself upon me and may be illustrated by this bit of a story, the outcome of my last communication to THE UNION SIGNAL.

Soon after its publication, Mrs. Matlack received a letter from a school friend living in New Jersey, expressing much gratification with the knowledge of her place of residence, gained from THE UNION SIGNAL letter. A further interchange of words acquainting each with the fact that during the years of silence between them, the Master's work had been precious to both, and closely uniting them in the pleasant renewal of their early friendship. Thus one purpose is that "the tie that binds" and we of the white ribbon learn more and more of the blessedness of comradeship.

MINNESOTA MITES.

The press superintendent of Wright county sends word that the five unions of the county have undertaken to raise one hundred dollars this year for the Temperance Temple, "and will do it, too." Of course they will, those Wright county women are not the ones to fail. The five county papers are kept supplied with all they will publish of first-class temperance news, thus creating a sentiment that aids the W. C. T. U's not a little.

Monticello union, the largest in the county, has recently been unable to meet regularly, on account of scarlet fever in the town, but hopes soon to be at work again. Three wall-pockets are kept filled. There is a prosperous L. T. L. here also.

Writing that last sentence, my mind runs back to my own childhood, in that same village, and our Sunday-school Band of Hope, the forerunner, perhaps, of this L. T. L. But how limited our privileges then, to what the little ones of to-day enjoy. There were no manuals, no marching songs, no entertainments, no dear little "Crusader," our very own. Nothing save the pledge, and the talks of our elders, the burden of which was "don't drink," leaving out the other half of the lesson as it stands to-day. "Don't drink; and vote the saloons out." They hadn't thought of that then.

A little over three years ago a union was organized in Huntley, Faribault county, with seventeen members. They now have twenty-seven and eleven honorary members. They feel they are especially fortunate because their pastor (of the Free Baptist church) is in hearty sympathy with them, ready to help in any way, and at their last public meeting he donned the white ribbon. Several of the honorary members took active part in that meeting. Would that all our unions might have such aid and encouragement.

Huntley has had the pleasure of having several of the best speakers in the state and a number from outside. A flourishing Y is another source of pleasure to the devoted women of the little town. This is the Y that took the district banner a year ago last August and still retains it. Eight of these girls recently contested for a silver medal, all doing so well it was difficult to decide upon the best.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

MR. R. FOSTER STONE, the prohibition speaker, will be open for engagements east of the Rockies from June 1 to November 1. Address him at 1806 O street, Sacramento, Cal.

MRS. GEN. BIDWELL has been made superintendent of evangelistic work in California. The General and his wife are called Master and Mistress Bountiful by the many good temperance people to whom they have shown their large-hearted hospitality.

MISS MARY E. MCDOWELL, superintendent of kindergarten work for the National W. C. T. U., will make engagements to speak in Michigan, Indiana, Wisconsin or Illinois. Unions will do well to secure her services by addressing her soon at 117 Maple avenue, Evanston, Ill.

IMMEDIATELY after the funeral of Miss Mary Allen West in Galesburg, Ill., a photographer took two views of the church with its Japanese and floral decorations. A commission on the sale of these photographs has been kindly offered the Galesburg W. C. T. U. for the purpose of aiding them in the erection of headquarters. There are two sizes, the cabinet size costing 25 cents and the larger one, 13x16 inches, costing $1.50. Orders should be sent to Mrs. C. S. Richey, Galesburg, Ill.

Official Communications.

NATIONAL MINUTES.

Will all who order copies of the Minutes please send their orders direct to the National Corresponding Secretary, Room 1115, The Temple, and not to the W. T. P. A. or to other officers in the building? Will you also send the money, or stamps (fifteen cents) when ordering, as it does not pay to send bills for such small amounts? If those who desire minutes will observe these requests it will simplify matters at the office of the W. T. P. A. as well as at National Headquarters and greatly oblige the National Secretary, CAROLINE B. BUELL.

THE CRITTENTON FUND.

DEAR WHITE-RIBBONERS:—I promised in the columns of THE UNION SIGNAL to make known through the same channel the facts I should be able to learn concerning the conditions of Mr. Crittenton's gift of $5,000 for the founding of Rescue Homes. I am now able to state authoritatively that the gift was made to the National W. C. T. U. and is under the control of the National officers, and that the department of social purity has not the least charge of it. I therefore send to Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, of Stroudswater, Maine, the National assistant recording secretary, all correspondence in regard to the fund that has been received by me personally, or that has been referred to me by Miss Willard.

Regretting the delay in making this announcement, but feeling a weight of responsibility lifted from my shoulders in thus making it, I remain as ever, yours in the work. MARY WOOD ALLEN,
Supt. Dept. Social Purity.

TO LOCAL PRESIDENTS, SUPERINTENDENTS AND OTHERS.

Sunday Closing. Apathy on the subject of Sabbath observance is at last being slowly broken up. The struggle for closing the Exposition gates has providentially proved the occasion and the means of awakening such wide-spread interest and discussion that the Sabbath question seems just now to lead all other moral questions. We thank God the gates are to be closed, but shall we therefore think the victory won and at our ease sit down?

Surely, not while the fresh interest means an open door for work and influence to be entered before it shuts. Whether the country now moves forward or backward depends on whether we are faithfnl to our work and our opportunities.

Attitude of Labor. Labor organizations have surprised us all by many of them being counted against Sunday closing, not seeing that they are thus voting for their own future enslavement to seven day labor. THE UNION SIGNAL has well said, "It should be counted the special mission of the W. C. T. U. to reach and educate this class in Sabbath observance and prohibition." Will not each union make a special effort to do this? Two of the new leaflets, "From the Workman's Standpoint," No. 50, and "Does Sabbath-keeping Pay?" No. 51, are specially designed for working people, as are several others on the catalogue. Let there be a determined effort, and a little money, and it can be done. Christian people are another class that, strange to say, need special education.

The New Literature. After unexpected delay, the ten new leaflets are now ready. Dr. Brand, W. F. Crafts, our own Miss Willard and Mrs. Earle, our department lecturer, are among the writers. Five are ten and five are fifteen cents a hundred; two cents will get the new samples, ten cents will get the whole forty and catalogues are free. Twenty-five cents will get the "Manual of Sabbath Observance," which is warmly commended by the state superintendents, and thirty-five cents will buy a complete superintendents' outfit. Nearly all leaflets are either ten or fifteen cents a hundred.

The Week of Prayer. "The Request to the Ministry and Churches" (No. 55) for April -2-9, is in the name of the American Sabbath Associations, and urges that that week be observed by sermons, prayer, collections and work for the Sabbath cause. Will you not see that it has the fullest possible circulation, asking all religious papers to publish it, and all churches to observe it, asking also for a collection for the Sabbath cause, a part to go for literature for the town or city, and part for National work through this department or some other organization or both. This department has never asked for funds before and deems it proper to say that the superintendent has never had a salary or profited to the value of a postage stamp by all her publications or labors, and there are wide open doors she longs to enter if others will come to her aid. Sermons, Sabbath-school instruction, prayer and public meetings and plenty of literature should be secured for that week.

MRS. J. C. BATEHAM.
Williamsburg, Ky.

Our Library Table.

THE QUARTERLY JOURNAL OF INEBRIETY is a thoughtful periodical, and its table of contents one with which every serious antagonist of the drink evil should become conversant. The January issue contains, among other excellent papers, "Some Questions Concerning the Responsibility of Inebriates," by Drs. Motet and Vetault; also one akin to the foregoing, "Recent Judicial Evolution as to Criminal Responsibility of Inebriates," by Clark Bell.

T. D. Crothers, M. D., editor, Hartford, Conn.

WORTHINGTON'S MAGAZINE for February has a very timely paper on "Brigham Young," "a fair sketch by one who knew him"—J. A. MacKnight. Mary A. Livermore's second paper of personal reminiscences "In 'Ole Virginny'—Fifty years Ago" is most sprightly. "Zeph" is a touching, almost weird story by Lida A. Churchill. "Miss Trot's Valentine" is a simple little story by Mary G. Woodhull, that has some strong outlines in it. "Story of the Tile Fish" is by René Bache, and is pronounced by the author to be "the most sensational, zoölogical event of the century." "The Regeneration of Camp Scott," by Albert Bigelow Paine, is perhaps the strongest story of this issue. The magazine is freely illustrated and altogether attractive.

A. D. Worthington & Co., Hartford, Conn.

A large and very striking photogravure of the late Cardinal Manning appears as frontispiece of the February OUR DAY. The leading article is by one skilled in finance, and has the significant title, "Jay Gould as Wrecker and Pirate." Mrs. Hunt's paper on "Scientific Temperance Education of the Masses," and a review of the enlarged fifth edition of Meta Lander's trenchant presentation of the "Tobacco Problem" will be of special interest to all engaged in the holy war for the extermination of alcoholics and narcotics. Joseph Cook's Boston Monday Lecture is on "Sources of Infallibility in Scripture." The number is particularly devoted to the discussion of Indian Rights.

In February ST. NICHOLAS Rudyard Kipling has a most charming story of India. "Collar-Wallah and the Poison Stick." Collar-Wallah is a monkey of most unheard of sagacity and monkey cunning. The story is told in the well-known vein of quiet humor in which the author excels, and is a rich recital throughout. "Battling Under Water," is an interesting as well as instructive sketch, by Frederick Hobart Spencer, having for its theme the wonderful torpedo boats. "The Boyhood of Louis XIX," is an entertaining historical sketch by Adela E. Orpen. "Little Peter and the Giant" is "a fable of the old-fashioned sort," by Jack Bennett. "How Janet Did It," by Katharine Festetitts, is a stirring narration of the way in which a little girl "brought up in the saddle," won a race at a riding-school. Kate Douglas Wiggin continues her story of "Polly Oliver's Problem," and many other good things go to make up a magazine that is in every way unique and unexcelled.

The Century Company, Union Square, New York.

The complete novel in the February issue of LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE is entitled "The First Flight," by Julien Gordon. It deals satirically with the ambitions of a daughter of wealthy parents, not quite to "the manor born" socially. The Journalist Series is continued in an interesting article by Hon. John Russell Young, on "Men Who Reigned: Bennett, Greeley, Raymond, Prentice and Forney." Portraits of these famous editors are added, and one of Secretary Seward accompanies "Recollections of Seward and Lincoln," by James Matlack Scovil. In the Athletic Series, Herman F. Wolff gives an account of "Wrestling," of which he is one of the most eminent professors. It is illustrated, as is Charles Morris' description of "New Philadelphia." Karl Blind, a well-known authority on the politics of the Old World, discusses "The Russian Approach to India." Miriam Coles Harris, the author of "Rutledge," criticises "Seventh Commandment Novels," and maintains that fiction gives undue predominance to the sexual relation. Under the heading "An Organ and a Reform," Frederic M. Bird calls attention to "The Pagan Review," and its plans, and discusses the question, "Are Women Free and Equal?" M. Crofton, in "Men of the Day," describes Ruskin, Earl Rosebery, Archbishop Ireland and Justice Lamar. "Josiah Allen's Wife" supplies a short story, "Josiah's Alarm," and Francis Wilson a sketch, "The Firstborn of the Orchard." The poetry of the number is by Ella Wheeler Wilcox, Daniel L. Dawson, Charles Washington Coleman, Floy Campbell, Charlotte Fiske Bates, C. L. Whitney and E. W. Latimer (from the French of "Hippolyte Lucas").

Absolutely free from all injurious substances.

ABSOLUTELY ODOR-LESS.

A Sanitary Necessity

A large per cent of sickness among women and children is attributed to the use of out-door closets in cold weather. Necessity for improvement has led to many inventions; earth closets, etc., all comparative failures; they have been too complicated, too expensive, not odorless, etc. Our

Patent Ventilated Cabinet or Bedroom Commode

overcomes all objections. It is absolutely odorless, and can be set up in any room having a chimney or stove pipe, by anyone. Needs no expensive plumbing, costs nothing to keep in order. It is endorsed by doctors and users, who say it is a

Boon to Women and Children

Affords all the comforts and conveniences of the most elaborate water closets without deadly sewer gas. Particularly desirable for the country and small towns where there are no sewers. The effect on health is so great and the expense so little that every family should have one. Made of hardwood, panelled, finished in antique, with galvanized buckets—will not corrode—and all necessary piping, elbows and thimbles, complete, price $12.00. Guaranteed as represented or money refunded. We refer to this publication as to our responsibility. This commode is not a luxury, it is a necessity, and a "saver of doctor bills." Send for free descriptive pamphlet.

United States Government

World's Fair Souvenir Coins—

The Official Souvenir of the Great Exposition—

5,000,000 of which were donated to the World's Columbian Exposition by the Government, are being rapidly taken by an enthusiastically patriotic people.

As there early promised to be a demand for these Souvenirs that would render them very valuable in the hands of speculators, the Exposition Authorities decided to place the price at and sell them direct to the people, thus realizing $5,000,000, and using the additional money for the further development of the Fair.

Considering the fact that there were but 5,000,000 of these coins to be distributed amomg 65,000,000 people, in this country alone (to say nothing of the foreign demand,) and that many have already been taken, those wishing to purchase these mementoes of our Country's Discovery and of the grandest Exposition ever held, should secure as many as they desire at once.

For Sale Everywhere

Realizing that every patriotic American will want one or more of these coins, and in order to make it convenient for him to get them, we have made arrangements to have them sold throughout the country by all the leading Merchants and Banks. If not for sale in your town, send $1.00 each for not less than five coins, by Post-office or Express Money-order, Registered Letter or Bank Draft, with instructions how to send them to you, all charges prepaid, to

THE UNION SIGNAL

Since December 15, has been publishing articles on "Reform Forces, and How They Unite," from the pens of noted leaders of reform movements. G. M. Miller, Chairman of the National Reformers, gave first article of the series, and has been followed by Gen. Neal Dow, Mary T. Lathrap, Amos Wells, B. O. Flower, Gen. Jno. Bidwell, Clara C. Hoffman, E. Evans, H. A. Scomp, and Rev. H. A. Delano. Wide attention has been attracted to these opinions of men who speak with the authority of active workers in reform movements. A leading Massachusetts man writes: "I drop your paper to ask you to reprint Gen. Bidwell's letter in leaflet form, for ten thousand homes would be better for reading it. Every true man can say Gen. Bidwell is right, and may I, in thought, word and act, be right also. I will give your price for these leaflets for distribution."

THE UNION SIGNAL

For this week contains articles on Reform Movements from Rev. D. C. Kelley, D. D., the Prohibition candidate for Governor of Tennessee in 1890, and from Joseph Rodes Buchanan, M. D.; an admirable setting forth of Practicable Socialism, by C. H. Zimmerman, whose articles on Taxation in our columns last summer established his power as a thinker on socialistic questions.

Miss Willard, and other leading reformers, will yet contribute their quota to the all-absorbing reform issues. Mrs. Ole Bull and Mrs. Mary Hinman-Abel, noted specialists, will publish valuable articles in on Scientific Nutrition in Cooking, and interesting sketches of noted women, as well as leading English issues, will be each week presented from the pens of distinguished writers.

Grand New Flowers, Vegetables and Fruits.

The King of Ornamental Plants is the Weeping or Filifera Palm. It is stately and beautiful beyond description. It can be grown in any window as easily as a Geranium, and is a superb addition to any collection of plants. It is of a compact growth, with elegant large fan-shaped leaves from which hang long, thread-like filaments giving the plant a most odd and beautiful appearance. In fact, there is nothing like it in cultivation. Plants are easily raised, as the seeds germinate quickly and grow rapidly. For only 30c we will send by mail, postpaid, all of the following:

5 Seeds of this lovely WEEPING FILIFERA PALM. Its chaste beauty will astonish you.
1 pkt. PEACOCK PANSY, the grandest of all. Charming peacock colors of unrivaled beauty.
1 pkt. DATURA SWEET NIGHTINGALE, enormous sweet lily-like blossoms, 10 inches long, pure white.
1 pkt. TREE COCKSCOMB, plants grow several feet high and bear many enormous heads of bloom.
1 pkt. VERBENA PRIZE WHITE, lovely large trusses, snow white and exceedingly fragrant.
1 pkt. TOMATO MIXED HYBRIDS, every color, shape and size is represented. A unique novelty.
3 Bulbs GLADIOLUS, beautiful named sorts, 1 white, 1 pink, 1 scarlet, all superb varieties.
1 Bulb TUBEROSE, DOUBLE DWARF EXCELSIOR PEARL, enormous spikes of elegant waxy blossoms.
1 Bulb ZEPHYR FLOWER lovely free bloomer; large blossoms of exquisite beauty.
1 Bulb CINNAMON VINE, fine hardy climber, and our superb BRONZE BLUE, Catalogue of 156 pages and 7 Magnificent Large Colored Plates. All the above for only 30 cts. postpaid. These rare bulbs and seeds (worth $1.25) will all flower this season, and we send them for 30c., only to introduce our superior stock. Get your neighbors to send with you, and we will send four of these collections for $1. Order at once, as this offer may not appear again.

Signal Notes.

A FIRM of women tea merchants in London carry on their entire business, with women blenders, tasters, packers and agents.

IF the Gothenburg system regulates the drink traffic, why is it that but two nations exceed Sweden in the amount of alcohol consumed?

WHILE the population of Scotland has increased but thirty-seven per cent since 1858, the lunatics have increased one hundred and sixteen per cent.

AN educated, but not a Christian, Hindoo woman uttered this touching plea: "My prayer and supplication are, 'Oh, God, let no more women be born in India.'"

THE Christian Union believes there is no reason for scorning the Prohibition vote, because every voter means an agitator, and because they are supported by the non-voters in the W. C. T. U.

NEW YORK spends about one million dollars a year on its charities and over five million on its police force. With such a record it would seem that the Kingdom of God is still far away from New York.

A MICHIGAN woman has invented and patented glass doors for the cook-stoves, so that no more fingers need be burned in the opening and shutting of oven doors to watch the turkey brown and the bread rise.

THE present day furnishes a peculiar sight in this enlightened country. A man in the state's prison for stealing your purse while he was crazy with drink, while the man who sold him the drink has a seat in the legislature.

LA MARECHALE in reporting the enrollment of one thousand two hundred and forty soldiers in France says that it is difficult to realize the difficulties encountered in their work, but the conversions among the Catholics are especially encouraging.

THE Woman's Club of Philadelphia, with headquarters in the new Century Club Building, rents out the drawing-room occasionally to others wishing to give an entertainment, but with the rule that "no intoxicating beverage shall be served at any entertainment given therein."

AN English physician says that every man who comes to the front in his profession in London is marked by one characteristic, viz: That the more busy he gets, the less in the shape of alcohol he takes and his excuse is "I am very sorry, but I cannot take it and do my work."

IT is said that a young man in Boston spends three nights each week, between eleven and one, in caring for homeless, starving cats by putting them out of misery. Such devotion of time might accomplish much for homeless, vagrant children, but they could not be disposed of so easily.

THE libraries for the blind are not confined to the Bible and some school books, as many people think, but include books of travel, fiction, biography, science, besides editions of the poets, and of music. There are raised maps for general and Biblical study, also star maps for blind astronomers.

THE English Miners' Federation, at the Birmingham Convention in January, voted in favor of a compulsory eight hour law. It is said that this is one of the most important events which has happened of late in the English labor world. The federation numbers one hundred and ten thousand and will soon be joined by about eighty thousand Welsh miners.

THERE is every evidence to prove that the ancient Egyptian women were highly regarded and that a kind of higher education prevailed among them. They transacted business, bequeathed property and acted as regents. Some one has remarked that they must have been good home-makers for the portraits and statues of Egyptian men represent them with a happy, good-natured expression.

People Who Sing

And people who talk in public, clergymen, lecturers, elocutionists, etc., have found Drs. Starkey & Palen's Compound Oxygen of far greater value than any other thing intended for the throat and vocal chords. Unlike all the preparations made for their use, Compound Oxygen increases the power of the respiratory organs and so gives strength and power to the voice. It is also permanent in its effects, and therefore has the great advantage of making them much less liable to hoarseness and loss of voice, with all that this implies to public speakers and singers. Not a single person who has tried Compound Oxygen for this purpose but has been benefitted and pleased. But they must be sure they have the genuine Compound Oxygen, for which address Drs. Starkey & Palen, 1529 Arch street, Philadelphia, or Chicago, San Francisco, New York, and Toronto, Ont.

A Sensational Story

has attracted attention lately, but as a matter of fact the public has also devoted time to things substantial, judging by the unprecedented sales of the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk. Unequalled as a food for infants. Sold by Grocers and Druggists.

AND WORLD'S WHITE RIBBON.

FOR GOD AND HOME AND EVERY LAND — WORLD'S WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION FOUNDED 1883

"THOU HAST GIVEN A BANNER TO THEM THAT FEAR THEE; THAT IT MAY BE DISPLAYED BECAUSE OF THE TRUTH."

Volume XIX. CHICAGO, February 23, 1893. Number 8

SELF-DENIAL WEEK, APRIL 3-10.

Each white ribboner the world over is asked to deny herself something to which she is accustomed, and give the money that would have been used in its purchase to the treasury of the World's W. C. T. U., sending the same through the authorized channels to the treasurer of her nation, asking her to send it to Mrs. Ella F. M. Williams, 26 Chomedy St., Montreal, Canada.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

A bill has been introduced in the Texas legislature to legalize lynching.

The pension appropriation bill was passed by the House, February 17.

Debate upon Premier Gladstone's Irish Home Rule Bill continues in the British Parliament.

The nineteenth annual convention of Minnesota Y. M. C. A. was held in Winona last week.

Three hundred delegates attended the first Epworth League convention of Wisconsin, February 16.

The annual meeting of the National Educational Association commenced its two days' session in Boston, February 21.

Pope Leo XIII, aged eighty-three, celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his Episcopate, by a golden jubilee, February 19.

The inquiry into the Whisky Trust began in Washington, D. C., last week by a sub-committee of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Hawaiian annexation treaty was signed by President Harrison and transmitted to the Senate, February 15, in company with the protest of Queen Liliuokalani.

Hundreds of telegrams have been sent from the loyal citizens of Evanston, Ill., to the state legislature protesting against the proposed repeal of their four-mile prohibition law.

Washington's birthday was universally celebrated as a legal holiday and by appropriate exercises, February 22. In Chicago the Rev. Edward Everett Hale, of Boston, was the orator of the day.

A bill has been introduced into the Illinois legislature, to fine any manufacturer convicted of using drugs or other substances to produce an imitation of pure, distilled or malt liquors.

The investigation of sweat-shop evils has continued in Chicago during the past week, a popular mass-meeting of laborers to denounce the system taking place in Central Music Hall, February 19.

The past week has witnessed a terrible bloodless riot in Kansas between the Republican and Populist forces, for possession of the state house. The Populist governor ordered out the state militia, which refused to carry out his commands because of their Republican proclivities.

A bill was introduced in the Indiana state legislature, February 17, entitled, "To prevent the importation and sale in Indiana of the crinoline hoop skirt," the fine for violating the law to be not more than one thousand dollars or less than one hundred dollars and imprisonment of not less than thirty days.

Cleveland's cabinet appointments are announced as follows: Judge Walter Q. Gresham, of Illinois, Secretary of State; Hon. J. G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, Secretary of of Treasury; Col. Daniel Lamont, of New York, Secretary War; Wilson S. Bissell, of New York, Postmaster-General; Hoke Smith, of Georgia, Secretary of the Interior; John E. Russell, of Massachusetts, Secretary of the Navy; George W. Jenks, of Pennsylvania, Attorney-General, and J. Sterling Morton, Secretary of Agriculture.

THE beautiful song written by Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson, corresponding secretary of Massachusetts W. C. T. U., and entitled "We Belong" has been sung with a hearty good will by choir and audience in all of the meetings held by Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Willard in England and Scotland. This song is in the new edition of Anna Gordon's "White Ribbon Hymnal." We hope this will become a household song through all our borders.

HERE is a practical and opportune suggestion for circulating the World's Petition, sent by Mrs. Lillian S. Wells, of Tampa, Fla.: "As the time is necessarily short for circulating the World's Petition our union has decided to give petitions out to fifty school children to circulate and to offer three prizes, two dollars, one dollar and a half, and one dollar, respectively, to the three children obtaining the three largest number of signatures. On March 15, or there about, the fifty will be invited to partake of refreshments and the prizes will be awarded. Where there are Loyal Temperance Legions such an offer would be an incentive to work, and large numbers of signatures might be obtained which could not be otherwise secured."

ON the 23d of February, the date of this issue, Lady Henry Somerset's new paper will be first issued. Mr. Edwin Stout, one of the most capable journalistic writers and managers in London will have charge of the details and Lady Henry will be editor-in-chief. The name of the paper will be: Woman's Herald—For God and Home and Native Land, and the paper will aim to do for the white ribbon movement in Great Britain what THE UNION SIGNAL is doing for it in the world at large. Miss Willard will be one of the chief contributors. The paper will be published weekly at Mowbray House, Norfolk street, Strand, London, (headquarters of the Review of Reviews) at one dollar per year, the same price as THE UNION SIGNAL.

IT seems very strange that various newspapers and people not in sympathy with the temperance movement like so well to reiterate the falsehoods regarding Lady Henry Somerset controlling public houses in London. The irassertions would make her partner in the transactions of these houses, especially those transactions which have to do with liquor-selling. The facts in the case are these: Lady Henry cannot touch one of these buildings any more than if it belonged to another person, until the lease falls in. She holds the property only in trust, under trustees. Entailed estates do not leave the freedom that outright ownership gives. It seems unnecessary to say anything in defense of one who is acknowledged by all good people to be single-hearted in working for the good of humanity; and it almost goes without saying that Lady Henry Somerset is doing all in her power toward annihilating rather than fostering the liquor traffic.

ANOTHER effort to unite Christian voters against our common enemy, the saloon, has its birthplace in Normal, Ill., and is known as the "Independent Christian Voters' League of America," incorporated December 3, 1892. The members of this organization pledge themselves to vote always and only for candidates who are known to be and have avowed themselves opposed to the saloon in all its forms, "reserving the right of individual preference." We welcome this and any effort which tends to unite our Christian forces against the saloon. And it follows as the night the day that the voter who honestly wishes to free our country from the domination of the liquor power, will learn that the candidates of the Prohibition party are the only ones who will uphold his principles and for whom he can consistently cast his vote. That this new Christian Voters' League may prove a compromise, tending to a complete conversion, is the wish of the mothers, wives and daughters of the white-ribbon host.

IN view of the fact that the sketch of Miss Jennie Casseday did not arrive in time for this week's paper, we give here a few extracts from leading Louisville journals, showing the high regard in which the dear worker was regarded in her native town. Says one:

"Many have died and been buried in Louisville, men known as warriors, statesmen and philanthropists, but it remained for a woman to receive in death the greatest expression of sorrow. The immense crowd that gathered to mourn her departure to a better world was but a fitting tribute to a woman, who, from a bed of suffering, has made her influence for good felt from one end of the country to the other." And another: "Louisville mourns her most useful citizen; the poor have lost their truest friend; earth has given up one of its grandest heroines, and heaven has gained as pure, gentle and great a spirit as ever toiled for God or man." And still another: "The late Jennie Casseday erected monuments more enduring than those of brass or marble. Generations yet unborn will call her blessed, while upon the hearts of thousands now living her name and memory are indelibly engraved."

THE pastor who will coolly and pointedly talk political temperance into the hearts and minds of his congregation on the eve of an election is a motive power in the advancement of our cause. No special eloquence need be his, for the plain and simple statement of the facts is a ringing denunciation of the great evil. And if that congregation be largely composed of Christian voters, they will surely be led to see that their real duty is to vote for principle and not for party. A Methodist minister, of Minneapolis, previous to the last campaign, told his large and intent audience of prominent Christian people, "The liquor question is a question which so directly affects the Christianization of the nation, which has such fearful bearing upon the question of the reign of Jesus Christ in the nation, that you have no business whatever to vote with any party unless it is your solemn and prayerful conviction, that the party with which you cast your vote constitutes the most practical way to kill the liquor business." Carefully considered and thoughtfully weighed arguments from the pulpit on the drink traffic are a vital part of the bread of life which should be administered from the pulpits of the nations.

AN occasion of great rejoicing to all lovers of woman's advancement is the noble action of the Wyoming legislators last Thursday, February 16. The unanimous adoption by a body of men, of the unqualified success of woman suffrage for the past twenty-five years is the strongest indorsement possible. And coming just at this time, when the enemies of the franchise have been demanding a retraction of the privilege, it is an event of no ordinary significance. Here is the resolution in full: cut it out and send to every doubting Thomas:

"Be it resolved by the legislature of the state of Wyoming: That the possession and exercise of suffrage by the women in Wyoming for the past quarter of a century has wrought no harm and has done great good in many ways; that it has largely aided in banishing crime, pauperism and vice from this state and that without any violent or oppressive legislation; that it has secured peaceful and orderly elections, good government and a remarkable degree of civilization and public order, and we point with pride to the fact that after nearly twenty-five years of woman suffrage not one county in Wyoming has a poorhouse, that our jails are almost empty, and crime, except that by strangers in the state, almost unknown, and as the result of experience we urge every civilized community on the earth to enfranchise its women without delay.

"Resolved, That an authenticated copy of these resolutions be forwarded by the governor of the state to the legislature of every state and territory in this country and to every legislative body in the world; and that we request the press throughout the civilized world to call the attention of their readers to these resolutions."

MID-DAY.

BY JOSEPH COOK.

TUNE—Louvan.

From God I come, to God I go;
He made the east; he made the west;
High, holy noon, transform me so
That I may find in radiance rest.

Pilgrim between two ocean strands,
I see both shores of narrow time;
I hear Atlantic lash its sands,
The far Pacific flames sublime.

Vast outlook from life's Andes' height
Includes the broad Brazilian plain,
But brings Peruvian shores in sight,
And sunset's line beyond the main.

At morn as fast the sun ascends,
At noon as fast moves toward the west
As when at last his journey ends,
And he in glory speeds to rest.

O wealth of noon! O Andes' height!
I lift my anthem to the sky,
And praise the God of noon and night
For life and all its mystery.

God fills all skies. All things are mine
If I am His who moves my sun,
And when it cuts the ocean line
Its day in God is but begun.

Sung as a prelude to Rev. Joseph Cook's tribute to Phillips Brooks.

CONVINCED.

BY IMOGENE ANDERSON.

"But I believe in personal work. I believe that when the Lord Jesus Christ walked among men, that was the kind of work He did, and you and I can do no better than to follow His example."

The speaker, Mr. Tilly, was a somewhat angular young English lawyer, having a smooth face, a bright intelligent eye, and a set expression about his mouth, indicating that he had opinions of his own, which he, at least, was bound to respect. His dress was that of an ordinary business man, with the exception of his boots. These were decidedly English, made of cowhide, and sadly needed the blacking brush. Whenever he became in earnest in his talk, he had a peculiar habit of screwing himself around sidewise in his chair, crossing his legs, and looking for all the world like a raw school-boy, with this exception; the school-boy is always painfully aware of his awkwardness, and Mr. Tilly apparently was not. He had been in America several years, and had just hung out his sign in Chicago. While waiting for clients—financially he was in no need of them—he had been studying "How the Other Half Lives."

The rest of the group, gathered in that cozy sitting-room of one of Chicago's elegant West Side homes, were Mr. Stanley, the owner, a jolly little fellow—little up and down, but wide out; Mrs. Stanley, tall, cultured, interesting, a member of the Chicago Central W. C. T. U. and an active worker in their many philanthropic enterprises; and their friend and guest, Mrs. Fitch, a sunny-haired, sunny-natured little woman, and a state officer in a far west W. C. T. U.

Mr. Tilly had met the Stanleys in some of their travels about two years before, and a mutual appreciation had strengthened into friendship. He had dropped in for the evening. One of his first questions had been, "Where is Miss Mamie?"

And Mr. Stanley, with a twinkle in his eyes, had replied: "Oh, young Bosworth has taken her out for some lessons in physical culture. In other words, she has gone skating."

Only a keen observer could have detected the shade of momentary disappointment in Mr. Tilly's face, for he turned at once to Mrs. Stanley, with the remark: "You are worth half a dozen silly girls to help a fellow pass away the time, and if you are not going out this evening I think I will stay and enjoy myself."

"Thank you, Mr. Tilly, thank you. No, we are not going out, and I think that my friend and I can make it rather lively for you and Mr. Stanley."

"Yes," added that gentleman, "I am glad you came to help me out. We had been getting on to pretty dangerous ground when you came in. Politics. And you know what cranks these white-ribboners are when they get on to politics. There is Mrs. Stanley, a very sensible woman in most respects, but for some reason she can't or won't see that you cannot legislate men into the kingdom of heaven."

"And there is Mr. Stanley, a very sensible man in most respects, but for some reason he cannot or will not see that the men in authority in our city, state and nation are 'framing mischief by law,' and by their legislation making the way to national corruption just as slippery as possible for the people."

After a general laugh the conversation took a turn, and an hour and a half flew swiftly and pleasantly by. Mr. Tilly was in one of his happiest moods, and kept his hearers in high humor by his description of his English home and boyhood pranks. Finally something was said which again started a discussion on the temperance question (for that question seems to have a faculty of bobbing up very frequently where two or three white-ribboners are gathered), and Mr. Tilly made the remark quoted at the beginning of this narrative.

"So do I believe in personal work, Mr. Tilly," answered Mrs. Fitch, "but I do not believe that you and I have quite the same idea of the meaning of those two words."

"Well, Mrs. Fitch, what I mean is hand to hand, heart to heart contact with humanity. This is what is going to save it, if it ever is saved. Only last night I was down at Colonel Clark's Mission, and as I heard the prayers and testimonies and singing—no such singing as we have in our up-town churches—but chords and discords right from the hearts of those besotted, fallen creatures, I felt that here was the solving of the problem, how to save the masses."

"I agree with you perfectly, your ideas are all right as far as they go; but do you think that you have done all the personal work, if you wish to put it that way, that you can for a man when you get him in one of those mission meetings crying for forgiveness, and then turn him loose with his old-time appetite and diseased body, into a street fairly reeking with the fumes of the alcohol which brought him to his present condition? Your own Gladstone said, 'It is the duty of government to make it as easy as possible for men to do right and as hard as possible for men to do wrong,' and I do not see how this can be done except by your personal influence and personal votes for men who will put their personality into the laws which they make. And right here, I want to refer to a remark Mr. Stanley made in the early part of the evening, in regard to legislating men into heaven. Such a thing is, of course, impossible, but I believe, and so do you, Mr. Stanley, that if we could elect men who would pass laws abolishing the manufacture of strong drink, our harvest of souls at the mission and in the churches would be so great that some of us, out of sheer surprise, would be constrained to say, 'The Kingdom of Heaven is here.'"

"Mr. Tilly, I am too good a Republican to answer that argument, but I think that you, from the standpoint of an Englishman, might have something to say," laughingly replied Mr. Stanley.

"But I have not. She has given me some entirely new ideas and I will have to think them over before I try to answer."

At this juncture, voices were heard outside: "Good-night Mr. Bosworth, I have had a delightful evening."

"Thank you. Good night, Miss Stanley."

The door bell rang and the next minute Mr. Stanley let in his rosy-cheeked daughter.

A medium-sized, brown-eyed young lady, about twenty-five years of age, a graduate of Mount Holyoke, quite an extensive traveler, a well-bred, fluent talker, a typical Chicago business woman, and a sweet Christian describes her very well. As she stands there, for she is too excited over her skating to sit down, one cannot help but be thankful that the girl of to-day, in all her physical beauty and development, is getting away from the bonds and strictures which enveloped her grandmothers.

To Mr. Tilly, with his English notions, she is quite a study, and for the rest of the evening he has neither eyes nor ears for any one save her who, two hours before he had included in the general term, "silly girl."

After giving a racy description of the evening's fun, with one of her abrupt transitions she said: "Maud Brayton and two others are on duty to-night, and to-morrow night it is my turn."

To Mrs. Fitch's look of inquiry she explained that on Thursday evenings, for two years, she had, with two others, taken her "turn" at the newsboys' home on South Clark street—that black hole of Chicago. They let the boys pay ten cents a week, so that each felt he had a sort of ownership in it. There was a reading-room and a game-room. The little fellows always seemed delighted when they saw the "teacher" coming, for then they knew it was time to open the doors.

"How late do you keep open?" inquired Mrs. Fitch.

"Oh, half past ten, eleven, twelve, sometimes it is nearly one o'clock before we close. You see many of them have nowhere else to go, except the saloons, when we shut them out, and some one is always sure to beg us to keep open just a little longer."

Mrs. Fitch, in her good-natured way, was always ready to moralize, and turning to Mrs. Stanley she said: "It seems to me that your daughter is a living example of what Miss Willard calls 'the newest idea in philanthropy—the giving of one's self.'"

"I say, Stanley," began Mr. Tilly, "It seems to me that your daughter is a living example of my pet theory or personal work."

"I know your ideas on that subject," flashed Miss Mamie back with vigor; "but I wish to say that if these legalized traps for men were done away with in this city, my boys would have homes of their own instead of having to depend upon us to provide a transient shelter."

Without heeding her remark, Mr. Tilly put in the plea: "May I go with you to-morrow night? You know that I am making a study of some of your social problems this winter."

In a careless tone she replied: "Oh, yes, if you wish; but I am afraid you will find it a rather disagreeable place for one of your fastidious habits. My boys are not always the cleanest in the world."

The next evening he was there at the appointed hour. They took a carette which jolted them along past the beautiful residence portion of the city, on and on past hurrying crowds, past saloons and decorated windows, past all sorts of signs guaranteeing amusement within. Miss Mamie finally signaled the driver to stop and they climbed out, still several blocks from their destination. They hurried along over the slippery walks, sometimes jostled by a drunken man or woman, nearly every door passed being a saloon or some vile den. It scarcely seemed possible to Mr. Tilly, accustomed as he was to the ways of the world, that so much sin and degradation could be not only tolerated but condoned in a Christian American city. His ideas on personal work were expanding. He had other thoughts, too, which made him clasp his companion's arm tightly. She looked at him inquiringly. She had almost forgotten his presence in trying to see some of her boys among the motley crowd.

"Do you think it is safe for a girl like you, in such a place as this, even with an escort? It makes my heart almost stand still, to think of what might happen to you." There was a strange earnestness in his tones which she has never heard before and which sent a thrill through her. For the first time in thier long acquaintance she dared not look him in the eyes Turning her head, she answered:

"Don't worry about that, I am not the least bit afraid. They all know me here and there is a sort of honor among them that protects me. The Bethesda Mission is just beyond and a little white-ribbon woman has gone down there night after night, for years. They know we are here because we love them and want to help them."

They were now in front of the "Imperial Sample Rooms." Entering a side door they passed through a passage-way saturated with whisky fumes, and on up a flight of back stairs to the boys' room. Her two confrères were already there and the game-room was filled. Miss Mamie was hailed with noisy delight. She passed, at once, into the reading-room, where several of the older ones were supplied with books and had settled themselves for the evening, being first assured by her that she would not read aloud that night.

Mr. Tilly drew his chair up by the librarian, and in an undertone, so as not to disturb the readers, he said: "Miss Mamie, I have always preached against the political part of your mother's beloved temperance work; but I see to-night that such institutions as this and Col. Clark's Mission and the Keeley Cure, are but as drops in the bucket against all this legalized tide of sin, made enticing for even little children. From this time forth I shall be a stronger advocate than ever of personal work, such as was done by our blessed Master; but I shall also insist that Jesus Christ go to the legislature and to Congress."

While he had been speaking in low, thrilling tones his hand had reached out and clasped hers. "I intend to be an aggressive worker," he continued, but just then his eyes caught those of two boys who dodged behind their books as he looked up. Dick whispered:

"I say, Bill, I bet that's the teacher's feller."

"Well, I hope he's a good 'un, but he'd better not be takin' her away from us. We have fust claim, don't us?"

At 11:45 Bill and Dick and all the rest had vacated, and for some reason the slow carette did not seem long jolting its way back to distant West Adams street. But the next evening Mr. Stanley concluded a rather lengthy private interview with Mr. Tilly with the caution: "You'll find Mamie is like her mother, very sensible in most ways, but in regard to mission work and politics, you'd better let her do as she pleases. I've found that's the easiest, and I don't know but they are right, after all."

THERE may be a root of righteousness of life that is deeper than the root of evil. Though it be not our discovery, it may be discovered to us. The conviction of sin may come with the conviction of righteousness and with the discrimination of evil in the judgment, that is, the coming of the light.—Elisha Mulford.

UNION OF REFORMERS.

BY FRANCES E. WILLARD.

The way for reformers to get together is just to—get together.

Three or five leaders of each movement—temperance, labor, woman suffrage, etc., should meet and make up a consensus of opinion, studying their points of agreement and making their results known to their respective guilds. Then let this consensus go before the executive committee of each guild, and by them let a more general conference be called.

The very effort at such a rapprochement creates a more harmonious atmosphere of thought, feeling and volition; smooths away asperities; promotes a better understanding and the fellowship that must evermore be based upon such understanding, and will lead toward what we all desire—such a massing of the forces of reform as shall make results for humanity assured within the next decade, and bring on the time of hope—"when the mists have cleared away."

COLUMBIAN CRUMBS.

BY B. V. CUSHMAN, M. D.

ANOTHER SOUVENIR COIN.

The special object of Mrs. Palmer's recent visit to Washington was to lay before the appropriation committee of Congress her plan of a souvenir coin commemorative of Queen Isabella's part in the discovery of America. As the entire Exposition is monumental to Columbus, it seems proper that the Board of Lady Managers should devise a way of acknowledging and perpetuating in memory the services of the Spanish queen.

The ladies have submitted their spring shopping list to Uncle Samuel, with approximate cost of items, and the amount is $98,400. They ask that whatever the appropriation be, $10,000 of it be in souvenir coins of the denomination of twenty-five cent pieces. The design they submit has upon one side the head of Queen Isabella, and on the reverse side the Woman's building, the latter being emblematic of the honor conferred upon women by Congress in making a board of women part of the Exposition management, also of the recognition given the industries of women.

HISTORIC STATE BUILDINGS.

Most of the state buildings represent a history as well as a purpose. New Jersey proves her patriotism by modeling hers after Washington's headquarters at Morristown during the winter of 1779-80. There Alexander Hamilton spent the long winter, and if traditional romance be true, there he met the lady he afterward married. That roof had covered such men as Lafayette and Kosciusko, "Light Horse" Harry Lee and Israel Putnam and Benedict Arnold. A bronze statue of Washington, from the same model as the one cast for the site of the battle of Trenton, is to be placed in front of the New Jersey building. No exhibits will be displayed there, but it will be used for the offices of the directors from the state, and as a club house for visitors.

Californians will be "at home" in a copy of one of the old Dominican Mission chapels of southern California. It is a one-story structure crowned with a large flat dome. Roof gardens will heighten the semi-tropical effect. It is one of the largest of the state buildings, being 500 by 110 feet upon the ground, and eighty feet to the central elevation of the dome. Schmidt's colossal figure of California will be inside, for which it is the proud boast that one of her own fair daughters furnished the faultless model. The California room of the Woman's building promises to be one of the most beautiful also. The paneling is furnished by the redwood lumber dealers, and two thousand dollars has been raised to pay experts for carving and graining. The cactus will dominate the decorations, appearing nearest its state of nature in the cut glass windows where the glowing effects of the cactus country are marvelously reproduced. The panel designs follow, in a free way, those in vogue in Spain four hundred years ago. In this room as in all others, the mirror is the center of feminine art—no pun intended—and the choicest works cluster about it. It is placed under the exquisite redwood mantel, over which is a panel with the great shield of the state, carved in fine relief. On the floor before it is the biggest grizzly bear skin ever grown in the state, and near by, upon an onyx pedestal, a bust of Mary Anderson, attests the honor in which the gifted dramatist is held by the women of her native state.

The ruined palace of Mitla is rebuilt for Mexican headquarters in Midway Plaisance, furnishing an interesting model of American "ancient architecture." How the denizens of the hoary East will smile at our "old" things!

THE VIKING SHIP.

Storm-hardened Norsemen are not to be outdone by sun-bred Spaniards in bravery on sea or land, and so it happens that the chiefs of the transportation exhibit are notified to expect in April the arrival of a fac simile of the craft in which Lief Ericson sailed from Norway to the New England coast. The building of the boat, to arrive here in the spring if wind and wave permit, has a history highly flavored with romance. In the winter of 1879-80 a Norwegian sailor amused himself with exploration of a sand hill in the outskirts of Sandefjord, which had long been known as "Kingsmound"; and was reputed to be the burial place of a viking and his earthly possessions, which of course included a ship. Experts from the Royal University in Christiania came out to investigate, and decided that the vessel exhumed and in fairly good state of preservation, was of the build of nine hundred years ago. In it was the skeleton of a man, encased in armor and surrounded with oars and other necessities of navigation in his day. Since that time the viking ship has been one of the choicest relics of the University. It is now reproduced and will be equipped as for the storm-kings of a thousand years ago. The beam is sixteen and a quarter feet and there are thirty-two oars, each seventeen feet long. Little sail is carried, as the sturdy old mariners preferred to depend upon the oars in their own strong hands, rather than to wait upon the caprice of the wind. Twenty picked men under command of Magnus Anderson, the modern viking, all in ancient costume, will man the boat, starting for the World's Fair, without accompanying ship of any kind, and which, if the voyage be successful will reach Chicago by way of the Erie Canal and the great lakes.

RELICS, KNICKERBOCKER AND OTHERS.

Staten Island ladies are getting together a collection of relics of early settlers of Manhattan. Among them is a shirt of Peter Stuyvesant's and an infant dress of DeWitt Clinton's—the first governor of the state—also his family Bible. A file of early newspapers cannot fail to be interesting, especially when read in collation with the forty-page morning journals of present date. A silver communion service, presented by Queen Anne to the Moravian church of New York, will be loaned to this collection. British women are relic-hunting too, but unfortunately they are obliged in the main to content themselves with copies and fac similes which lack the interesting flavor of antiquity. Princess Christian will send her Bible, with an embroidered cover like the one Queen Bess' Bible wore. Of course a Bible is always "good" and "interesting," but I doubt if this book excites as much reverence, as the big, gilt-edged, honest-bound one we have seen under Mother Thompson's arm at our W. C. T. U. conventions. I doubt again if it or its royal prototype was ever read to so good purpose as was dear Mother Thompson's Crusade Bible.

SYSTEMATIC METHODS IN REFORM.

BY GRAHAM WALLIS.

[Verily London is the heart of the world, and no city throbs more warmly for humanity, notwithstanding the misery and sin that center in the world's metropolis. There is no home in all the city, with its six million of inhabitants, that is more truly a beacon-light of a better future than that of Mrs. Hannah Whitall Smith, or, as she is called in England, Mrs. R. Pearsall Smith. Her husband heartily seconds her work in every good cause, and forwards movements for the uplift of humanity to the extent of his power. Mrs. Smith declares that she knows no better illustration of practical, systematic methods of reform than are afforded by the white-ribbon army; that of all the societies with which she had ever been connected this is the one that most steadily and persistently seeks out the cause of the evils which it was instituted to cure. She suggests the value of establishing schools of method in England at which young men and women may learn what not to do and what to do in the work of philanthropy and reform, stating that the schools of method, now carried on in all parts of the United States by the W. C. T. U. are, to her mind, the best method of putting at the service of many the expert knowledge of the few.

On the 16th of December these good friends of philanthropy convened in their attractive home upon the Thames embankment, Westminster, a party of earnest-hearted men and women to listen to Mr. Graham Wallis, a young university man of fine presence, undoubted talent and devoted purpose. Mr. Wallis writes as well as speaks, and is known to the readers of some of our best magazines. He also studies and investigates the work of reform and philanthropic guilds in the endeavor to help found these movements on the principles of cause and effect. I give the following from notes—an outline of his suggestive lecture. FRANCES E. WILLARD.]

THEN AND NOW.

"Clara, Clara Vere de Vere,
If time be heavy on your hands,
Are there no beggars at your gate,
Nor any poor about your lands?
Oh, teach the orphan-boy to read,
Or teach the orphan girl to sew;
Pray heaven for a human heart,
And let the foolish yeoman go."

This was the concept of a great mind some fifty or sixty years ago. It was where the world then stood in its notion of philanthropy. I do not say that in these days we love our fellows more, nor that we are more intelligent in our methods of philanthropy, but we certainly go at it differently. The Clara Vere de Vere to-day would unite her forces with those of other women, equally good and intelligent, and endeavor to have wages raised or get up a Trades Union, so that those needing help could have the self-respecting opportunity of helping themselves. The beggar at her gate would not receive a shilling from her lily-white hand, but would be handed over to the associated charity committee who would take up the case, investigate it and do for him, not in one spasm of kindness but right along by a systematic plan, what it deemed best.

She would certainly not make an effort to teach the orphan boy to read, for Lady Clara Vere de Vere does not know how to teach, and should she try, the law would prevent her doing so because she has not had the necessary discipline. The orphan-boy would fall into very poor hands if she attempted to instruct him. If she took an interest in him it would be her business to see that a good school-board was elected, and expert teachers thoroughly trained to teach him after the most approved methods; nor would she dream of offering to teach the orphan girl to sew, for we have changed all that. The orphan-girl is as much to be taught to read as her brother, and what a good thing that is for the future homes of England, since the mothers of the race determine its future and its fate.

Now we can plainly see that a great change has come about, and a reasonable being naturally asks, why is it? Why do we not found our expectations for the less fortunate classes on the casual impulses of the so-called fortunate who live in our large houses? There is a reason—indeed there are many. I will mention one. In 1868 and 1870 we enlarged the suffrage in this country so that every man counts for one vote. This made every man of more value to the state than he had been; indeed, the state was to a degree dependent upon his intelligence and patriotism; therefore, by the laws of mind, the state could not do other than take this new citizenship in hand to educate it and improve its conditions. Indeed, this new citizenship had in its power the bringing about of these improvements for its own sake, so that the state and the individual played into each other's hands, having discovered that their interests were practically the same. Nothing else could have brought this new perception into the brain of the voter and the government. And it is believed in these modern days to be of more importance that the average citizen-voter, nay, even the lowest citizen, should be improved in his education and belongings rather than that Lady Clara Vere de Vere, by the old-fashioned process of charity, might secure for herself a "human heart."

Another reason is that scientific principles are now at the top. We have learned to study causes, to follow out the natural method rather than the artificial. We now believe that in order to be of the highest value to the state, men must live in comfortable houses, they must have a shorter day's work and the chance of making the most of themselves. The industrial development of this age, the opening up of new areas of country and the wonderful progress of invention have put skilled labor at a premium. Suppose that in the day that Tennyson wrote his poem, Lady Clara Vere de Vere had lost her fortune, and had been obliged to become self-supporting, what would she have done? She would have tried to be a nurse or teacher. These were about the only vocations open to which she could have turned her hand, but she would have been exceedingly sensitive on the subject of salary and not have allowed it to be mentioned except in the most roundabout manner.

How is it now? If a lady of fortune becomes self-dependent and she decides to be a nurse, she goes directly to a professional school, makes herself informed as to the latest methods of conducting that art; or, if she is to be a teacher, she takes a course of study severe and thorough. In fact she knows it will not answer to be a mere dilettante; if she would succeed it must be as a professional. Amateur work is going out, expert work is coming in. A lady of fortune will be proud to be a skilled professional and will accept her check at the end of the month with perfect frankness, indeed, with not a little of self-congratulation.

In view of these wonderful over-turnings the whole subject of charity has taken on a new aspect. Here in London it is perhaps more complicated than in any other city on the globe, for it consists of a conglomeration of great towns under entirely different governmental auspices. For instance, the areas of the school boards in any given district of London are under altogether different management and are in themselves different area from those of the associated charities, the vestry union, the state charity, hospitals, work-houses and insane asylums. If nine or ten athletic spiders were dipped in different colored paints and had set out to travel over a card-board of large size they would arrive at about as satisfactory a map of London, in respect to the location of its different areas of supervision, as now exist.

So of the inside of this great London, it is only known that it has a heavy indigestion. Rates, medical officers and school boards and so forth, are talked about but with a feeling that these are subjects it would be rather better not to refer to at the dinner-table—because they are too disagreeable. Now out of all this chaos, the honest, hard work of experts must before many years bring a cosmos of simple, direct and understandable administration, but this will have in it very little of romance.

The changes that have taken place in our charities might be further illustrated by an analogy. In former times the patriot who would fight for his country imagined himself moving forward at a brisk pace, waving a sword in his hand in the midst of ambushed enemies; but to-day nobody carries a sword except a few of the leading officers, and they do so, not that they expect to come near enough to the enemy to use such a weapon, but for the purpose of pointing the men to their positions in the field. It is batteries and not swords that do the work. We look upon Von Moltke as the greatest general of our age, and it is rather unromantic to think of his methods; instead of being a plumed knight of the fray in the forefront of the field, he sat at a desk, with thirty or forty railroad timetables before him, planning how he could most rapidly, effectively and economically mobilize the German army. He had samples of leather of every kind, that he might choose the best from which to make the soldiers' boots; he had sandwiches in great variety brought to him, that he might taste and learn which were the most nutritious and took up the least space. In all these he was most thoroughly drilled before the battle came. He knew every inch of the ground; he knew every inch of the territory of France as if it had been his own door-yard, and he could send his troops where they were most urgently required.

Lady Clara Vere de Vere, if she had heard of a fever case, would have taken a basket on her arm, containing carefully assorted dainties, and tripped over to see the patient. In London the officers whose duty it is to keep us clear from small-pox and fever sit at a table where is spread out a map of London. Pins with black heads indicate the fever districts; pins with red heads indicate the small-pox districts. They have inspectors going constantly from house to house, reporting cases which are indicated in this manner. The moment a case is reported, an inspector is instructed to look into the sewage and every detail of the sanitary condition of the house where the patient is, and with the precision of army regulations, the patients are cared for and isolated from those around them. All this is done on a scientific basis, not alone to help the one smitten with fever or small-pox, but to bring to an irreducable minimum the evils that would flow out to those about them; for we have learned something of the solidarity of the human race, and that the ill of one is not, poetically, but in a very practical, every-day fashion, the ill of all.

A SPECTRE OF THE MIDDLE AGES.

For Prohibition Contemplation.

BY FELIX L. OSWALD.

The Buddhists hold that sinners and lunatics are liable to the doom of re-incarnation, and judging from the logic of a communication to the Chicago Champion, of January 12, 1893, it would seem that a political economist of the fifteenth century must have reappeared in our city.

Under the pretext of quoting a few "Facts vs. W. C. T. U.," the author of that article informs his readers that our association forms a mere speck among the great parties of the United States, but that we increase our power for evil by a rather clever organization, and are "ever ready for despotic mischief." "It needs no argument," he says, "for those who have closely watched the working of prohibition laws to understand that these laws are not only the greatest obstacles to the success of real and steady temperance, but are fearfully fraught with corruptive and demoralizing tendencies, while they want only aim to destroy laudable and remunerative branches of our agriculture. Did I possess the science and genius of an Archimedes, or of a LaPlace, or that of the statistician in the department of agriculture, the logic of my figures would soon exhibit the enormous injury that prohibition entails upon the industries, commerce and the agriculture of our country, but in the absence of those valuable qualities I will merely take you across the ocean—in imagination only, of course, and show you something more sensible, and therefore better, than the misguided and destructive policy of our W. C. T. U. and their friends, the methodical soul-medicine man. I will at once call your attention to France and Germany, as examples worthy, in some respects, of imitation. The wonderful growth of her potato-glucose factories, unrestricted by government, which Germany has witnessed within the last thirty years, is proof evident that the wine production of that country, aided by the science of Dr. Gall, has been in great demand, profitably and largely attended under the fostering care of clear-sighted and prudent rulers. France has seen, within the same period, the number of her vineyards increase from five to eight millions of acres, over a sixteenth part of all the land capable of her cultivation, producing for each head of her population about forty gallons of wine per year, the gross amount in cash being over three hundred millions of dollars. This industry gives employment to more than six million of men, women and children, nearly two million merchants, agents, clerks, etc. None but the W. C. T. U., or a maundering sentimentalist will dare say that these advantages do not overbalance the noise made by a few inebriates; while it is a well-known fact that, morally speaking, France has not, through this increase in the consumption of her wines, grown worse and more disorderly than the United States. We all know—I mean those who can know something, that France, as a whole, whether beer, cider or wine be the usual beverage, is a sober country, whose government takes special care to promote, encourage and protect a business so productive of good results to the nation. There no legislature, no congress attempts, under pressure of W. C. T. U., to legislate against the natural right of man to eat or to drink whatever his constitution and temperament demand; but the civil authorities carefully and fearlessly regulate the police, and, in earnest, do take care that the quiet and order of the citizens be not wantonly disturbed by bums, and that their food and drinks be not over-adulterated to the danger of life. In our ignorance of some good things—were we a people prone of imitation, such, of course, might probably be followed here with similar advantages to our people, but this will hardly ever suit those ambitious, restless minds infatuated with the aberration of total abstinence, and who under all circumstances, have made up their mind like the W. C. T. U., that Mohammedan prohibition is the only thing for Christians, and that their will must prevail against common-sense and general prosperity. E. B."

Now compare that article with a pamphlet which a champion of the "Slave Dealers' Protective Association" published in Constantinople during the winter of 1493. "The Abolitionists," he says, "form only a drop in the great sea of the Ottoman Empire, but they are noisy, arrogant, restless, and so cleverly organized that it must wring the heart of a true believer to contemplate their power for mischief. Prudence forbids to denounce the male supporters of the baneful heresy, but I cannot help mentioning its female converts, whose lack of political insight makes their fanaticism specially perilous to the true interests of the nation.

"By Omar (whose name be exalted!) it needs no arguments for those who have closely watched the working of abolition laws to convince them that they are not only an obstacle to the progress of true freedom, but (by obliging orthodox mussulmen to kidnap and cudgel their niggers under cover of secrecy) are fearfully fraught with corruptive and demoralizing tendencies, while they want only aim to destroy laudable and remunerative branches of enterprise. Did I possess the science and genius of an Averroës or an Abulfeda, or the documents of the Padisha's treasurer, the logic of my figures would soon expose the enormous injury which the attempts at abolition entail upon the industry and the commerce of the Empire; but in the absence of these valuable qualities, I will merely take you across the Mediterranean (in imagination only, of course, do not let your dread of water take alarm) and show you something more profitable, and therefore better than the misguided and destructive policy of our abolitionists and their friends, the pharisaical Ulemmas. Let me call your attention to the state of affairs in Tunis and Morocco, as examples worthy of imitation. The wonderful development of the slave-jacket, whip-handle and chain factories of Tunis is due to the enlightened tolerance of the Tunisian government.

"Morocco, within the same period, has witnessed an increase, both in the number and the efficacy, of her man-hunting caravans, and the slave-pens now cover a sixteenth part of the building ground of all the principal cities. These industries give employment to millions of workmen, drivers, merchants and agents. It is true that a few hundred thousand unbelievers succumb to the fatigues of the overland journey every year. Some ten or twelve thousand persons are said to perish in consequence of nigger-insurrections every month, and a few hundred houses and certainly not more than one hundred square miles of grain fields and orchards are destroyed by fugitive slaves every week. The indolence and the vices, unavoidably connected with the possession of slaves, may have slightly lowered the physical and moral standards of the Mohammedan nations, but only maundering sentimentalists will weigh such trifles against the enormous profits of the slave traffic. The main objection of our adversaries is the noisiness of the slave market—the shouts and occasional profanities of the drivers, and the shrieks of the wretched unbelievers. In Morocco, no legislature, no Junta of Emirs attempts, under pressure of female fanatics to interfere with the natural right of a mussulman to enslave all the Giaours he can catch and to treat them in any way his business exigencies or his temper may suggest; but the civil authorities vigilantly and fearlessly suppress the first symptoms of insurrection, and take care that the quiet and comfort of true believers be not too frequently disturbed.

"Were we a people able to profit by the experience of our neighbors, a similar course might be followed here with similar advantages to our people (dervishes as well as laymen, for many African slave dealers are liberal supporters of the true faith); but this will hardly ever suit those ambitious, restless minds, infatuated with the delusions of total abolition, and who, under all circumstances have made up their minds that Christian abolition is the only good thing for the followers of Mohammed (whose glory be exalted) and that their will must prevail against common sense and prosperity. ELIHU BENSHEYTAN."

JAPANESE ACCOUNT OF MISS WEST'S FUNERAL.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—We venture to say no more impressive funeral services of a private person have yet occurred among foreign residents in Japan than those taking place yesterday in Tokio and in Yokohama in memory of Miss Mary Allen West of the W. C. T. U. of America. The following is the account published in the Yokohama Gazette of December 17, which will be of supreme interest to American friends. J. H. B.

FUNERAL OF MISS WEST.

Reaching the Methodist church at Azabu late, owing to the detention of the train, we found a hearse and carriage and a large train of jinrikishas drawn up before the building. Entering, we found the service in progress, the pastor (Rev. Hiraiwa) speaking, he was giving the substance of Rev. Dr. Cochran's English address, who had just preceded him. The Rev. Dr. had given a sketch of Miss West's career in America and here in Japan and exhorted to following her example. The Scripture, the latter part of 15th chapter 1st Corinthians, had been read by Rev. Ibuka, president of the Meiji Gakuin. Prayer had been offered by Rev. Mr. Miyama, pastor of the M. E. church of Tsukiji. The hymn, "Rock of Ages" in English had opened the services. The hymn, "The Sweet By and By," in Japanese, with a prayer in English by the Rev. Jas. H. Ballagh of Yokohama, and the benediction, pronounced in English, by the Rev. Mr. Daniels, of America, brought the impressive services to a close. The church, galleries and floor were filled with a most deeply sympathetic audience; and a good number of European ladies and gentlemen were to be seen in the audience. A large number, indeed all the leading pastors of Tokio and prominent persons in Christian temperance work, were present. The attendance of Japanese ladies was also large, fully one-half of the audience on the ground floor. His Excellency, Governor Tomita, was present, and accompanied the procession from the church to the Shinbashi station. The procession was several blocks in length. Foreign and native gentlemen, pall-bearers, preceded the hearse, and the members of the Temperance and the Women's Reform Societies followed, the gentlemen on foot and the ladies in vehicles. It took a whole hour from the church to the station. A large number of the police, chiefs and subalterns were in attendance. Ample time elapsed at the station for placing the casket in the special car with a guard of honor attending it, consisting of the president of the Tokio Temperance Society, Hon. Taro Ando, Mr. Nemoto and Rev. Miyama and a foreign clergyman. The exquisite pall of velvet lined with white silk, with The Woman's Reform Society embroidered on it in Chinese gilt characters, and "They may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them," W. C. T. U. in English cursive letters, also in gilt embroidery, was cast over the casket, and the floral tributes, one from Kanazawa of artificial paper flowers framed on a star of moss, with wreath and cross of choice flowers, were placed upon it. The large company of men and ladies stood reverently with uncovered heads till the train bore their deeply loved and much-lamented friend's body away from them forever.

Arriving at Yokohama a larger company still, but all on foot, consisting in good part of the young ladies of the missions schools, met the corpse at the station. By the kindness of the railway officials the hearse was allowed to be run into the station as at state funerals, and the heavy casket was transferred safely to it with no small difficulty The excellent workmanship of the casket, made at Kanazawa, reflected great credit on the workmen and kindness of the friends at that distant part of the country. The procession, headed by a single bannerman, carrying a white paper banner, giving the name of the deceased in Japanese, followed by the officiating clergymen and the hearse, the latter followed by the representatives of the temperance and reform societies of Tokio and of Yokohama, the school girls, church members and others, made an imposing and most orderly procession. The store fronts of Main street were filled with interested spectators. Reaching the church, the muffled toll of the bell, the American and Japanese ensigns draped above the gate, the entrance columns covered with white and black canvas, the inside of the church beautifully trimmed—two beautiful silk Japanese and American flags hanging half-folded in front of the organ, a rosette of palm leaves, tied with a white ribbon, between them, and on either side in front of the organ two long Japanese texts, suspended and ornamented with vine leaves, Rev. 14:13 and I Cor. 15:58, while on the side walls, in large letters of evergreen, were, "She hath done what she could," while on the end wall, back of the pulpit, on either side of the organ, was the inscription, "It is all right"—the last words of the deceased—made an impression that all things had indeed been done well.

The pulpit desk was draped in white and black, and the pure white pall, with its gilt letters and its wreaths of pure white roses and lilies, gave a joyous aspect to the solemn obsequies that was most befitting, so pure, so holy, so peaceful and so triumphant a death. The services opened with a funeral march on the organ, Miss Moulton performing, followed by a Japanese hymn, sung by a trained choir of young ladies of the mission schools, and all the congregation joining in it. The Rev. Aibara Eiken, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church, presided. Rev. Kawakatsu, pastor of the Baptist church, offered a fervent prayer of thanksgiving and entreaty. Rev. E. S. Booth read in English a part of the fourteenth chapter of St. John, and Rev. Inagaki, pastor of the Kaigan church (Union), where the services were held, read in Japanese the 90th Psalm. An English hymn was sung by the choir and English speaking persons present, many of whom were Japanese. Mr. Hayashi, president of the Yokohama Temperance Society, read a terse and most sympathetic account of Miss West's life and labors. It was a model of condensation and tender appreciation, befitting Mr. Hayashi's well-known Christian and artistic tastes. He was followed by a short address from Mr. Nemoto, who had been a faithful worker and attendant with Miss West, giving an account of her labors in Japan since her arrival on the 13th of September last and her first public address the next night from the pulpit in front of which her remains were, three months later, placed for these last loving tributes of her friends. He narrated, beside her indefatigable labors in temperance, her large and sympathetic interest in all that concerned the welfare of the Japanese people, e. g., on the 3d of November, at the review on Her Majesty's birthday she observed how common was the use of paint, oshiroi, on the faces of young girls. She lamented this as unreal, untrue and not consorting with the words of Him who was the way, the truth and the life. Again on November 6, visiting the Diet buildings, she met some official, and learned how small a number of the 40,000,000 of Japanese subjects could vote for representatives; she lamented this, and expressed the wish that every Japanese subject could be so raised by Christian teaching as to be allowed a right to vote. He gave an account of her last sickness, and especially of her last day, when the telegram reached her at that very hour from President Hayashi that prayer was to be offered at three p. m., December 1, by all the temperance societies on her behalf, she answered, "Everything was all right! It was all right! She had nothing more to desire." At seven o'clock that night she entered into rest, surrounded by loving hearts and tenderly ministering hands. He mentioned the names of Rev. and Mrs. Winn and of Misses Porter and Lafferty as indefatigable in their services.

The Rev. Mr. Daniels, evangelist of the M. E. church of America, was called upon for the English address. He said he felt it a great honor and privilege to be called to speak at the funeral service of this eminent Christian woman. He supposed he was called to take part in the commemorative services from the relations he had sustained to the work of the society represented by this grand and beautiful life. He remembered the night, nineteen years ago, when the W. C. T. U. was launched. The first public meeting of that now world-wide community of eminent Christian women took place in the church of which he was the pastor, the Park Avenue church, Chicago. Among others were Miss Frances E. Willard, Miss West and others who, in his pulpit made their first public address. So again in Scotland he was made an honorary member of the W. C. T. U. before America would allow a man to be a member of their society. Perhaps for these reasons he had been called to speak of this most worshipful and foremost society in the world next to the Christian church. Some time before this organization, a singular outbreak took place, which he hesitated not to call an inspiration—a divine inspiration—that this company of ladies under the leadership of an ex-governor's wife should visit the saloons for prayer, thus charging the lion in his den. Soon all Ohio was ringing with the fame of the crusaders. Miss West was not then in it—her state of Illinois was somewhat later. In Cincinnati, a city given over almost to intemperance and low class saloons, the ladies organized into bands, appointing captains to lead them forth to designated districts, to gather in the street in front of the saloons and by singing and prayer to conquer their keepers. The results made the saloon-keepers furious, as many had closed up in consequence of these attacks. One infidel German loaded a small cannon and placed it at his door, and with lighted torch threatened to blow them all to pieces if they besieged him. This was a new experience for women who were not Amazons. They did not know how far he might be intoxicated and how desperate the deed he might commit if they proceeded, yet they felt they could not recede. So they began what they thought might be their own funeral hymn, "Jesus lover of my soul," etc. They had not gone far till the torch began to lower in his hand and tears to glisten in his eyes. They then changed the tune to the ringing march, "Jesus the water of life will give freely" till it was not long till his great German heart was touched and he cried out "Oh, womans stop that singing! I will no more sell beer!" That was a victory given them of God who hates whatever hurts His children. The W. C. T. U. commenced in the Park Avenue church, now comprised fully one million "white-ribboners" as they are called in all the world, since they have now become international. The white silk pall on the casket of this honored sister, with its gold embroidered letters reminded them of that great company clad in white robes—robes of shining whiteness, among whom their sister had gone to take her place, and God grant to you, and to each of us alike, faith to overcome by the blood of the Lamb. Rev. Kota Hoshino, head master of the Ferris seminary, preached a most suitable discourse, a sermonette, having all the breadth but not the length of a sermon on Acts 20:24. "None of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, etc." His subject, the martyr-spirit, the spirit of Christianity, was pertinently illustrated by the lives of the Apostle Paul, Henry Martyn, Dr. Livingstone, John Howard and others. The leading idea of all these martyr-spirits, was that this world was under Satan's rule and was to be delivered at the expense of great personal efforts and even of death itself. Miss West's mission was the rescue of the human body from all that defiled, since it was the temple of God. Her labors were with all believers and Christian workers without distinction of sect. In the short period of less than three months she had traveled, it was estimated, over seven-tenths of Japan and held meetings among companies of a few hundreds to those of thousands. In every place and case, no matter what the difference of the audience was, she used the same style of speech and matter of address. In every case it was Christ's truth to overthrow Satan's rule. In regard to her death at Kanazawa, away from home and friends, it was only in keeping with the whole of her mission to Japan. She came not for purposes of pleasure or sight-seeing, but to lay down her life if need be for the cause. He spoke of her courage, landing in a small boat on the boisterous day of her arrival at Yokohama, of her physical strength as she first appeared among us. No debilitated body, but strong in body and soul she entered on her work of conquest here. Like the Spartan mothers of old who counselled their sons not to return unless bearing their shields or be borne home upon them, so they esteemed Miss West was being borne home on her shield. She had set out voluntarily, and now returned honored and lamented by all who knew and loved her. As the captain of their salvation gave an example to his followers, so Miss West left a shining example for the young, and for all to follow. Both these addresses made marked impressions on the audience and called forth a suppressed but hearty assent from many hearts. Prayer in English was offered by the Rev. J. H. Ballagh and thanks were returned by Mr. Ninomiya on behalf of the Yokohama Temperance Society and Woman's Reform Society for the attendance of so many and from distant places. A hymn in Japanese was sung, and the benediction was pronounced by the Rev. J. C. Davison, of Tokio. There were a number of Tokio foreign residents in the audience. Among them Dr. W. Norton Whitney, of the United States Legation who, together with the Honorable Mr. Combs, the United States Minister, has been indefatigable in services in connection with the death of Miss West and in making arrangements for sending the body home to the United States. The remains will lie in the chapel of the Union church until Monday, when they will be transferred to the steamer for transmission to San Francisco. Meetings of temperance societies and the Woman's Reform Society will be held to-day and to-morrow in Tokio. The latter will hold a memorial service to-morrow afternoon (Sunday) at the Koseikan, Tsukiji. European and Japanese addresses will be made.

Yokohama, Japan.

BY HARRIET B. KELLS.

And we desire that every one of you do show the same diligence to the full assurance of hope unto the end; That ye be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises.—Heb. 6: 11, 12.

A letter comes from Miss Evelyn Graham saying: "I send $10 from the West Berlin, O., W. C. T. U. which its members wish applied to the Jennie Casseday tablet in the Temple." How glad our hearts were that our beloved Jennie Casseday was to be so honored in her life-time by her comrades, and to-day the president of the Kentucky W. C. T. U., Mrs. N. A. Munnell, writes: "Please publish call for donations to her memorial window." We cannot mourn for one whose earthly life embodied the highest ideal of Christian love for humanity, and for whom, with peculiar blessedness, the earth-fetters have fallen off. Let us rejoice in her triumph—and forget our supreme loss. She would wish it so.

Mrs. D. DeWitt, of Presque Isle, Me., says: "Inclosed find check for $25 which completes payment of $100 for the Presque Isle W. C. T. U. The Temple is a thing of beauty. I was in it on July 4. You were all out that day, but I looked around, admired it, put my hand on the wall and asked God's blessing on the builders." Dora Coss, Olean, N. Y., writes: "We rejoice in the Woman's Temple and are thankful to have a hand in its erection. Half of the $100 inclosed is the gift of one of our wealthy ladies, Mrs. L. F. Lawton. The rest is the result of a special effort on the part of the union, with our love for the cause and admiration for the brain and heart that conceived the Temple." Mrs. H. N. Lewis sends $49, making $66 already sent by Wellsville, N. Y., union, on a $100 pledge. She says: "It has been hard to get this amount, but we feel confident of the remainder, for it is the Lord's work and he will help us." The following W. C. T. Unions send the sums accredited on $100 pledges: Altoona, Pa., $30; Canton, Ill., $4.85; Frances Willard union, Helena, Mont., $20; East Haven, Conn., $25; Winchester, Mass., $4; Clarence, Mo., $10; and Sulphur Springs, Col., $15.

The Sunday-schools are helping to cheer the cause along with such substantial consolation as the following: Ezra H. Cook, Chicago, Ill., writes: "I take a very deep interest in the W. C. T. U. work, and hope, pray and plead for the ballot for the guardian of the home. I believe paying for the Temple quickly is of the utmost importance to the temperance cause throughout the world, though more particularly to our own land. I noticed with pleasure that the Union Park Sunday-school had contributed $100. Surely the Sunday-school children who sang so sweetly, 'Rise, Temple, Rise,' would like to aid in paying for it. I inclose check for $25, most of it contributed by the afternoon Sunday-school of the First Congregational church. Would not an appeal to Sunday-schools bring many contributions?" The Second Presbyterian Sunday-school sends $2.55 and the Second M. E. Sunday-school $2, both of Springfield, Ill., and at the hand of Mrs. S. J. Cocking. The M. E. Sunday-school of Webster, N. Y., by Mrs. M. F. Abbott, sends $5; and Class 2, First Baptist church, Lake City, Col., sends $2. The members of the class are Al. Wiley, Clyde Best, Virgel Taleford, Earl Bent, Melville Dempsey, teacher. Al. Wiley collected 60 cents of the amount. Mrs. M. J. Hockett, Harrison, South Dakota, sent $1.50, the contents of the mite-box filled by the Aurora Sunday-school, on the drought-stricken prairies of that vast state. The word that comes with this sum is: "Please accept from loyal hearts. It is not much we can do in our isolated prairie homes, but we can and do read THE UNION SIGNAL and pray that our Father will abundantly bless the white ribboners." It is the prayers of such true-hearted ones that have made the Temple possible.

The Christian Endeavor Society of Lee Centre, Ill., sends by Miss Anna E. Woodbridge, $3.36 as a "thank-offering and a slight token of appreciation of your noble enterprise." The Deeds of Love Circle of King's Daughters, Higganum, Conn., sends $2.75 as a birthday offering. Mrs. Martha Poorman and Mrs. Fisher, of The Dalles, Oregon, sent $6.58—not from Dallas, Texas, as it once appeared. In November 3d issue a notice was made of Mrs. V. H. Danforth's, Jamestown, N. Y., successful work in attempting to raise $1,000 for a fountain, in the corridor leading to Willard Hall, to commemorate the founding of the National W. C. T. U. at Chautauqua, N. Y., on August 15, 1874, and not the local union of that place as was first stated.

Rev. George C. Lorrimer, D. D., of Tremont Temple, Boston, Mass., in answer to the postal cards of inquiry, sent out by Rev. Watson Tranter, replies: "I not only congratulate Miss Willard and associates on the dedication of the New Temperance Temple, but the whole country as well, regarding the event as full of significance and hope. It will afford me great pleasure to notice in some appropriate way the consecration of this magnificent structure to the interest of sobriety and purity." "I regard the dedication of the Temple as a most noteworthy and significant sign of the good time coming for women and America, and will note the event publicly," writes Rev. A. E. Johnson, pastor of 6th St. M. E. church of Portsmouth, O.

A two-cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, the Temple, Chicago, will secure a mite-box, descriptive card and bulletin; remember, all who fill a mite-box ($3.65, before next April will receive a photographic group consisting of Lady Henry Somerset, Miss Willard and the founder of the Temple. All drafts should be made out in the name of Miss Esther Pugh. All matters pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Carse.

HAND IN HAND TO WOO PERFECTION.

Women! it yet remains
For you to cast aside the chains
Of false tradition, marring womanhood.
Men! be it yours to help us on to good;
The race is in its manhood—
Leave behind the jealousies of childhood,
Strive to find each an ideal nobler and more grand!
Think not that women, gaining their demand,
Will cast their dower of gentleness aside,
Or, love you less, because they understand.
But rise and say, Henceforth
We woo perfection, hand in hand.

TOYS AND THE WORLD'S FAIR.

BY WILSON L. GILL.

My little two-years-old Bradford, though a Buckeye boy, showed his Yankee blood by his unceasingly persistent endeavors, from day to day and week to week, to construct a horse and carriage out of chairs and boxes and pillows. Then he would harness up his horse with strings and trunk straps and a clothes-line and start out for a drive. He would have great times with his horse, or horses, as the case might be. Sometimes he was simply a gentleman out for a drive; sometimes he was a huckster, standing in his wagon and driving his boxes and pillow-horse and singing out, "apples and oranges and peaches and onions and turnips," though it was with much difficulty, sometimes, that he was able to sufficiently master the English language to have you understand exactly what wares he had for sale.

His mother had given him a small, toy horse and a two-wheeled cart; the flimsy nature of these soon led to his knowing at least one use for liquid glue, and his imagination made it a cure for other ills. One time he brought me a little stocking, ripe for a good darning, saying: "Blue it, papa! blue it! Blue Brafford's stossin." He could not unhitch the little horse, but some of the harness tacked to it would come off as the result of his industry, and a head or a leg was apt to come off at the same time. The latter was all right, for it could be glued on again, but the harness business was a bother. I arranged a pair of traces, so he could hitch the horse to the cart and unhitch again, and that was a great joy for him, an almost endless pleasure.

In those times I longed to be able to furnish the little fellow with a good toy horse and cart, the horse being hitched in a real little harness, so he could take it off and put it on just as a man would harness and unharness a real horse. I knew that it would add greatly to his pleasure and at the same time he would obtain valuable information. Play for a child is earnest work, and if he can see that he is doing his work as grown people do their work, the satisfaction to him is very great. I knew of no such toy for sale, and I thought dollars too scarce to be spared to pay for the construction of special toys. Now I think it would have been wise to have had right things made for him to play with, even if it had meant my wearing a suit of clothes six months longer or almost any self-denial by which the money might have been saved for that purpose.

Those experiences, and many others, have led me to hope that the World's Fair will do much, very much to solve for our countrymen many of these perplexing questions concerning the children. Mrs. Palmer and the ladies of Chicago have taken up the idea, and have done nobly in the way of raising money for the Children's Department, and let us hope that they will do as nobly in engaging every good influence that is possible to induce the making of good toys, and the purchasing of them by the friends of children instead of the kind now in vogue.

I do not mean to say that there are no good toys for sale. Tops, balls and bats, carts, wagons, wheelbarrows and other things are good, and the Anchor building blocks, devised by one of Froebel's friends, are ideal as a toy. Any blocks are better than no blocks, but any blocks I ever saw, until I saw these German stone blocks, would come to a disappointing limit always before any building, however simple, could be completed. When a child I always wanted more blocks, and blocks with which to make columns, arches and roofs, but my longings were in vain, except as they may now help other children to have them.

When I grew larger and had a little sister and niece at home, I was determined they should have enough blocks, so I had a large number of pine blocks made, each one exactly three-fourths of an inch thick, one and one-half inch wide and three inches long. There was a great deal of satisfaction in building with those blocks. The building would not topple over because of slight inaccuracies in the sizes of the blocks. That was only a step in the right direction. These Germans have taken up the matter systematically and scientifically. They have considered the educational side of the question, and the results, it seems to me, cannot be very far from perfection, except as to the price. If, on the other hand, it were not for the high price which makes the business pay, we should not have them introduced among us. If they were double, or five times their large price they would then be worth far more than all the ordinary toys that could be bought with such an amount of money.

The German blocks are made of artificial stone and are heavy and rough enough to hold their places easily. They are accompanied with architectural plans and designs which a child soon learns to interpret, thereby learning a most important lesson for all his life. There are arch-stones, angles, pillars, roofing-blocks and everything necessary to make the building. What these Germans have done for building blocks, is it not possible through the Children's Department of the World's Fair to induce American manufacturers to do for toy wagons, carts, harness, cars, steam, electric and other motor engines? These questions are problems too large and too difficult to be solved at a sitting, and far too important to simply be placed in the category of nice things to do. It means real work of more importance than the building of a railroad or the establishing of an international bank. Here are several of the questions formulated; but first let us think of several axioms.

1. The children of to-day are the men and women of to-morrow.
2. To the children of to-day, will to-morrow be entrusted all the private and public affairs of all our people and all the world.
3. Children are easily guided into any course of thought or action—men and women are not.
4. Any given individual, generally speaking, is more important to us when a child than the same individual when grown, for we can help the child to mould the man.
5. A child is thought of as a thing to interest us and for us to amuse when it is good, and punish when it is bad. It is not generally thought of as an individual human being in the most important part of its existence.
6. A child's heart is far more tender than that same heart will be when it has, in self-defense, hardened itself against harsh tones, severe words and unkindness and cruelty in general; therefore, if you would have a certain amount of effort produce the greatest amount of happiness and last the longest, let it be exerted for the child; but we should be kind to the old, for they have not had the comfort and joy in their lives from our action, which it is possible that we can give the children.
7. A child's toys will, or may, go far toward shaping the future course of its life.
8. The deeper you go into this subject, the deeper and broader and more important you will find it to be.

The first question that arises is: What has the World's Fair to do with all this? That is not the question that interests me as much as: What can the World's Fair have to do with all this? and: How can we get it to use its greatest power for good in this direction?

What are the toys now on the market the use of which should be encouraged? What improvements should be made in toys as they are now made? What toys is it desirable should be invented and made? How can we procure the inventing of such toys? How can we procure the manufacturing of such toys? How can we procure the purchasing of such toys by the friends of children?

Other questions come spontaneously as soon as you begin to think on the subject, and I shall not attempt to answer them here, but I wish to make this one suggestion: Would it not be a step in the right direction if wagons, carts, cars, horses, steam-engines and other motors and many other things could be furnished in parts ready to put together, or as they say "in the knock down," with working drawings, so the little fellows can learn to put them together and make them work? Would it not be possible to furnish with ready-made parts of a thing as patterns, suitable materials out of which to make the parts, and the necessary tools and workings and directions?

A sand tray, three or four inches deep and a yard or so long, filled with clean sand; a lump of clay to shape, a handful of wooden tooth-picks, and a lump of putty to construct little people out of, when accompanied by constant, loving interest and encouraging words of an older one who knows how to say "do" rather than don't, will be happy substitutes for cars and horses and engines "in the knock-down." But even such ideal things will be of little use except as they are accompanied by the constant encouragement of loving smiles and words of approval.

WHAT we call conscience is the voice of Divine love in the deep of our being, desiring a union with our will; and which by attracting the affections inward, invites them to enter into the harmonious contentment and "fulness of joy" which attends the being joined by "one spirit to the Lord."—*J. WORDS TO THE WISE—AUNT PHOSIE ON ALIKENESS.

BY ABBY MORTON DIAZ.

I have been working to-day among the poorer sort on a suit of clothes that needed to be "half-soled and heeled," as the saying is; and 'long towards night Colonel Saunders' wife came in to solicit. She said when there was to be a church fair she always solicited at every house so that none need feel slighted, and she specially wanted some of Mis' Billings' doughnuts.

It happened that Deacon Bond's wife, another rich woman, came in to speak about some work Mr. Billings was going to do for her, and while I was stitching away I entertained myself with noticing how differently they two spoke to each other from the way they spoke to Mis' Billings, though keeping on with my work all the same. Such a habit as a lone body like me gets of querying to herself as to this and that! For while they sat there, all at once it came into my mind that they two spoke to each other in one tone of voice and to Mis' Billings in another, and I asked myself—being always of an inquiring turn o' mind—why is it that in speaking to her they put so much down into their voices, as if they spoke from a height?

I don't know why it is that I puzzle myself with queries of this sort, but I am always doing it. It must be because I am such a lone body. The drollest thoughts came into my mind as to just what caused them to think themselves so very different from Mis' Billings that they had to use to her another tone of voice.

Then I made believe Mis' Billings and Colonel Saunders' wife had changed clothes, and from that I went on to supposing that every body, rich and poor, wore just ordinary, decent kind of clothes; no show, no richness, no costly silks and laces, no dress suits and silk hats, no collars and cuffs and diamond studs and stiff shirt bosoms; and that all have about the same kind of furniture and house fixings. I wondered if people would not seem to each other more alike than they do now. I said to myself that silks and velvets and costly apparel and dress suits and silk hats have no more effect on the real person than if they were laid away in the drawer.

And chairs and upholstery and things round about do not in any way make one person to differ from another person. And finally I came to this, namely, that if nothing outside can make us to differ, then we must all be so much alike that nobody need talk down to any body. And all at once I remembered what Mis' Fuller said to me once about all being made of just the same kind of stuff. She told me the ingredients, and I learned them by heart—it seemed so interesting to know what I'm made of—same as I always like to find out about the goods I'm working on, whether they are all wool or part cotton, or shoddy or real cloth, or silk back, fast dyed, and so on. Twenty-three pounds carbon; two pounds lime; twenty-two ounces phosphorous; one ounce each of sodium, iron, potassium, magnesium and silica, all put together with oxygen, hydrogen and nitrogen.

Now these constitute the clay we are all made of, and the only kind of human clay there is; though no doubt some would like it if there could be a superior kind for them to be made out of, for I've noticed that as a general thing people seem to enjoy most what only they themselves can get, and because nobody else can get it. But we cannot help ourselves. We have to be all made alike, and if our bodies are made of the same kind of stuff they must be liable to the same things,—as warmth, cold, burning, freezing, aching; and also to the same diseases, and this is just the case. Even our tears are made alike. I found the ingredients in a magazine Mis' Fuller lent me; watery salt, sodium, phosphate of lime, phosphate of soda and mucus.

But here I had to stop thinking so as to keep my mind wholly on my work, for I had begun to consider that a tear means something else than all these ingredients, means the feelings that start it; and this very something else—was not that, too, the same in all people without regard to money or clothes or tone of voice or surroundings? This took me into so deep kind of thoughts that I had to stop short and mind my work. But I must think it out in some way.

OUR experience teaches us that woman's vote will always be the enacting clause of all temperance legislation.—Lady Henry Somerset.

AND he said to him also that had bidden him, When thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, nor thy kinsmen, nor rich neighbors; lest haply they bid thee again, and a recompense be made the. But when thou makest a feast, bid the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind; and thou shalt be blest; because they have not wherewith to recompense thee; for thou shalt be recompensed in the resurrection of the just —Luke 14: 12-15.

STOP AND THINK.

My boy, when they ask you to drink,
Stop and think.
Just think of the danger ahead;
Of the hearts that in sorrow have bled
O'er hopes that were drowned in the bowl
Filled with death for the body and soul.

When you hear a man asking for drink,
Stop and think.
The draught that he drinks will destroy
High hopes and ambitions, my boy;
And the man who a leader might be
Is a slave that no man's hand can free.

O this terrible demon of drink!
Stop and think
Of the graves where its victims are laid,
Of the ruin and woe it has made,
Of the wives and the mothers who pray
For the curse to be taken away.

Yes; when you are tempted to drink,
Stop and think
Of the danger that lurks in the bowl,
Of the death that it brings to the soul,
The harvest of sin and of woe,
And spurn back the tempter with "No!"

WHAT SAVED HIM.

BY HELEN SOMERVILLE.

Lucy Fairbanks was going home from school one afternoon, when she heard the voices of two of her schoolmates, who were standing inside the fence that surrounded the home of Dr. Mills. Lucy could not help but hear what they said, as they were speaking in quite a high key.

"Oh, Mamie! Did you see Mr. Fairbanks going past a few minutes ago?" That was Laura Mill's voice.

"I should think I did!" replied Mamie Lord, emphatically. "Isn't it just awful, Laura, the way he drinks?"

"Yes indeed! My papa says if he keeps on, he'll become—a—sot!"

"Oh, Laura, what's that?" asked Mamie in horrified accents.

"Oh, it's when a man drinks and drinks, till at last he becomes a sot!" said Laura, impressively. "My papa ought to know because he's a doctor. I don't think I care to 'sociate with Lucy Fairbanks any more, do you?"

"No, indeed," said Mamie, who generally agreed with her friend in every thing. Little Lucy, with a heavy heart, hurried home, filled with wondering thoughts. What did her papa drink to make it probable that he would become that mysteriously awful thing, a sot? And why should these two girls, who had always been friendly before, make up their minds not to associate with her on account of her papa's tendency to become a sot? Why did her papa want to drink? Was it because he was so very thirsty, and if he was thirsty, what harm could there be in drinking?

Lucy reached her home, a neat-looking white cottage in a small yard. Opening the door she ran in, bursting into a storm of tears and sobs. Her mother came out of the bed-room, and in surprise inquired the cause of her tears.

Lucy tried to tell her, but the baby awoke and cried, and there was no opportunity just then for the child to unburden her heart.

"You may set the table for supper, Lucy," said her mother, rocking the baby as she spoke. "Your papa is not very well and has gone to bed."

"Is papa very sick, mamma?"

"No, dear, he'll be all right in the morning," said Mrs. Fairbanks, who looked sad and troubled. They had supper and Lucy tried to study her spelling lesson for the next day, but her heart was so heavy that she could not fix her mind on the words. When bed-time came, she kissed her mother, and going into her little room knelt by the neat little bed and prayed.

"O Lord, bless papa and mamma and baby, and if papa gets thirsty again, keep him from drinking so much. Make me a good girl, for Jesus' sake, amen." Then she went to bed, where she cried herself to sleep.

Mr. Fairbanks appeared at the breakfast table his usual self, gentle and tender in his words to his wife and children. Lucy watched to see if he seemed thirsty, but he drank only one cup of coffee as usual. After breakfast he went away to business, and Lucy helped her mother with the work till it was time to go to school.

As she entered the school-yard she saw Laura Mills and Mamie Lord standing together, and with them Lula Hannon, who was Lucy's special friend. "The two Lu's" they were often called. Lucy smiled, and was about to speak when Laura put her arm around Lulu and drew her away, while Mamie muttered something about "drunkards' children."

Lucy's eyes filled with tears, and she hurried up the steps, and to her seat. She could not study, and failed both in arithmetic and spelling, and was kept in at recess. At noon she heard one of the girls say she was going to have a party, but was not going to invite Lucy. The little girl felt that she was shunned by all the world, and when she tried to eat her lunch, the food seemed to choke her.

As it was Friday, Miss Lee, according to her custom, read the scholars a story. This time it was about a little girl whose father drank whisky and abused his family, till one night he turned poor little Mary out of doors. Lucy listened to the story with terrified interest, her cheeks scarlet with excitement, her eyes open to their fullest extent. What if her papa became like this unnatural father of little Mary, and should abuse her mamma and baby and herself? The idea took such complete possession of her mind that she could think of nothing else.

She felt afraid to speak of her fears to her mother, and brooded over the matter till the sight of her father threw her into a state of nervous terror. She could not eat nor sleep, and her mother was very anxious about the child.

One evening Mr. Fairbanks came home so much the worse for liquor that he fell over the threshold. When his wife tried to help him he answered her so roughly that Lucy screamed aloud in horror, and ran to her own room, where she threw herself on the floor, moaning and sobbing in her agony. There her mother found her, and put her to bed, where she tossed all night, muttering and crying in her sleep. In the morning she was in a raving fever, and Dr. Mills was sent for.

Even in her delirium Lucy recognized him as Laura's father, and she began to repeat Laura's name and to grow more and more excited.

The sight of her father threw her into paroxysms of fear, and she raved about his "drinking so much," and pleaded with him so excitedly "not to turn her out of doors" that the unhappy man, who dearly loved his child, was obliged to keep out of her sight.

Sometimes Lucy would be begging her schoolmates not to treat her so cruelly, and she mentioned Laura's name so often that the doctor suspected something. Going home, he called his little daughter and said:

"Laura, how have you been treating that little Fairbanks' girl?"

Laura looked startled, and stammered: "I don't know, papa. Why?"

"Tell me the truth," he said sternly, and as she began confusedly to tell something of the facts of the case, he said, "I see. Well, my child, you have treated her most cruelly. That little girl, nervous and delicate to a remarkable degree, is lying at death's door, and it is extremely doubtful if she gets well."

Laura was shocked. "Oh papa, let me go to Lucy, and tell her how sorry I am. I didn't mean anything."

"No, the sight of you would agitate her the more, and hasten the end. She has brain fever. You can do nothing now. Let this be a lesson to you to be careful, how you treat others. You may go."

Laura crept away, too miserable to do anything but cry. At last she knelt down and prayed to God to forgive her, and to make Lucy better. Then she went to Mamie and Lulu and told them how sorry she was for her naughty behavior.

There came a day when Lucy lay helpless and exhausted on her little bed. Dr. Mills said, in answer to Mr. Fairbanks' frantic questions, "To-day will decide. There is a possibility of her recovery, but you must be prepared for the worst." The miserable man left the house, and was gone several hours. During that time he had asked God's pardon for his past sins, and resolved to begin a better life. It was late when he returned. The house was very quiet. The baby was asleep, and his wife, tired out, was lying on a couch.

Mr. Fairbanks crept into the sick-room. There lay Lucy, perfectly quiet, all the fever gone from her face. Her eyes were closed; the head, shorn of the pretty hair, was motionless on the pillow. So she was gone! With a cry, her father knelt by the bed, and kissed one of the little hands. "Dear papa!" said a weak voice, and a faint smile parted Lucy's lips.

"My darling!" murmured her father, "the Lord has saved you. Do you love me still, Lucy?"

"I love papa," she whispered.

"Thank God for His goodness! Lucy, He has saved me from my sins, and I shall never drink another drop, God helping me!" The setting sun shone on Lucy's happy face, and rested on a beautiful Easter lily sent in by Laura, Mamie and Lulu to their little friend. "Oh, Lord Jesus, I am so glad!" sighed the little girl.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—The Children's Fountain,—what is it? Oh, I see a good many hands go up and am glad so many of you know about it. Now, how many have sent ten cents to Miss Anna Gordon, in Evanston, Ill., as their share in this good plan? Not very many yet. How many are going to do so? Dear me, every hand is up, and if all the temperance children are of the same mind we shall surely see the charming fountain in front of the Children's Building at the World's Fair, placed there by the ten cent contributions from the temperance children all over the world; afterwards the fountain is to stand on one of Chicago's busy streets, and won't you be glad when you see the beautiful child, holding out to the thirsty people a cup full of water which overflows into a trough for animals, that you have helped to place it there? Send the dimes to your good friend, Miss Anna Gordon, Evanston, Ill., very soon.

This sentence is a little mixed, isn't it, children? But it is well constructed.

Here is an alphabetical sentence which I hope may find a place in Cozy Corner.

THE MASSING OF WEALTH AND POWER.

The special committee, appointed by the House of Representatives to investigate the Reading coal combine, has made its report and it is one of startling interest. Some of the most significant items are these: That fully ninety-five per cent of the coal output is controlled directly and indirectly by the railroad companies; that the railroad companies engaged in mining and transporting coal are practically in a combination to control the output and fix the price which the public pays for this article; that this combination embraces all the railroads connecting the anthracite regions with tide water; that such individual miners as still do business are deprived of the means of transportation, if they do not adhere to the price fixed by the roads; that the rates for the transportation of coal are far in excess of those upon any of the other great and more valuable products of the country and are nearly fifty cents a ton in excess of the highest rate adjudged by the interstate commerce commission to be reasonable and fair; that the railroads are reaching out to obtain the same control over the other products of the country and are already securing control of the iron and timber lands.

The committee makes a few suggestions with regard to amendments to the interstate commerce law but does not speak hopefully of any means to remedy the present state of affairs or to prevent much more serious developments along the same line. The committee is not alone in its inability to suggest a remedy under our present system for the evils already upon us and the greater ones which threaten us. We have yet to see a plan which affords any reasonable ground of hope that with our present social system we shall be able to prevent the greater massing of wealth in the hands of the few and the more abject poverty of the many.

Our forefathers thought that they had solved the problem of the suppression of tyranny when they abolished class distinctions, made all men equal before the law, with the recognition of the right of each to "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," and gave each a vote for the men who should make the laws; and in truth they took a long step in the right direction, the only step probably which could at that time be taken. We have, however, reached the point in the development of our civilization when we are forced to recognize that they took only a step. We believe that we have come to the time when another great forward movement must be made, a movement as radical, as revolutionary in character as that made by the heroes of '76. The system by which our forefathers sought to establish the freedom and rights of the individual is, in the last analysis, a state of society in which each individual is thrown into a rough and tumble fight for existence with his neighbors, with the laws as far as possible maintaining "fair play."

In early times, before the country was developed, this was so great an improvement upon all preceding systems that it was thought the end had been reached. But with the development of the country and the progress of civilization great and unforseen evils have developed. More and more the weak are pushed to the wall, and the "battle is to the strong." As Lieber says, "Ours is a costly civilization." Immense wealth is absolutely necessary to the carrying out of the great enterprises which are the essential elements of our civilization. And this wealth must be massed. A few thousand or hundred thousand dollars in the hands of the many will not suffice. It requires untold millions, controlled by practically one mind, to construct and operate the great railways of the nation; it requires other equally enormous millions massed in the control of a few to develop the mining interests of the land, still others to carry on the manufacturing industries, and the time is at hand when the same need will be felt of wealth exceeding that of Aladdin's to develop the agricultural resources of the country.

But this massing of wealth and power has lead inevitably to oppression and tyranny. Private corporations and individuals carry on and will forever carry on the great enterprises under their control, not for the benefit of mankind in general, but for their own selfish, personal ends. The problem to be solved is, how shall we provide for the management of these and all other great enterprises of our myriad-sided civilization so that they shall be carried on in the interests of all mankind, so that every individual shall share equally in their benefits? For at the last, nothing short of this will satisfy the conscience of a perfect Christian civilization.

In our judgment, the answer to this question must be sought, first, in a change of ownership. The result cannot be expected so long as these great wealth producing interests are in the hands of individuals or private corporations. The only other ownership is, of course, the National government. When the raising of taxes was farmed out to private persons, taxation was an intolerable burden and instrument of oppression, not until the representatives of the people obtained control of it did it become the fairly reasonable thing it is. Our postal service would be as exorbitant and as uncertain in its demands as is the railway service were it in the hands of private corporations.

That government control will immediately right all the evils of our present system we do not believe; but it seems very clear to us that it is the next step in the evolution of Anglican liberty. We believe that in order to be safely trusted with these new responsibilities, our political system itself must in the end be greatly improved, it must be less under the control of mere party politics and must be purged of its present corruption. But we believe that the surest means to secure this renovation of our politics is to place in the hands of the government, one by one, the interests which it is plain to see can be entrusted to no one and nothing else. This will develop the weaknesses of the govermental machine and suggest the remedies.

THE NORWEGIAN SYSTEM.

The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes at his conferences in St. James Hall, London, has been considering thepropositions now before the British public apropos of coming legislation. He said that if the government had but the moral courage to put more faith in what is best in man, instead of fearing what is the worst in him, the whole nation would as heartily make the brave and generous attempt to deal with this gigantic cause as it was ready recently to applaud the sentiments expressed by Mr. Gladstone on the question of temperance.

Mr. Hughes then set forth the points involved in the famous Gothenburg system, and which some leaders in Great Britain have proposed to put in operation in such towns and districts as should vote under the expected law against prohibition. The first point claimed in favor of this system is that the element of profit is to be eliminated from the traffic, and secondly, that the trade shall be municipalized and its profits go to the relief of the local tax payers. Though the first proposition was a good stride in the right direction, the second would result in every citizen having a direct pecuniary interest in the success of the liquor traffic and any attempt to bring about such a result in England would be unflinchingly opposed by the temperance people.

The Norwegian or Bergen scheme provides for the prevalence of local option everywhere and in such a form that it may be carried out to the extent of totally prohibiting the trade. This is a demand that the temperance party in England will surely make. The Bergen scheme, which only applies to the retail trade and the sale of spirits (though it has since discovered that it ought equally to apply to wines and beer), was legalized by the Norwegian Parliament in 1871. It took the traffic out of private hands, paying no compensation, but allowing a year's grace and placed it in the hands of companies controlled by the municipal authorities. These companies are made up of philanthropic (?) ladies and gentlemen who subscribe what capital is needed and receive five per cent and no more of the profits, the remainder being devoted to the support of benevolent societies which receive no help from local rates or the Imperial Exchequer.

One of the arguments against compensation used in Norway is that the liquor business is not a skilled trade involving the expenditure of time and money to prepare the men to enter into it. The supervision of the philanthropic companies in Norway is placed in the hands of the licensing authority, made up partly of magistrates and partly of town councilors. Mr. Hughes said that might be done in Norway, but if in England it was taken out of the hands of the magistrates the temperance party would fiercely oppose any other method except to put it in the hands of the representatives of the people who were elected for this purpose and who would have the moral authority which they needed to do their work. He stated that he found in Norway that the public houses opened at eight in the morning and closed at half past twelve, re-opened at half past one in the afternoon and closed at eight in the evening on every week day except Saturday, when the closing time was five o'clock in the afternoon. He hoped that a great united effort would be made to secure the closing of the public houses in England at ten o'clock p. m., for the worst drinking was done between ten and twelve at night.

Another feature of the scheme in Norway was to employ men only behind the bars. Mr. Hughes said that nothing could be more discreditable, cowardly and mean, than that the men of England should allow pure, good-looking, young women to serve in these places. The bar-keepers in Norway are all dressed in uniform and have a number, and, in order to secure strict compliance with all the regulations, detectives are employed. Liquor shops are not decorated or made in any way attractive; no seats are provided and no one is allowed to loiter. They are conducted on the cash system, no credit being allowed, and it is illegal to serve children under sixteen years of age.

The Norwegians, Mr. Hughes thought, had made two new and important discoveries; that the mischief lies in the alcohol itself, and secondly, that to sell such articles as milk, coffee, eggs and tea in the same place where liquor was sold did not mitigate but instigated the evil. Mr. Hughes believed that we should do away with all the attractions of a house in which liquor is sold, and set up gorgeous coffee palaces, beautifully decorated and made as attractive as flowers and music could make them; in fact he believed that the only remedy for the abuse of the gin palace was to split it in halves, to have the gin in one place and the palace in the other.

CHICAGO'S NEW LIBRARY.

It is not the stately pile lined with lore of all ages and tongues, known as the "Newberry Library" of which we write; but of another, having even more significance and importance. It occupies the second floor of a four-story red brick building in the busiest quarter of this busy city. No public meetings, printed solicitations or bequests have brought it to pass, for it is not a charity; nor is it a monument to the dead. It is rather monumental to living, working men and women, showing their desire to provide themselves with means of information and culture.

The sponsor for this new free library and reading-room is the Chicago Building Trades Council. An underlying fund is derived from the sale of a book published by the builders, describing the struggles of the "labor movement" from earliest times until the present, while many individuals and auxiliary labor organizations have contributed to the enterprise. The furnishings are all new, and as cheery and cozy as the skill and art vested in these men, whose hands and brains beautify our homes, can make them. Warm tints upon the wall harmonize with the handsome carpets and agree most artistically with the cherry woodwork and book-shelves, showing that the designers understand the restfulness and inspiration of bright color and cheerful surroundings. The nucleus of books amounts to about one thousand volumes, and there is shelf roof for twelve or fifteen times as many. The intent of the founders is to furnish literature both helpful and diverting. A Chicago architect has donated twenty-five volumes on mechanics and physical science. Carpenters' Union, No. 1 has put in a set of books on carpentry and construction. Another has given Washington Irving's works complete. No public appeal for aid has been made, but undoubtedly contributions of good books in good condition would be gladly received.

Judge Tuthill, at the opening recently, well said: "This library will be an opponent of the saloon." If working men in large numbers would put one-tenth of the money they now spend in saloons and worse resorts into places like this, every ward would have its library and reading-room. The tendency to shorter hours of labor is inevitable. Eight hours constituting a working day at the World's Fair helps on the movement, which is made possible by the genius of mechanical invention. Whether the increased leisure proves a blessing or curse depends upon the working men themselves. This movement from within their own ranks is most auspicious. Philanthropic associations of all sorts have opened free reading-rooms to see them languish for lack of patronage; but what their own money has purchased, the laboring people of Chicago will enjoy. The sense of need preceded the supply. This old world will blossom in all its desert places when the men and women who perform its work put their earnings into real comforts and sources of genuine pleasure. They have the numbers, they have the money. What does the combined fortunes of a few millionaires amount to compared with the aggregate earnings of the great army of wage-workers? Further, they have the generosity. Many a young man, receiving from fifteen to twenty-five dollars per week parts with it all between pay days, living more lavishly than the small capitalist dreams of doing. If his investments were in pleasant quarters, pictures, books and music with good food and clothes, his existence would brighten the earth, whatever our philosophy as to the wisdom of his living fully up to his income. As it is he turns his wages into what destroys him as an animal, depraves him mentally and hopelessly hides him as an angel—all through the agency of the saloon, itself a common pest.

It marks an era in sociology when the desire for higher refreshments and better atmosphere than is found in drinking and gaming resorts is strong enough to materialize in a library and reading-room, established and maintained at the expense of those for whom it exists. That is true philanthropy which stirs the cravings of the higher nature, wakes the sense of art and rouses men to consciousness of a self that will not consent to be stupefied with strong drink, while the subordinate nature revels above it.

We near the dawn of a better day in which there shall be a great uprising, not manifesting itself in strikes and riots, but appearing in self-created surroundings calculated to develop men away from the primer edition of humanity to the quarto and folio. In that better time a-coming there will be no need of orators calling upon the world to respect the rights of labor, while they proclaim its dignity, for the innate dignity of the independent, self-supporting, self-trained man of skill in useful arts will compel respect. All that society, better educated and better conditioned, can do is to remove obstructions wherever possible and beckon on the climbing "masses," while every individual can help by reaching a friendly hand to the one nearest him, struggling upward.

The whole race will share in the benefits. Epictetus, for twenty years a slave, while mentally and morally the peer of Plato, and afterward, in his freedom, blessing Rome and the world for all time with his philosophy, was but an earnest of the final emancipation of the world's workers from every form of slavery and restoration to their true heritage of manhood and destined place among the world's thinkers.

PROHIBITION PROHIBITS.

The local option law of the state of Arkansas confers upon its citizens the privilege of petition against the location of a saloon within a radius of three miles from any church or school-house. If a majority of citizens so petition (and a woman's name here counts as much as a man's) the judge has no choice in the matter—the saloon must go. The law is well enforced in all "dry" districts, with the exception of two or three large cities where miniature Tammanies hold sway.

Two gentlemen recently visited Arkansas on a business expedition. One of them, while there, was suddenly seized with the fear that change of water might result in serious disturbances of his physical condition. Therefore, accompanied by a resident friend, he started out to purchase something stronger. After a diligent search of two hours the desired dram was necessarily dispensed with. To the credit of its officials be it said that in that town of over three thousand inhabitants, and with plenty of drug stores. not a half pint of liquor could be found.

The party had occasion to visit two adjoining counties, and found the same state of affairs in each. Not all their efforts nor the efforts of the accommodating liveryman could secure a drink of whisky or beer.

Arkansas has been looked upon as a kind of Nazareth among the states, but if our prohibition friends think there can no good come out of it, just let them go and see. We understand that a bill has been introduced into the present legislature extending the "dry" limit to six miles from church and school-house.

"WHERE IS WILLARD HALL?"

This question is almost the first one asked by visitors to our beautiful Temperance Temple. They are at once informed by the polite usher and elevator men that it is "around the corner" on Monroe street, No. 174, but they are so disappointed that it is not to be reached through the Temple proper, that it is hard to convince them to the contrary. The gentlemanly superintendent of the Temple, Mr. J. H. Mason, has put this thought into witty verse as follows:

WHERE IS WILLARD HALL?

This is the question of the day,
Asked by the plain as well as gay;
Which, when you answer straight and true,
They scarcely ever credit you.

They think it must be near the roof,
And ask you still for further proof;
They want to go to upper floors
To find up there the open doors.

They sometimes boldly take the car,
And ask the occupants how far
They have to go for Willard Hall,
If such a place there is at all.

And when informed they must go down,
That Willard Hall is on the ground,
'Tis then they think they are deceived
In everything they had believed.

So down they come in warm disgust,
And tell you that you really must
Explain to them their own mistake,
Or how they could such blunders make.

You tell them that the Willard Hall
Is back of that partition wall;
Its entrance is from Monroe street,
And to be gained upon their feet.

They yet will stand and look surprised,
As if the facts were still disguised,
And ask again in partial doubt,
Before persuaded to go out.

At last they turn to take the walk,
And still you hear them in their talk;
Denouncing such a stupid thing,
As Willard Hall upon the wing.

THE reception of our editors in Scotland is reported as exceeding in enthusiasm anything that they have ever seen. In Edinburgh the university students proposed taking the horses from the carriage and themselves conveying them to their place of entertainment. The whole house rose and cheered and mighty cheers resounded along the street as they departed.

Addresses from the united temperance societies of all the churches in Scotland were presented by Rev. Dr. Blaikie, moderator of the Free church. Besides this all the National temperance societies welcomed them and the Band of Hope, the boys being in the Highland costume, brought bouquets of flowers. The immense Synod Hall was packed and a standing audience occupied rear aisles and stairs. The singing was exquisite. "The heavens are telling the glory of God"—that wondrous chorus from the Creation, was rendered just before Miss Willard spoke. Beautiful volumes of Scottish views were presented, besides addresses and poems of welcome engraved on vellum. Glasgow gave them an audience of five thousand in St. Andrew's Hall on Sunday night, January 22, and in the city hall on the following evenings, the crowd was dense.

The address of Rev. Dr. Fergus Ferguson, for forty-seven years pastor of the United Presbyterian church in Glasgow, was very fine. They spoke for the Woman's Christian Association at its annual meeting, at which time James Campbell White gave ten thousand dollars to build a home for girls. In both cities the halls were brilliant with flags and mottoes. Mrs. Dr. Blaikie, president of the Scottish (Woman's) Christian (Temperance) Union, presided in Edinburgh; Professor Simpson, of the university, offered the vote of thanks.

Miss Katharine Willard, who was visiting in Professor Simpson's home, sang at one of the meetings most acceptably. Our editors took tea with Mrs. Priscilla Bright McLaren, sister of Mrs. Margaret Bright Lucas. Miss Anna Gordon shared in the presentations, and addressed children's meetings in both cities, also spoke to the Young Woman's Christian Association in Edinburgh, "auld Scotia's darling seat."

THE college of Liberal Arts of the university of Edinburgh recently opened its doors to women, and twenty-five young women matriculated at once. Many others have since been added to the number.

Miss Grace Dodge, of New York City, made the following sensible observation in a recent interview: "I hate that word 'philanthropy,'" she said, in response to some remark about her work. "In the first place, my work in my clubs is not philanthropic. It is simply part of my social life. A woman was talking to me the other day, and she said that she was 'in thirty charities.' I belong to several girls' clubs, and I attend them like any other member."

In 1890 a movement was started to raise five hundred thousand dollars to endow a medical school for Johns Hopkins University which was to be open to women. Miss Mary E. Garrett, daughter of John W. Garrett, of Baltimore, led off with a gift of fifty thousand dollars. Committees of women were then formed in Boston, New York, Chicago and Philadelphia to continue the work. Miss Garrett has now completed the work of endowment by the additional gift of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Her gift of four hundred thousand dollars is to be called the Mary Garrett fund. Fifty thousand dollars of the five hundred thousand dollars is to be used for a building known as the Woman's Fund Memorial Building.

On Duty has received this interesting communication: "In your bright column I notice a semi-inquiry as to the author of the following: 'I am only one but I am one. I cannot do everything but I can do something. What I can do I ought to do, and what I ought to do by the help of God I will do.' The author of this is unknown. It was found written on the wall of a deserted cabin in the far west some years ago by Hon. Lou J. Beauchamp, of Hamilton, Ohio, and was by that able platform orator first uttered. Please give him proper credit for it."

Concerning collections, Brother Jasper says, "You tell me the gospel is as free as water; I tell you, yes, but you have got to pay for the pipe that brings it." An Indian was converted and was endeavoring to decide which church he should join. He went to the Episcopal, and looking over the prayer-book he saw the often recurring words: "Collect, collect." He decided not to join that church.

We are apt to forget that one may be correct in the personal habits of life, and yet vicious in his attitude toward the vital issues of his time, we are apt to ignore the ethical quality in the intellect. But we should do well to remember that integrity of mind is no less important than integrity of conscience.

This is the Genesis and Exodus of humanity's great, steady, slowgrowing uplift: First, the fanatic, laughed at and despised; next, the reformer, battling against overwhelming numbers, and often with but small success; then the philanthropist who has an easier road; next, the statesman who is covered with honor and lifted on the pedestal of fame; last, the politician, who if he fears God and loves his brethren clinches the work of those who have preceded him in such legislation as furnishes to the people the officer behind the ordinance, the law-enforcer back of the law.

On Duty has recently heard about an entertainment called "Friends' Day," which was given by Mrs. J. Crosby Brown for women during the pleasant season of the year at her magnificent country home on Orange Mountain, New Jersey. Mrs. Brown has systematized this for the last nine years, so that each day she has given an outing to eight mothers from the purlieus of New York City, each mother bringing her little one, or that of some body else. She finds many women who have not had the smallest glimpse of the country in twenty years, and it is like a new heaven and a new earth to them. Two carriages are sent to the railway station for these women and little ones; there is a house on the premises where they are entertained and refreshments are given them three times, whilst during the interval they have the beautiful lawn for their playground. Mrs. Brown says that some days she entertains a group of German grandmothers seated on the green sward, knitting in hand. Another time she will have two carriage loads of colored people, and so on in great variety.

NEW HAMPSHIRE NEWS.

The Granite State Outlook for February, contains a letter from our new state president, Miss C. R. Wendall. She urges strongly scientific temperance instruction in all the schools throughout the state; also that when the town elections come off, every member of the unions shall use the school suffrage to help elect moral and temperance men on the school board who shall esteem it their duty to enforce the temperance law.

There was a very successful meeting of the Rockingham county temperance association at Sandown in December. Addresses were given by Rev. A. L. Smith and E. Smiley, of South Newmarket, and others. During the afternoon a W. C. T. U. was organized with fourteen members, Mrs. Charles Sanborn, president. In the evening Prof. T. B. Rice, of the Atkinson Academy, gave an address, subject, "The Relation of License to Crime."

Miss Ella T. Pearsons, of Epping, superintendent of juvenile work, during a tour through part of New Hampshire gave illustrated lectures upon the blackboard. Her chalk-talks win the confidence of the little folks. At the commencement of her lecture she has the little ones repeat after her Scripture passages, thus impressing upon their minds such thoughts as will remain and bring forth good results.

Miss Pearsons is adapted to her work. She wins the confidence of the children to a remarkable degree. She lectured in Hopkinton, January 17, going from there to Epsom.

The Hopkinton union, though a small one, collected and sent a barrel of good reading to the superintendent of work among the lumbermen. The following from Mrs. Loyne in acknowledgment, may be helpful to others:

"If you could hear the words of praise from these lumbermen for the thoughtfulness of the ladies, you would be more than paid for your trouble. How the reading comes in from all parts of New Hampshire and Massachusetts! It comes from King's Sons and Daughters, Christian Endeavorers, Epworth Leagues, Masonic Societies, the W. C. T. U., the Loyal Women of American Liberty, L. T. L., publishers and friends everywhere. Some of it is very fine. If we can only keep up the supply we shall be thankful.

"Libraries are established wherever we can; our great need now is money to get the people to visit the camps for us where they are so far away from any settlement. This is getting to be a very important mission. May we not pray the blessing of God upon our work. I am sure that thus far we have reason to thank Him for what has been done. We are always in need of good books and money to carry on the work. Sometimes it will take two or three days to make a tour of a few camps, and this must be done often. Our work is gratuitous, but libraries cost money." This seems a truly noble work. It is non-sectarian and calls for such books and story-papers as would be enjoyed in good, moral families.

Mrs. Rev. A. W. Loyne, Jefferson, has charge of this grand work. The W. C. T. U. at Franklin have put in a camp library at Jefferson Meadows, in memory of their dear Mother Mack, for the use of the railroad men employed on the logging trains.

The Derry Union has met with great loss in the death of its president, Mrs. Elizabeth D. Haskins. She was a member of the union from its organization, and always stood true to the work. She has been an invalid for the past four years, but she seemed to forget herself in her work for others. In her death the church and community have suffered loss. Her funeral service, a scene of holy peace, was closed by singing the hymn she loved so well "Jesus Lover of my Soul." Earth is poorer, but heaven is richer. Of her it may be truly said, "She hath done what she could."

Strafford county convention held their thirteenth meeting in the reading-rooms at Great Falls. After the opening exercises and words of greeting from Mrs. Lathrop, they proceeded to elect a new treasurer in the place of Mrs. Burrell, resigned. Mrs. Abbott, of Rochester, was chosen. Mrs. Tapley made an earnest plea for THE UNION SIGNAL. Mrs. Gleason, of Massachusetts, was present and said if the ladies would read THE UNION SIGNAL more thoroughly they would have a ready and complete answer to the oft-repeated question "What is your W. C. T. U. doing?"

Miss Wendall presented the county constitution which had been revised by a committee chosen at the last convention. She then gave in a clear and entertaining manner, an account of the National convention —a most graphic description of the doings of that great gathering.

Mrs. Ricker, president of the Y. W. C. T. U. in Dover, spoke encouragingly to the Great Falls Y and told of their work in Dover. Mrs. Gleason conducted the question-box and spoke in answer to the questions: "How shall we interest indifferent members? How shall we make our meetings interesting?"

The convention then closed.

The Hollis union is on the gain. No liquor is sold in town, so there is not the need for aggressive work that some of the unions have. Several new departments have been taken up and the attendance thus far has been better than during the last year.

East Manchester union observed February 12, as a day of evangelistic work in response to the call of our national superintendent of this department. The county president was with them and the pulpit was occupied by the workers.

I wish I could interest some reader of THE UNION SIGNAL in our anti-tobacco paper (published by C. H. Shepherd, Melvin Village, N. H.,) sufficiently to secure funds to increase the usefulness of this little Gem. The editor tells me that he has several ideas, which, if he had the money he should work out for illustrating his paper. He realizes that taking pictures often make a lasting impression for good upon the young.

I hope at some near date to be able to tell you more of this Anti-tobacco Gem; how it came into existence and through what sacrifices it is carried on. Of this I am confident, it is worthy a place in every home in the land and tiny as it is, will have an influence. There are at the present time, one hundred and one unions in our state. Total membership, 2,636 with two hundred honorary members. Eight new unions have been organized and two have disbanded. The amount raised by the unions approximated $3,720. Four hundred and seventy-three UNION SIGNALS are taken.

Laconia will hold the state flag the coming year according to the rule—having the largest percentage of gain.

Mrs. C. W. Pratt, presided at the Merrimac county convention in Epsom; her first meeting since her return from Europe. Mrs. Scribner led the devotional exercises. The Bow union is a continual surprise, and on this day its president read a fine paper, "What are some of the advantages of a W. C. T. U. to a country neighborhood?" Surely no union could answer this question better than our young, but very flourishing Bow W. C. T. U.

Mrs. F. H. Bailey contributed a true story of an early temperance movement in her native town which is soon to be published, by request, in our state paper, The Granite State Outlook.

"What can a Young Woman do?" was explained in an essay by Mrs. Dr. Pattee, of Canterbury. Mrs. Sawyer brought the convention a fine report of the work done at the Denver Convention, to aid and encourage the lesser lights struggling in these outer towns.

In the evening, the L. T. L. gave a pleasant entertainment and the convention closed with remarks from our county president.

The state executive committee meeting was held in Manchester. Miss McIntire reported the financial condition of the state paper as having improved in the past year, but still not self-supporting. It was voted to petition the palace car company to abolish the smoking compartments, that ladies may travel without being compelled to inhale the fumes of tobacco night and day.

The World's Petition was to be circulated in various ways in every union where it has not already been done. It was decided to take the same stand as the National union, and not indorse any special method for the cure of the alcohol habit. The matter of investigating the laws of our state as to the civil rights of women was put into the hands of Mrs. Jewett. The work of raising money for the land about the Mercy Home was to be pushed forward. Mr. Comstock and the railroad companies were to be conferred with, relating to the sale of impure papers upon the cars in this state.

Peterborough has held its first Demorest medal contest; Mrs. Wallace, a teacher in elocution, trained the seven young girls. Maude Lillian Wallace won the medal. A class of boys and another of girls are preparing for another contest, and it is their desire to continue the work until they can compete for a gold medal.

At the Hillsborough county convention, held in Peterborough, Mrs. H. Q. Russell read a paper on "What intemperance costs us," and Mrs. J. D. Swane one on "Is the country imperiled by the liquor traffic more through the indifference of good men or the aggressive activity of bad men?" Both papers should be published that the voters might read and consider, and let not the men dare to say that the women cannot reason soundly.

Mrs. M. W. Richardson spoke to the L. T. L. Mrs. Chase presented the needs of the Mercy Home, their especial needs being a cow and a wagon.

Mrs. E. K. Jewett visited the Francestown union, spending Sunday there. Saturday evening was set aside for conference and prayer. Sunday evening the union held a public mass-meeting, presided over by the president of the local union and addressed by the county president, Mrs. Jewett, on the subject, "The foes and the friends of the temperance work."

Keene citizens have shown their interest in the medal contests by filling their hall for the fourth time. The contestants were from twelve to fifteen years of age, and were under the training of Mr. A. B. Heywood. Music and song varied the program. Perry Harvy Murdick won the medal and all the other speakers received a book.

I quote from Clare E. Rowell's annual report regarding the taking of THE UNION SIGNAL: "THE UNION SIGNAL ought to be read by every temperance worker in the state. The stimulus of a world-wide comradeship in a good cause, the suggestions of new methods and means, the inspirations given by such thinkers and philanthropic workers as are represented in its columns—all these are so helpful that it is difficult to understand how those thoroughly interested in the work do not regard its visits as an absolute necessity."

TEXAS NEWS ITEMS.

Dallas union is wide awake and at work, as the following interesting letter from Mrs. Knowles, corresponding secretary, shows:

"Dallas union is in a flourishing condition. We have good meetings every Thursday afternoon in the Tabernacle M. E. church. We have established a 'newsboys' home' with comfortable quarters on the first floor of a new brick building on Main street. They have good, clean beds and will soon have a bath-room, and hope to have a good matron who will stay all the time. At present some of the ladies are there in turn. We are giving teas there every Saturday afternoon for the benefit of the home.

"Miss Emma Rowley, a very interesting young lady and a member of the Y's takes great interest in the home and gave the first tea, assisted by some of her young friends.

"We have monthly readings and are also reading the National President's address delivered at Denver and trying to profit by its wise counsel.

"We are anxious to find some way to keep obscene pictures off our streets and out of the show windows of some business houses.

"We have a committee writing to the state legislature about the scientific temperance instruction bill which we hope will pass this session.

"One of our members has taken a boy to rear who was put in jail for some misdemeanor. Our committee visits the jail and hospital, carrying literature and bandages, and some one is distributing literature all the time."

Miss Belle Kearney, National Y organizer, recently made a short visit to Texas. The weather was very unpropitious during her visit in Dallas. She gave one interesting address at the First Baptist church. At Oak Cliff, she spoke in the Baptist church and also before the young ladies of Oak Cliff College. An informal parlor meeting was held at Mrs. Dr. Williams', where a small Y was formed. Miss Kearney aroused quite a little enthusiasm in Texas.

Ft. Worth W and Y keep up their columns in the two evening papers.

The White Ribbon is publishing an address by Miss Buchanan before the first annual meeting of the Brownwood W. C. T. U. It is very fine. Just the thing to place in the hands of the woman who asks, "What is the W. C. T. U. for, anyhow?" The address will probably be published in leaflet form.

Mrs. Stoddard made a most successful visit to Galveston, where all had been aroused by the preaching of Revs. Jones and Stewart. Many men and women joyfully joined the W. C. T. U.

At La Grange everything had been so wisely planned by Miss Maggie Boyd, that the meetings were delightful with fine music, beautiful decorations and crowded houses. A union was organized with twenty-four members and a number of honoraries. Mrs. Stoddard commends Miss Boyd's executive ability and persistent, happy faith.

San Marcos W. C. T. U. celebrated with a prayer and praise service, the anniversary of the day on which the good men voted whisky out of that town.

Beaumont has given interesting public meetings and temperance sentiment is growing. Mrs. Hoskins, superintendent of railroads in Beaumont, is enforcing the law made by railroad officials compelling the discharge of an employé who frequents saloons or uses intoxicating drinks.

San Antonio unions are still trying to get Sunday closing according to the laws of the state. A committee called on the county attorney, Mr. Bart. Dewitt, and presented a written request that he should make more effective the laws on our statute books commonly known as "the Sunday laws." As the ladies have received no reply they are now circulating a petition to the business men asking them to close their houses on Sunday.

The four saloons on the edge of prohibition west end were visited with the petition but the proprietors flatly refused to close on Sunday, saying that was the day they made their living. This shows how important this work is.

One young lady of Prospect Hill union, has secured more than a dozen signers to the pledge among her young men friends. A white ribbon is worn on the lapel and when she sees them without it they pay a penny fine to her.

A member of Central union has secured many signers to the pledge, among them, one of her neighbors, a drinking man. She had talked to him frequently on the subject of temperance. One evening he sent for her saying he wanted to sign the pledge. She told him not to do it without thinking seriously about it. He insisted on signing it. She gave him a pledge card and white ribbon. Not very long afterward he was seen in a saloon; as he raised the glass he said, "This is to the W. C. T. U.," and drained it. Taking another he said, "This is to my white ribbon." About a week after that the man died very suddenly.

The Sunset union has a very flourishing L. T. L. of more than eighty members. Mrs. Rountree, city superintendent of L. T. L's, visited them not long since and held an experience meeting with them. They had much of interest to tell concerning the questions asked about their badges and the temptations presented.

The San Antonio Argus, a weekly religious paper, Rev. F. S. Jackson and Mrs. Hattie R. Jackson, editors, is giving a great deal of attention to our W. C. T. U. work on all lines. Mrs. Jackson is one of our most valuable W. C. T. U women, active in every good work.

Mrs. Fry announces that the home for girls out of employment is in good running order and ready to supply servants for those wishing to employ.

The hearts of the W. C. T. U. of the entire state are with our beloved president in her heroic struggle to gain scientific temperance instruction for the children of Texas. She meets with much encouragement from the members of the legislature.

Mrs. Delia Collins, superintendent of social purity, who had succeeded so admirably with rescue work in Fort Worth is also in Austin asking for an appropriation of $50,000 from the state to establish an industrial home for fallen women. Senator Swayne has introduced the bill. Judging from the daily papers' report of senators weeping as Mrs. Collins pleaded the cause of the poor unfortunates she will get the desire of her heart.

The San Antonio Express ridicules the idea of state aid for such a cause, and says "the paltry sum of $50,000 would scarce provide them with dish-cloths and knitting needles."

MAINE.

KNOCKING AT THE DOOR OF THE LEGISLATURE.

The tide of suffrage sentiment is steadily rising in our state. A few years ago members of the judiciary committee would sit with their feet on the tables and puff tobacco smoke into the faces of the ladies while they were pleading for the ballot. But all this is now changed, and the advocates of woman suffrage are much more hopeful than ever before. The attitude of the press is on the whole decidedly favorable. The Lewiston Journal gives the following account of the hearing, on February 4, in the interest of municipal suffrage:

"Friday was woman's day, and the committee on the judiciary gave a hearing to the ladies in the interest of municipal suffrage for women.

"The committee undertook to hear the ladies in the judiciary room, but it was soon crowded almost to suffocation, and a hundred clamored at the entrance for admission. A man in the rear of the room suggested that all adjourn to representatives' hall.

"This decision was received with applause by the ladies, and the remainder of the session was in the hall, which was filled with spectators.

"Mrs. Hannah J. Bailey, of Winthrop Centre, (president of the Maine Woman's Suffrage Association and the heaviest woman tax-payer in the state), opened the hearing by reading a paper in favor of suffrage. She argued that taxation without representation was tyranny. She had written letters to the assessors in every town in Maine to learn how many women paid taxes, and had received returns from 230 towns. In these towns there were 12,393 women, who were taxed on an aggregate of $12,005,000 of property.

"Mrs. E. S. Osgood, of Portland, president of the Maine federation of woman's literary clubs, addressed the committee. She assured them that the ladies had left the babies well taken care of. It was all right for the ladies to go to the legislative ball, but when they wanted to cast their votes—requiring only half an hour—then it was said they had deserted their babies.

"Mrs. Judge Cram, of Biddeford, corresponding secretary of the Maine W. C. T. U., in her youth had heard about strong-minded women, but she had rather be called strong minded than weak-minded. It would be hard for her to tell the reasons why she wanted municipal suffrage, but there was no reason why she should not have it.

"Mrs. Dr. Hersom, of Portland, thought that the fact that the ladies had come down to the state house showed that they wanted the ballot. It was not because the men did not want to give the ballot to women, but because they looked at things in a different light. She believed the women could help the men in education and moral reform. A large, earnest, thoughtful and Christian body of women wanted the ballot. All she could say was that she wanted the ballot.

"Mrs. Hamilton, of Saco, was the next speaker. She questioned if this was a true democracy. Was it not a sham democracy where one-half the citizens were disfranchised—the women? It was an oligarchy. She told a story about a weak-minded man who brought milk to her house, who told her she couldn't vote because she was a woman, which was received with laughter and applause.

"Mrs. E. S. Fogg, of Augusta, said the ladies wanted the ballot because they were mothers. They want teachers to form the characters of their boys, who would make them men.

"Mrs. Elizabeth W. Varnum, of Portland, said the men and women all had one point in common—they all had mothers. Her grandfather, who was once state treasurer, when over 90 years old was asked what he thought of municipal suffrage. He replied, 'I have been under petticoat government all my life, and I don't know as I object to it.'

"Mrs. Helen Beedy, of Farmington, believed the women in Maine were becoming much more intelligent in regard to this question; also the men. She attended the republican convention in Bangor last spring and when they took their hats off there was a fine showing of heads—you know men don't wear false hair. I thought how lonesome they looked without the women, as I and my companion, the wife of ex-Gov. Davis, were the only women in the room.

"Mrs. George S. Hunt, of Portland, objected to the law which gave the father control of the children while the mother had no voice. She had been down here seven years and pleaded for a reformatory prison for women and gave some reasons for such an institution. They said they couldn't afford it. They wouldn't give any of Mrs. Bailey's money for a prison but they would use it to send the militia to New York, which she opposed, being a Friend. She wanted a political house-cleaning and thought the influence of women would reform politics.

"Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, of Stroudwater, president Maine W. C. T. U., believed the committee could trust the women of Maine to vote in municipal affairs. She thought if the women ought to stay at home to take care of the babies, the men should begin a campaign against the attendance of the women at church, as it would take so much of their time away from their babies. She had looked over some of Miss Bailey's correspondence with the town officers of the state. One had replied that the reason women should not be given the ballot, was because they did not pay a poll tax, and the word poll was spelt 'pole.'

"They wanted the ballot in municipal elections with an educational qualification —no matter how broad.

"Mr. Herrick, of the committee, asked the ladies if they wanted a property qualification to voting. They all replied, No.

"Mrs. Dr. Blanchard and Mrs. McGregor, of Portland, said a few words in favor of the measure.

"Mr. Powers, of the committee, at the close of the hearing, arose and expressed himself as very much interested, and said when the committee was all in attendance they would consider the question which had been discussed.

"Mrs. Stevens proposed a Chautauqua salute to the committee, which was given by the ladies waving their handkerchiefs."

It may be of interest to note that one of the most severe snow storms of the season came on the very day of the hearing; yet the ladies were able to travel, some of them many miles. Of course, they could not have gone to the polls in such weather!

AMONG THE PEDAGOGUES.

The W. C. T. U. has few more practical allies than are to be found in the Maine Pedagogical Society. A year ago the society appointed a committee to report suggestions for organizing school savings banks, and at the recent session a very interesting report was presented by J. W. Mitchell, who is trying the plan with great success in his own school in Rockland, where there are about sixty depositors, some putting in sixty dollars per year. One newsboy already owns stock in the Building and Loan Association, and there is a decline in the consumption of peanuts. Rev. E. M. Smith, president of the Maine Wesleyan Seminary, read a fine paper on the "Use of Tobacco Among School-boys," emphasizing the fact that all teachers should be free from the habit. A talk on physical training was given by J. N. Whittier, of Bowdoin College. "Lines of Advance," was the subject of an evening address by Professor Rounds of the New Hampshire state normal school, the special topic treated being manual training, moral instruction, physical culture, school instruction in agriculture and the uplift of woman. Among other good things Professor Rounds said that in his opinion Frances Willard had done more for education than any ten men in this country.

UNION NOTES.

Not even the rigors of one of the coldest winters we have ever known has been able to chill the zeal of our state president. She is as busy as ever organizing new unions and strengthening old ones, traveling long distances, in some parts of the state off the lines of railroad to reach the scattered towns and villages.

A spicy note comes from the Greene press superintendent: "Our union held a parlor meeting at Mrs. Lowell Mower's, January 17. It was the fourth birthday of the union and from four charter members we have increased to thirty-six. Two new members came in, Mrs. Jemima Randlett, aged ninety-six and Mrs. Mary Small, aged eighty-six.

"We feel to thank God that we have two such godly women in our ranks. Stephen B. Purrington, the first W. C. T. U. baby, was made an honorary life member at the last meeting. Our union was never in a better condition, and with a wide awake president and God to help us, we feel that we shall prosper and do all in our power for God and Home and Native Land."

The Auburn union has recently held two very pleasant sociables at the home of Mrs. L. C. Pulsifer. The first came just in time to circulate the suffrage petition which the gentlemen were as willing as the ladies to sign, and a thank-offering was made to aid our social purity work. At both socials many outside the society were present, refreshments were on sale and good entertainment furnished. One very pleasing feature was a school temperance exercise consisting of questions and answers, songs and poems, conducted by one of our most popular teachers and participated in by twenty of her pupils.

State Reporter, Auburn.

THE Albert W. C. T. U. of Milburn, N. J., are thanking a Connecticut worker, Mrs. Kingsbury, of Pine Orchard, for her assistance in a recent entertainment given by them. This union is giving a helpful series of Sunday evening lectures.

OKLAHOMA.

A VALIANT HELPER.

The cry of "Come over and help us" of the Oklahoma W. C. T. U. has been heard and answered by Miss I. C. DeVelling. Miss DeVelling had long cherished a desire to "campaign" in this portion of Uncle Sam's frontier. She came to Oklahoma City the week before the holidays when the territorial M. E. conference was in session, and a stirring temperance resolution was before that body. Miss DeVelling was allowed fifteen minutes to speak upon it. On the Sabbath in the same city she spoke an hour in the Southern M. E. church to a good audience, Mrs. Nellie Sheplor, territorial president, presiding.

It being mid-winter, and the weather unfavorable, it was decided that Miss DeVelling's tour should be confined to railroad towns. Appointments were made for her, some of which were a success; others, on account of indifference, mismanagement and cold weather, prevented her from carrying out the plan of work.

In twenty-five days she visited eleven cities and towns, and addressed thirty-one meetings of different kinds. At Kingfisher two lectures were given, one before the teachers' institute, urging upon the superintendent and teachers the strict observance of the national law on scientific temperance instruction in the public schools which is binding in all territories. She was listened to attentively, and was appreciated by all who heard her, and we feel that her work before the institute was more far-reaching, perhaps, than any other. At Jukon she found a bright little union, with earnest officers and workers, consequently, the public meeting was well arranged and there was a good audience.

At Purcell, the southern limit of our boundary, no arrangements had been made for her coming, but the indomitable W. C. T. U. spirit did not desert her. She heard of a temperance meeting six miles in the country, met a farmer and his wife who were going to it, took passage with them in a big lumber wagon and found good helpers (and made them fast friends).

At their urgent request she remained in the neighborhood three days and addressed several meetings in different school-houses. She found a temperance society for all the people, in good working order, and thought it best not to organize a union at present. Miss DeVelling received much courteous treatment from this farming community and her stay among them was profitable for good.

The "model union" at Guthrie perfected arrangements so that Miss DeVelling was enabled to reach a large number of people. She spoke before three Sabbath schools and in the afternoon to a large audience; although it was announced for a children's meeting, more than half the audience were "grown-ups."

Miss DeVelling experienced hardships in her brief tour in the Territory, but she thinks the time is here for pressing our work to the "very gates"; that there is great need of temperance education among all classes; that our workers need to be more earnest and practical. The financial returns were small, but the National has made it possible to remunerate in part for her "free-will offering." Miss Willard has said that, "Miss DeVelling is always found where the work is hardest," and could our chieftain have followed her through this campaign, she would have reiterated her praise in stronger terms.

When THE UNION SIGNAL bore to the white ribboners of this territory the news of the death of Mary Allen West, our heads bent in sorrow, and we pondered at the mysterious dealings of Providence, but verily, she "hath fought a good fight."

The following recommendation shows how hard it is to stem the tide of evil when a grand jury of Oklahoma county will connive at an evasion of the law.

"We recommend that no gaming-table, or device for gambling, be permitted to be run or conducted on the ground-floor of any building situated in Oklahoma county; provided, that in case such a regulation is not complied with, then it is recommended that in such cases the statute pertaining to games and gambling be rigidly enforced."

MRS. SUE UHL BROWN,
Territorial Reporter, Oklahoma City.

ANOTHER addition to the long list of successful Demorest medal contests is the recent one of the Sidney, N. Y., W. C. T. U. The decorations were most appropriate, consisting of the National W. C. T. U. motto in gilt, a long chain of tri-colored pledge cards, and the picture of W. Jennings Demorest. Fine music alternated with the recitations which were exceptionally well rendered, the prize winner being Mr. Chester Lyon, of East Mannsville, a student of Sidney high school who is now the proud wearer of the silver medal.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL WORK.

The time is short that remains for securing the autograph pledges in the Sunday-school for the Columbian Exposition. Will not the superintendents and all interested order the cards and present them in the Sunday-schools as soon as possible? To avoid delay, send orders directly to the department secretary, Mrs. Julia A. Bidwell, Deposit, (not Hartford as given in the National Minutes) New York. The quarterly temperance Sunday, March 19, will be a good time to secure these signatures.

If all states had been as active in this effort as a part have been we should have an immense array of names. To date, 162,-106 of these cards have been ordered from the National superintendent and secretary. More than one-third of these have been ordered by two states, New York and Maine. New York has ordered 40,527 and Maine 22,720. Their protest, through this total abstinence chain, at the Columbian Exposition will tell a forceful one against the National disgrace of the sale of liquor in the grounds.

Would that as strong a protest might come from every state. Nor is it too late to secure this if the work is undertaken with the same energy that has been manifested in these two states. I desire to thank especially those outside of our W. C. T. U. ranks who have sent for these pledges,—ministers, Sunday-school superintendents and workers not belonging to us in name, but most truly in spirit. I wish space would allow of some mention of the letters which have come with the orders from all parts of the country.

When we bear in mind that this is the triple pledge against alcoholic drinks, tobacco and profanity, we give hearty thanks that our temperance army in the Sunday-school is ever growing and gaining new strength and power.

Send fifteen cents to the W. T. P. A. for a copy of the reports of National superintendents that you may know how the Lord has blessed this Sunday-school temperance work in the year that is behind us. Send to the same place for a sample of the quarterly temperance lesson for March 19.

Send to the department secretary for a copy of the new plan of work leaflet for this department, just issued. This is an eight-page leaflet and contains full directions and suggestions for state, county and local work with list of department helps, pledges, literature, etc.

An explanation is due those whose orders for the Quarterly Temperance Lesson Leaflet for December 25, were delayed or not filled. It was late when we learned that the W. T. P. A. was not to issue a leaflet for that date, therefore our time was short and the demand was so great for the leaflet we could not meet it at the last, though our printer ran his press all of one night and till late into the night for a week. The leaflet has been revised and adapted to general use and can be had of the department secretary.

Because of the good hand of our God upon this department work during the past year, shall not the coming one see far greater forward movement? The securing of the quarterly temperance Sunday was not an end, as some, I am sorry to say, seem to think, but rather the means to an end. To reach this end let the endeavor be to make these days as full of profit and interest as possible. Let us strive most earnestly, through the best methods, to secure thorough, intelligent temperance work in our Sunday-schools. Thus will the church of to-morrow, through its more sensitive conscience and larger faith, rise in the amplitude of its power for the over throw of the drink habit and traffic.

May the word of the Lord, by His prophet, Haggai, be a message to each one of us: Be strong, all ye people of the land, saith the Lord, and work; for I am with you, saith the Lord of hosts. Hag. 2:4.

In hopeful service,

LUCIA E. F. KIMBALL.

Woodfords, Me.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE SUPERINTENDENTS OF THE DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL PURITY.

DEAR SISTERS:—Three months have lapsed since my appointment to the superintendency of this department, and, although I have been silent, I have not been inactive. These three months have been spent in an endeavor to become acquainted with the needs of the department, and to evolve some definite plan of work. We are all aware that this department is one of the most difficult to manage, being one wherein zeal must be subordinate to discretion. I have not, as yet, formulated a thorough and complete plan of work, but take this opportunity to suggest some lines along which your energies can be made active.

The work may be divided into Legal, Reformatory and Educational.

In the Legal field each superintendent may do something by investigating the laws of her own state along the lines included in our work. What is the age of consent? What are the punishable offences against virtue and morality? What can be done in a quiet way to hold responsible the betrayers of innocent girls and the fathers of illegitimate children, in providing for the girls and maintaining the children? What are the laws against profanity and improper language? What laws against advertisements in newspapers which have a distinct immoral meaning? What laws against the display of indecent theatrical and other advertisements? This work is one which can best done, perhaps, by the superintendent alone, or with one or two capable, judicious, mature assistants.

In the reformatory work in cities or towns something may be done in behalf of fallen girls and women by interesting churches, individuals, or existing societies, in plans for their welfare, or in the starting and maintaining of rescue homes. It is not necessary to begin rescue work with a large building fully equipped for the purpose, but much can be done in a very unobtrusive way with a small room, open for gospel services, and a corps of wise workers to go out upon the street seeking for the lost. Very good work is being done by many of our unions in holding gospel meetings for depraved men, and the same idea can be utilized for women. In addition to this work, however, arises a very great need of places of shelter and of employment for those who desire to abandon their evil lives for ones of virtue, and many superintendents very desirous of taking up this rescue work, will find it almost impossible from lack of means.

Mrs. Prescott, our assistant superintendent, suggests, from her observation and experience through many years of rescue work, that it is all important that we utilize the force already existing in the municipal authorities, and seek the coöperation of the officials of the town and city. She maintains that the most efficient aid she has ever received in this work, has been through the police department, being most practical and powerful, and she suggests the wisdom of the unions obtaining the sympathetic coöperation of their city officials.

There is, however, one form of social purity work, which promises more than any thing else, and requires much less expenditure of means, and that is the educational. Every W. C. T. U., whether located in country, village, town or city, can take up this branch of the work with advantage.

The establishment of White Shield societies among women and girls is a work both preventive and educational, and it is Miss Willard's especial request that this line of work shall be pushed by superintendents. Any superintendent writing to me will receive more specific instruction as to methods of organizing and conducting the White Shield societies.

The mothers' meetings, beginning with the members of a union, will gradually enlarge to take in many of the mothers of the community, and the instructions there received will take root in their own hearts and lives and become fountains of wisdom and judicious information for their children. Mrs. J. H. Kellogg, of Battle Creek, Mich., who was Miss Willard's most efficient helper in the department of mothers' meetings, continues to give her wise counsel and has prepared an admirable plan for the conducting of the meetings, with a list of topics to be studied and of literature to be read. Any superintendent writing her direct will receive from her this plan, and we hope that each one, no matter what line of work she is most interested in, will feel that the department of mothers' meetings is the foundation of all work along these lines, and will institute them at once in her union, making a special effort to draw into them mothers who are not members of the union.

I would also suggest that the women school teachers be especially invited to attend these meetings and give the benefit of their experience. Teachers become acquainted with facts in public schools which are an indication of the conditions of thought which may strike the mind of the mother as most dreadful, and she will, perhaps, feel inclined to think that her children cannot possibly be guilty of the wrong thoughts and evil words which she hears related. But we must remember that although children may have learned evil, they are not necessarily sinners because of it, and instead of visiting upon them condign punishment for sins which they do not recognize as sins, we should be willing to be fully enlightened as to all the evils and temptations which surround them, and obtaining their confidence, be able to assure them of our sympathy and to give them the wise, pure, beautiful instruction which will purify the fountain of evil and give them higher and nobler views of themselves and their relation to the race.

But mothers will not be capable of instructing their children until they, themselves, have first received instruction. Therefore it might be well for every union to institute a circulating library of books and leaflets, which give wise and right instruction upon these points.

If members of unions would form circles of six each, passing the literature from one to the other until each one had read book or leaflet, the work of the circulating library would be made very efficient with but little labor. By this means, the individual members of the union would not be put to the expense of purchasing books, but one book would answer for the whole union and the expense be shared by the union.

A partial list of books which can be used to advantage is appended. A full list will be given later.

FOR GIRLS, Mrs. Shepherd, Fowler & Wells; SONG OF LIFE, Miss Morley, W. T. P. A., $1.25; A WELL DRESSED WOMAN, Mrs. Ecob, Fowler & Wells; WHO CARES? Mrs. Goff, T. B. Peterson & Brother; BUILD WELL, Dr. Cordelia Green, Castile. N. Y.; CONFIDENTIAL TALKS WITH YOUNG MEN. Dr. Lyman B. Sperry, Revell & Co., Chicago; TEACHING TRUTH, Mary Wood Allen, M. D., Toledo, O. and all the leaflets of the W. T. P. A. in the social purity series.

Hoping that this will be suggestive to superintendents of departments for the beginning of active practical work, and promising to add from time to time what observation and experience proves to be necessary or advantageous, I am, yours in the great work,

MARY WOOD ALLEN, M. D.

National Superintendent Social Purity Department.

THE WOMAN'S LECTURE BUREAU.

The Woman's Lecture Bureau takes pleasure in announcing that it is ready to furnish talent for Summer Chautauquas, Camps, Schools of Method, Lecture Courses, W. C. T. U's, Political Equality Clubs, etc., and requests your attention to the following named lecturers:

Frances E. Willard.
Lady Henry Somerset.
Rev. Anna Howard Shaw. *
Mary T. Lathrop. *
Helen M. Gougar. *
Miss Anna Gordon, the World's W. C. T. U. superintendent of temperance work among children.
Carrie Lane Chapman, in Illinois in March, and Ohio in April.
Miss I. C. DeVelling, in California during the coming season.
Clara C. Hoffman, in Illinois and Indiana in April.
Lydia J. Newcomb, lecturer and instructor on vocal and physical culture.
Lillie Devereux Blake will respond to calls in the vicinity of New York City.
Elizabeth U. Yates, February 20 in Pennsylvania, and in Delaware in March.
Mary Sparkes Wheeler, in Pennsylvania in March and April.
Volney B. Cushing, Pennsylvania and Ohio in April.
Harriet May Mills, in New York in March.
Rev. C. H. St. John, in Indiana after March 25.
Lou J. Beauchamp, calls for March.
Mary Seymour Howell, in Pennsylvania the last of February and in March.
Messrs. Wolfenbarger and Huckins.
Ellen M. Bolles. *

If you wish to secure first-class talent, be sure and communicate with the Woman's Bureau and we are certain that it may be furnished you at the lowest possible figure. If you want some attraction not on the list let us know and we will be very happy to get it for you.

We hope that we may have an opportunity to serve you and thus prove to you that our Bureau, although comparatively new, is as good as the best. We are already making engagements for next fall and winter, and will be glad to arrange for single lectures, courses, distributed through the season, and in cases where so wished, for a week or a month in a vicinity at reduced rates.

For terms, dates, etc., apply to Lucy E. Anthony, Mgr., Somerton, Philadelphia.

* By special arrangements.

AMANDA SMITH has been made a National evangelist of the W. C. T. U.

MRS. HENRIETTA SKELTON has organized seven new unions since the Denver Convention.

THE Catholic Woman's Temperance Union of St. Louis has seventy-five members who wear the white ribbon, with a small silver cross attached.

MRS. MARY CROWLEY BONNETT, a valued member of the Coshocton W. C. T. U. and president of the Y, passed away on January 10. She was greatly beloved for her merry ways and genial disposition and was a born leader of young people; she will be greatly missed.
